If such things have been done, they may be repeated. The profound, and I believe sincere, conviction of the Democratic party is, that if the election could be fairly conducted, and the vote cast without intimidation, General M'Clellan would certainly be elected. The leaders of the party, while they work strenuously and encourage their voters to the most zealous efforts, do not believe that there will be a free or fair election, and have not any confidence in the election of their candidate So far as their plans and expectations are developed, I think they mean to struggle for, and hope to carry, the following States for M'Clellan, as the basis for whatever action they may decide upon in the event of his defeat. They look upon Pennsylvania, notwithstanding the late result, as likely, from various local causes and means they are industriously applying, to give her 26 votes to General M'Clellan. They count their capital thus: New York, 33; New Jersey, 7; Pennsylvania, 26; and Illinois, 16. This makes a total of 82. If they obtain these 82 votes for M'Clellan, and no more, they will claim that he is entitled also to the 32 votes of the Border States, on the ground that none of these States can be carried against him but by the direct application of unlawful force for the suppression of the rights of free suffrage. These make 114 of the Presidential votes, and a majority if West Virginia, whose right to vote at all is contested, be excluded. That State exists in direct violation of the Constitution of the United States.

The conditions may be varied if General M'Clellan should carry one or two States other than those enumerated. These carried, however, there is a basis to strengthen the Democratic plea that the election of Mr. Lincoln cannot be effected except by the unlawful interference of the President, through his office-holders and the army, in reappointing himself. Hence the grand struggle will be to carry those States, and the chances seem of late to improve to that extent, that, if they do not elect a President, the opposition will be able to show that they have been defeated by means which justify revolution. It aggravates this case that the President has been taking steps to secure for himself some additional votes, of disputed legality, by the exercise of the same executive lawlessness, to be produced if necessary to secure his reelection. In Louisiana—a State reconstructed without law, under his military dictation, and ruled by his military subordinates—an election has been ordered for Presidential electors, to be chosen in November, for seven reserved votes, which may or may not be counted as the occasion arises.

The worst case is Tennessee, a State not reconstructed at all, but still proclaimed to be in insurrection, and governed under martial law by Andrew Johnson, Mr. Lincoln's associate on the ticket as candidate for Vice-President, now military governor of Tennessee, appointed by Mr. Lincoln. Governor Johnson orders an election for Presidential electors, and prescribes an oath to be taken, which is almost literally an oath against the Chicago nominee and platform. No man can vote under it except for Lincoln and Johnson. The President being prayed to annul this act, refuses to interfere, on the ground that he cannot interfere with elections, even to correct a gross act of party tyranny by the man who committed it in his name. He perpetrates a grim joke by telling the protesting parties that they can escape the oath by taking no part in the election—leaving the field unobstructed for Lincoln and Johnson; and with the same bland assurance adds that, after the vote is cast, which will be of course for Lincoln and Johnson, it may not be counted in Washington, if it be vitiated by the administering of this oath or other irregularity. Having made sure that it shall not be cast for M'Clellan, he treats the friends of M'Clellan to the consoling assurance that it may be not counted for himself—as it will probably not be unless he wants it. Not one of the partisan presses of this city devoted to Mr. Lincoln has said a single word in rebuke of this mixture of tyranny and jocularity in the closing against his rival of all chance for any vote in Tennessee, reducing the question to the alternative that Tennessee shall vote for him or otherwise not vote at all. Is not this a free country, and are you not almost persuaded by Mr. Cobden that democratic institutions which work this way are just the thing to improve the morals and happiness of the British people?

MR. SALA AND THE FEDERAL PRISONERS.

To the Editor of THE INDEX.

SIR,—The treatment of prisoners of war by the authorities of the Confederate States has been, since the very beginning of the American struggle, a subject of persistent falsification on the part of the Yankee press and the upholders of Abraham Lincoln. They have constantly sought to excite the indignation of Europe against the imputed inhumanity of the Confederates, and thus to break the force of that natural abhorrence which has been aroused in the breasts of all intelligent foreigners by the numberless atrocities of the Federal armies, acting under the orders of Federal generals and with the approval of the Federal Government. If they could but succeed in directing the sympathies of Englishmen towards the thousands of prisoners held by the Confederates, by representing these unfortunates as the victims of barbarity, they might divert attention from the smoking desert which Sheridan has left in the track of his legions through the once smiling valley of the Shenandoah, and the houseless women and children whom Sherman has turned out into the wilderness he has created in Georgia. The purpose of this systematic misrepresentation with regard to the prisoners of war in the Confederacy is apparent enough; and it must be admitted that, if credit is ever to be gained by frequent reiteration of a falsehood, the Yankees are likely to induce some belief on this side of the Atlantic in the story of Southern cruelty and wrong.

In a recent letter to the Daily Telegraph, Mr. George Augustus Sala recites the adventures of one Packer, 'the brother of Mr. John Elliott Packer, late captain's clerk of the United States ship Aries,' who was taken prisoner by a body of Confederate cavalry in the month of January last on the coast line of the Atlantic (his boat having been washed ashore not far from Charleston), and made to undergo all manner of hardships, privations, and bodily sufferings for a period of eight months, until he was regularly exchanged at Charleston in September. Packer tells, indeed, a doleful tale. The prisoners had nothing to eat, or their food was loathsome. They were locked up in rooms filled with vermin. They were constantly shot at by the sentinels. They were hunted, when escaping to the swamps, with bloodhounds. This tale Mr. Sala accepts for true, and makes his own by rewriting it and assimilating it to the rest of his material, a part of which is a description, painfully faithful, of a photograph exhibited in a shop window of Broadway, representing an exchanged Federal, long an inmate of the Libby Prison, taken from life, or we might rather say from approaching death. Now, Mr. Sala, as we all know, is nothing, in his peculiar line of correspondent or 'special commissioner'—absolutely nothing—if not 'sensational.' Every column of 'America in the Midst of War' must be striking—Sala-esque (I resist the temptation to say Sala-ent); every paragraph must be piquant, and the Packer story was just sufficiently 'full of horrors' for his purpose. It came opportunely to relieve the insipidities of Saratoga and its spas, of which he had just written ad nauseam, and we may not wonder that he seized hold of it eagerly as affording him a fortunate opportunity of writing one of those characteristic essays in the interests of humanity and virtue, in which he is always so sparkling and successful. But the Packer narrative will not meet with such ready credence at the hands of everybody as at the hands of Mr. Sala. It is purely ex parte. It was made as ghastly as possible to insure a rapid sale. It was, moreover, brought out to excite the Northern mind yet more fiercely against the South in the midst of a Presidential campaign. Upon its own merits, it is not likely to be generally trusted abroad, when we consider how the credulity of Europe has been imposed upon by Yankee misstatements of every sort, and of every source, from the Secretary of State at Washington to Mr. Joseph Howard, jun., in the office of the New York Times. But there are some who will believe it, and for the benefit of these I beg to say a few words in your paper concerning this matter of the treatment of Yankee prisoners by the Confederates.

It is not to be denied that much personal suffering is inevitable to the condition of prisoners of war. This is aggravated in the case of large bodies of men who for security must be kept at remote points, in climates different from their own, and carried to and fro with inadequate means of transportation. The prisoners of war taken by the Confederates have suffered much from the straitened circumstances of the Confederacy itself; many have died from climatic diseases; at times, the inmates of certain prison encampments have not been furnished with the proper allowance of food. But I deny that they have ever been treated worse than the soldiers of the Confederate army in the field, or that they have been compelled to endure any hardships or privations not actually incident to their position which a humane Government could have spared them. The Federal authorities, at the very outset of the struggle, in utter violation of all the usages of civilised warfare, made medicines and surgical instruments contraband of war, and the Confederate surgeons have therefore at times been without the means of alleviating the pangs of the sick and wounded. There have been seasons of great stress, also, when the armies of Generals Lee and Johnston have been without their rations of meat, and when, consequently, it was absolutely impossible to supply twenty thousand prisoners with the food they might very properly expect and demand. Dura necessitas, and nothing more. As for the rooms reeking with vermin, it will naturally occur to the intelligent reader that among the miscellaneous herd which composes the Federal army, colluvies omnium gentium, vermin are very apt to be generated, and five or ten thousand prisoners taken promiscuously from this army would carry the vermin with them wherever they might go. I reassert, then, that the sufferings of the Federal prisoners of war in the Confederacy, while greatly exaggerated, have been unavoidable. The same could not be said of Confederate prisoners in the United States. The bleakest points along the Northern frontier were selected for the prisons. At Camp Douglas, last winter, hundreds of men were frostbitten from the cruel exposure to which they were subjected, and many perished of the cold. At Jeffersonville, Indiana, opposite Louisville, Kentucky, on the Ohio River, a railway train, consisting entirely of open cars, built for the transportation of live stock, but filled with Confederate prisoners, was kept in waiting during a whole night of January, out of doors, when the mercury had fallen nearly to zero of Fahrenheit. In the morning nine dead bodies were taken from the train; and yet there was no lack of fuel, no deficiency of comfortable railway carriages in the United States.

It so happens that while Mr. Sala, who has never been in the Confederate States, thus readily adopts the story of Packer, and grows eloquent in his denunciation of Southern barbarity, other Englishmen, as observant and as intelligent as he, who have been in the Confederate States, have investigated for themselves this matter of cruelty towards Federal prisoners, and given willing testimony in behalf of Southern humanity. I might refer to Mr. S. Phillips Day, to an 'English Merchant,'* to 'A Lancashire Man in Richmond' (vide THE INDEX for May 12, 1864), to Colonel Fremantle and others; but as the photograph of the moribund occupant of the Libby Prison is embodied in Mr. Sala's letter, and as he evidently expects this hideous presentment to be accepted for irrefutable proof of the special cruelties practised in that establishment, I will simply ask leave, though not an Englishman, to speak thereupon from my own personal knowledge. The photograph is even less to be credited than Packer, for Packer may have been a prisoner in Georgia, but no such cadaverous Yankee ever went home from the Libby Prison. In the month of December last, in company with Mr. Lawley, the correspondent of the Times, I paid a visit to this prison, and was escorted through all its wards by Major Turner, the commandant. The major, who is represented by the Northern press to be a fiend incarnate, we found to be an amiable gentleman of about four-and-twenty, upon the best terms with the officers of highest rank under his charge. The condition of his prisoners was one, not of comfort merely, but of positive luxury. There were 1,100 of them, confined upon six lofts or stories, so that fewer than 200 were in the same apartment, which was, perhaps, 100 feet long by 40 in width. The rafters above their heads which were not hidden from view by ceiling, and the shelves around the walls, were hung or packed with everything in the way of provisions that

* Two Months in the Confederate States, including a Visit to New Orleans under the Domination of General Butler. By an English Merchant. London: Richard Bentley, New Burlington Street. 1863.

A single extract from this work will suffice upon the matter under discussion. The writer says:—'It should be said, that there never has been, and is not now, any distinction shown between friend and foe among the sick and wounded. Eye-witnesses assure me that all along, during those terrible days in June and July 1861, when M'Clellan and his 150,000 men were within five to ten miles of the city, and when the railway cars, ambulances, country wagons, and litters were pouring in thousands of wounded men daily, from the bloody "seven days" fight, no distinction was shown between friend and enemy. The hot coffee, iced water, lemonade, food, and other happily-selected luxuries, which every family daily prepared, and sent or took down to the depôts, were indifferently distributed to the man most in need. Every church was stripped of its carpets, cushions, and hassocks, to make pillows and mattresses, and have never been replaced; ladies laboured like Hood's poor sewing-girl, making lint, bandages, splinters; and the gentlemen and boys with their own hands lifted the fainting heads, eased the shattered limb, moistened the parched throat, or fed the craving mouth. But in all this, I am assured, Federal and Confederate fared alike.' (pp. 167–8–9.)

even Fortnum and Mason could supply. Sugar-cured hams of bacon, flitches of smoked beef, haunches of venison, sausages of Bologna, potted meats, cans of mushrooms, jars of jam and jellies, bottles of pale ale, and Worcester sauce, and other appetising comestibles were thus disposed of, while barrels of apples and boxes of lemons and oranges were to be seen in every corner. It was clear that the inmates of the Libby Prison were faring more sumptuously than the richest citizens of Richmond, not to say the members of the Confederate Cabinet. I do not mean to assert, of course, that these creature comforts were provided by the Confederate authorities. But the Confederate authorities permitted them to be sent from the North, and afforded the conveyance for them from City Point, and such permission would not have been granted by a Government disposed to treat its prisoners inhumanely. A few days after our visit to the Libby Prison, Mr. Lawley and myself went across the river to Belle Isle, under escort of Major Turner, to look at the prison encampment there. It was a fine frosty morning, with an unclouded sky and a keen wind blowing from the north, and in the eddies of the rapids crusts of ice had formed the night previous. Eleven thousand prisoners were then under guard on the island, all in tents. The sufferings of these men, supposing them to be the victims of inhumanity and neglect, would be greatest during the wintry season, and winter had fairly opened in all its rigour. And yet we saw nothing of suffering at all. A thousand fires sent up their blue columns of smoke into the clear atmosphere, and the distribution of fuel was going on as we walked around among the sentries. Each tent was furnished with its brick chimney, and was far more habitable than cabins I have seen in Perthshire and Tipperary. We inspected the bakery, and ate some of the bread prepared therein, which was of excellent quality. There was also a distribution of clothing going on, clothing which had been sent from the Quartermaster-General of the United States, but which the Confederate Government might have declined to bring had its temper towards the prisoners been such as has been represented. When the boxes of provisions from individual friends at the North, and the supplies of clothing from Washington, were first sent viâ City Point to Richmond, the Yankee journals, ever ready to publish some new slander against 'the rebels,' pretended that they never reached the parties for whom they were designed, but were stolen en route by the Confederate officers in charge. Such an accusation might well have justified the subsequent refusal on the part of the Government to forward similar supplies in future. But the Government adopted another course, wholly inconsistent with the idea of cruelty. The officers were instructed to require accurate certified lists of the articles intrusted to them to be furnished by the Federal agents at City Point, and the articles were handed over with the lists to a committee of Federal prisoners chosen from themselves, who gave proper receipts and personally superintended the delivery to the rightful recipients. Lieutenant Bossieux, who commanded on the island, informed us that the only real sufferings of the prisoners arose from their barbarity towards each other, and that the utmost vigilance was necessary to prevent theft and murder among them. When I looked into the faces of some of the scoundrels that glowered at us as we moved about the island, I confess I recognised the necessity of ruling such dangerous elements of character with something of severity.

So much, then, for the tales of horror that are unfolded to the people of England about the cruel treatment of Federal prisoners in the Confederacy, one of which tales Mr. Sala has thought proper to incorporate in his correspondence with the journal having 'the largest circulation in the world.' Were they all true—were the tortures inflicted upon the Federal prisoners worthy of being recited by a Dante rather than a Sala, the prisoners themselves (Packer included) should blame their own Government rather than the Confederates for their fate. Abraham Lincoln, and not Jefferson Davis, is responsible for the sacrifice of human life inseparable from the long confinement of thousands in Northern and Southern prisons. No one has more ardently desired the exchange of prisoners to go on uninterruptedly than President Davis. The correspondence between Commissioner Ould on the part of the Confederacy, and Messrs. Meredith and Mulford at various times on the part of the United States, will sufficiently show, the Federals themselves being judges, that no disposition has been wanting to the Confederate authorities to release all the prisoners in their hands on the basis of a just and honourable cartel. The Federal Government alone has been insensible to the cries of its soldiers, and would care little if every man now retained in Georgia, whose term of enlistment has expired, should die of the fever of the climate. General Sherman, who declined, in his correspondence with General Hood, to surrender Confederates for Federals no longer available as troops, fairly represented the insensibility of his Government in this matter.

Apologising for the length of this letter, I enclose my card, and remain very respectfully yours,

A Virginian.

Advance not Conquest.—Let it be supposed that Sherman continues his advance to Savannah or to Mobile. What shall the work of conquest have gained even by the success of such an adventurous movement? Simply an additional extent of the cutting and filling of a railroad track, and at the cost of a still more extensive system of detachment for holding its stockades. His line of advance won, garrisoned, held, what, after all, will have been accomplished towards Southern subjugation? He may fight his way up, and down, and across the great regions of the Confederacy, but it is utterly impossible to hold his line of movement after he shall have passed on. That we have no troops for a task so unheard of is plainly seen in the fact, that the accomplishment of his advance has already been effected by abandoning great breadths of territory that had been previously occupied.—New York Daily News.

LOUISIANA.

To the Editor of The Index.

The Yankee continues his schemes of fraud and plunder in New Orleans and the other portions of Louisiana which gunboats have enabled him to conquer and hold. General Hurlbut, Banks's successor, has imposed another forced loan upon the merchants, bankers, moneyed and eleemosynary corporations, and even widows and orphans possessing any means. The sum assessed amounts to over a quarter of a million dollars, and purports to be an assessment of 25 per cent. upon a fund subscribed by the inhabitants for the defence of the city in the spring of 1861. Two assessments of a like amount have already been made. Of course, the 'Major-General Commanding' seeks to base this authorised spoliation upon the very purest motives, and the legitimate authority of Government over 'armed treason.' Certainly! Butler, that 'cunningest pattern of excelling nature' in the rôle of Verres, did the same, and Banks and Hurlbut are but feeble imitators of the Beast. The assessment then, as now, was for the support of the poor. But to what uses the philanthropic Butler appropriated it can easily be imagined by all acquainted with his contempt for the goods of this world. General Hurlbut is said to be a gentleman, and perhaps his Carolina breeding may have kept him pure amid the grovelling meanness of his 'hoosier' home in Illinois. But his personal probity cannot excuse the spoliation of the few in New Orleans still comparatively wealthy for the support of vagrant contrabands and families of Federal soldiers, particularly when we are now told that a large portion of the State has returned to 'its allegiance,' and when a 'loyal legislature' is in session in New Orleans electing senators to the United States Congress, and preparing to cast the vote of the State for Abraham Lincoln. If the city be so loyal, if its inhabitants have returned to 'their allegiance —and thousands have, under the pressure of circumstances, taken the oath of allegiance—what excuse can be given for forced loans, and the innumerable other exactions imposed by the military authorities? It is evident that the armed occupation of New Orleans is solely for spoliation and subjugation, that the conqueror distrusts the submission of the vanquished, and that the forms of civil government which have been introduced are but new engines of oppression. The civil is the creature of the military power, and was instituted solely for the aggrandisement of a horde of needy, corrupt, and purchasable adventurers, who have become the pliant tools of Abraham Lincoln in his schemes against the liberties of his country. You will perceive from the list which I send you that this new forced loan presses very heavily upon some of the noblest charities of the Crescent city. The McDonough School Fund is assessed $35,000, and the Fink Asylum Fund $13,750; besides, the banks and other moneyed corporations are very heavily assessed, which of course diminishes greatly the incomes of many widows and orphans. I also observe in the list the name of the Prussian Consul, John Krullscneidt, who is assessed $5,000. Many others, too, who are the victims of this authorised robbery, are foreign subjects as well as M. Krullscneidt. In reference to the election of senators to the Yankee Congress, I subjoin the following extract from a letter just received from a friend in one of the Northern cities:—

A friend has just written me from New Orleans, respecting the character of the so-called 'senators' elected (two) from 'Louisiana' in place of Messrs. Benjamin and Slidell. I shall not soil my letter with their names, but you will find them in the daily papers. One of these men ('senators') was entirely unknown in New Orleans—that is, to the citizens proper. Hailing as a carpenter from one of the plantations of the State, he was elected to the 'Legislature' on board a United States gunboat, and out of that Legislature he was sent to represent the State of Louisiana at Washington! The other 'senator' stands on the criminal record of Illinois as a fugitive from justice—a counterfeiter and black-leg of the lowest type. Such are the 'senators from Louisiana' to the next Lincoln Congress. That they will fitly represent the hirelings who sent them thither there can be no question, but there's not an old resident of the Creole State who will not bitterly feel the degradation.

I remain, &c.,

Louisianian.

THE YANKEE MILLENNIUM.

The following is from the Richmond Examiner of October 14:—

Future historians of America will pause to dwell with incredulous amazement upon the fact that, in this fourth year of the great war, certain parties in the North country proposed, for solution of their troubles, a 'convention of all the States;' and, further, that one, nay two, statesmen of the South received such project with favour, and recommended its adoption—as if, in the midst of the Third Punic War, some maniac had proposed to settle the matter by a report of a joint committee of the Senate of Carthage and of Rome. The perplexed historians will strive to account for this phenomenon, and explain it away or make light of it; but all in vain. There stands the record—a great party at the North, lately the dominant party, and hoping soon to be dominant again, being assembled at Chicago, do solemnly announce that, war having failed to subjugate the South, a convention shall be called of all the States, North and South, to settle their little differences! Let future ages make a note of that, and account for it as posterity pleases. . . . . .

A Southern man, Mr. Stephens, Vice-President of the Confederate States, gives, or seems to give, his assent to the monstrous proposal. 'To such a convention of the States I should have no objection, as a peaceful conference and interchange of views between equal and sovereign States.' Mr. Stephens, however, probably thinks it wise, with some politic view or other, to encourage the idea, knowing the thing to be impossible. Perhaps he supposes that the apparent reception and entertainment of the suggestion at the South might act favourably on the efforts of the Democratic party—that is, the peace party—at the North.

Possibly the same explanation may account for the letter of Mr. Boyce, of South Carolina, to the President, wherein he most warmly urges, or seems to urge, the President to meet this action of the Chicago Convention 'by declaring his willingness for an armistice and convention of all the States,' &c. 'I think,' says Mr. Boyce, 'that action (namely, the action of the Chicago meeting) demands a favourable response from our Government.' And the honourable gentleman carries the joke so far, in his artful design of encouraging Yankee Peace men, as to affect a kind of enthusiasm for their noble idea of a convention. 'Imagine,' he cries, 'this grand council of the States in the act of convening, after the people everywhere in peaceful possession of their right to elect their ambassadors had done so. What a sublime spectacle! There would be nothing to compare with it in moral grandeur in ancient or modern times,' &c.

Well, imagine it. Let us also try to conceive, if the human imagination can, this proposed august convocation. A very vast 'wigwam,' huger than the Colosseum, is erected with circling tiers of seats for myriads of spectators—for it is to be a highly imposing assembly; never was the like 'in all creation' (a Yankee boast which this time will be true); and as we have astonished mankind by our war, so we are to dazzle them by a peace which shall be the envy and despair of all nations. Of course there will be a mighty throng of ladies from the several States; for none have a deeper interest in the result, nor a more legitimate curiosity to behold so many men of immortal names assembled on the grandest occasion in history—up to this date.

The solemn assemblage, pregnant with the destiny of a hemisphere, is opened. The heart of the vast multitude beats high, and its breath comes quick as the delegates enter. Arrive the representatives of South Carolina; they take their seats, with courteous greeting, beside the honourable gentlemen from Massachusetts, and the Bay State has, of course, sent her greatest men. There sits Banks, late Commanding General at New Orleans, in civil attire; for all swords are sheathed or turned into ploughshares or steel pens. At sight of him, perhaps, one of our Louisiana delegates cannot but think sadly of his house and plantation sacked and burned on Red River, and his children shipped off and landed, houseless refugees on the bare strand of Pascagoula, by order of that Banks; but he represses such thoughts; they must not be indulged on this joyful day, for this, look you, is a day of peace on earth and goodwill unto man.

On the same bench you recognise also the calm, statesman-like visage of Sumner, who formerly, in the bitterness of his heart and the soreness of his head, termed us Southerners the 'sum-total of all barbarism'—he is all smiles to-day as he looks on his Southern brethren, for he says within himself, 'Now I know that the Lord hath delivered them into my hands.' Behold, also, the lofty brow of mellifluous Everett, who conjured the very old women of Massachusetts, if they could do no better, to stab us with their knitting-needles; and Benjamin Butler, whose wholesome discipline tamed the spirit of the New Orleans women, and put a bit between the teeth of the clergymen of Norfolk.

And now all eyes are eagerly bent to gaze, as through another door file in the proud Virginians, holding their heads somewhat high at first, but soon they look more humble, when they find their allotted chairs beside the representatives of 'Pierpont' Virginia (for this, you remember, is a convention of all the 'States'). Dr. Bucker and General Hunter politely greet the gentlemen from the eastern fragment of the Old Dominion; and as the last-named commanding general is announced, there is a movement among the Virginia ladies in the auditory; they begin to inspect curiously, through lorgnettes, the jewelry which graces the arms and necks of the fair daughters of New England, seated near by, and fancy that they recognise certain chains and bracelets. Some may even shiver and shudder, and hardly suppress a sob, when they see the man who burned their houses over their heads, and can almost fancy they hear again the roar of the flames bringing their roof-tree crashing down upon the hearth.

Delegates from Hahn's new 'State' of Louisiana (some of them coloured gentlemen) fraternally meet planters from the 'coast,' whose plantations have been leased to Yankee agriculturists. As Ohio representatives take their seats, spectators from Tennessee perhaps think upon John Morgan and his staff, with their heads cropped, in the prison dress of the penitentiary. Not a Northern delegate who enters but calls up to some Georgian or North Carolinian spectator the memory of desolated homes and murder-shrieks rising from burning towns, and the wail of violated virgins tearing their hair, until, by the time the Convention is called to order, the whole atmosphere seems laden with curses and lamentations, and the moan of a hundred thousand ghosts crying aloud for vengeance.

Then the parson rises to open the proceedings with prayer. But it is best to stop here, lest we verge on blasphemy—for what form of prayer will serve his turn?

on no sounder foundation than the exultation of foes. We do not wish to disguise the serious nature of so great a change in the social fabric of any country as this implies in the South. Were that fabric purely artificial or essentially vicious in its construction, we should tremble for the result of so severe a test. But we have never hesitated to express our firm conviction that the relation of the inferior to the dominant race in the Confederate States has not its origin or reason in municipal laws, but in a decree of nature. If we are right in this—and our conviction springs from no mere theory—then no change which does not violently invert the habitual and natural positions of the protector and the protected, can be attended by such dangers as to be beyond the control of humane and judicious legislation. In other words, the emancipated slave who earns his freedom by loyal service to the country and the master who trusted him is a very different being, and occupies a very different place in the scale of civilisation, from the mere tool of a foreign enemy employed in crimes against common humanity. The danger, if danger there is, is the negro's, not the white man's. Negro slavery in the South—and we mean no other form of the system—odious as the very name of slavery is to European ears, vilified and slandered as it has been by both honest and dishonest fanaticism, is in solemn truth an institution in which the black man has a nearer interest than the white man. The white man everywhere can prosper without it; it is yet an unsolved problem whether the black man can. Our anxiety is the same as that with which we would see children and the physically or mentally feeble adult thrown upon their own unaided resources. It is never remembered by European theorisers that, though it may be agreeable to have no human master, it may be better to have one, almost inevitably from the nature of circumstances belonging to a cultivated class, as the negro has in the South, than to have a whole community for a master and be everybody's slave, as the negro is in the North. It is painful to us, moreover, to think of the negro, with so much that is good and amiable in his weakness, made the innocent victim of the sanguinary quarrels of a stronger race. We know that this consideration has been the main cause of Southern hesitation; but as the North has forced the necessity upon the South, and as the philanthropy of the civilised world so wills it, the African blood already shed and to be shed in this war will not be on the heads of the Southern people. And while we would not lightly or wantonly advise such an expedient as this to which the South in self-defence may resort, we rest our hopes of the future upon the large strides which the Southern negro, in fifty years of Southern tutelage, has made upon the African savage or even his enfranchised brother of Federal and British America. These hopes are confirmed by the consistency with which as a race he has during the last four years withstood temptations which might have shaken the fidelity of a colder heart coupled with a hotter brain than his. If any population of negroes can make good use of freedom, it must assuredly be that of the Confederate States, affording by the unanimous verdict of the world the best physical, moral, and intellectual types of their race.

No unprejudiced man of intelligence will doubt that the Southern slave will fight for and with his master, or that on those conditions he will fight well. For the rest, the solutions of the new problems which the new contingencies will propound, we have an abiding confidence in the wisdom of a Christian community of Southern men and women, familiarly acquainted with the character and capacity of the negro, and kindly disposed to him. Above all, we trust to the merciful designs of that All-wise Providence which 'shapes our ends, roughhew them as we may.'

A Model Vice-President.

THE election of a President and Vice-President of the United States for four years from the 4th of March next was doubtless made the day before yesterday, or, more properly speaking, electors were then chosen whose recorded votes in the Electoral College shall determine the rule of the land for that period of time in the future. It may be regarded as almost a certainty that the victory was with the Republicans, and that ABRAHAM LINCOLN has been given a new lease of office wherein to perfect what he has so well begun, and pushed already so nearly to completion—the ruin of his country. Assuming that such is the fact, it is not precisely accurate to say that no change has been effected in the Administration, for a new Vice-President comes into office. HANNIBAL HAMLIN gives place to ANDY JOHNSON. It may be expressed in the language of the stage directions: 'Scene—Same as the preceding. Exit Countryman—Enter Fool.'

The office of Vice-President, under the Constitution of the United States, is as unimportant, while the President yet survives, as can well be conceived. Mr. HAMLIN has had as small a quantity of work on his hands during the last four years as the statue of Liberty that surmounts the dome of the Capitol at Washington. His is not so graceful or so imposing a figure as that displayed by this highly respectable goddess, nor are his attitudes in the chair of the Senate at once so full of ease and dignity as the pose which the sculptor has given to his lofty creation. But while the business of Liberty is to stand (far above the reach of the multitude and out of the atmosphere of Washington, indeed), the business of the Vice-President is to sit, and to do little else. Mr. HAMLIN, we believe, did constitute himself the usher to Miss ANNA DICKINSON, when she expounded in the Capitol, like a Republican Pythoness or a Connecticut Corinne, the doctrines of miscegenation; but this was a voluntary service in no way connected with his office, nor can we suppose that ANDY JOHNSON will consider himself under any obligation to succeed him in its performance, should ANNA again recite her wild improvisations on that august stage.

Considering the insignificant rôle of the Vice-President in the chair of the Senate, where the Anthropoglossos would execute his functions quite as well, it would seem, indeed, a matter of very little moment who was chosen for the office. There would appear to be a certain fitness, it is true, in selecting some one of similar tastes and character with the President himself; and when we remember that ANDY JOHNSON is altogether as vulgar, as ignorant, and as uncouth as ABRAHAM LINCOLN, the choice would impress us as a happy one. But we must not forget that the Vice-President may become at any moment the most important man in the Republic. Let death, or the Confederate cavalry, carry off the Chief Magistrate, and he instantly succeeds to the first authority—his policy becomes the policy of the Government, and his hands dispense the overgrown patronage of the Federal head. Here, again, we discern a perfect harmony between the candidates of the Republican party. The policy of LINCOLN would be the policy of JOHNSON, and it is in this consideration that the election of the latter as Vice-President assumes a grave significance that cannot be overlooked. They would differ from each other only in their style. ABRAHAM is jocose as a tyrant, ANDY would be grim. The one would send a 'rebel' to the scaffold as quickly as the other; only he might spare the victim his 'little joke' on the way to execution. It would be only the difference between Jean qui rit and Jean qui pleut. And this is not much after all.

If any gain is secured by the transfer of ANDY JOHNSON to the office of Vice-President, that gain will be to the unhappy people of Tennessee who yet remain within the lines of the Federal armies, since it is next to impossible that they can be oppressed by another military governor as ruthless and tyrannical as he. Demagogue by nature, endowed with just that amount of talent which enables a man in a State where universal suffrage prevails to get into office by flattering the mob, the ci-devant journeyman tailor was remarkable in the Congress of the United States for his professions of loyalty to his State and her institutions, and clamoured as loudly for territorial rights as he now does for the supremacy of the Union. It was natural that when he was invested with arbitrary rule under a military despotism, he should play the tyrant over the multitude he had once courted, and as a tailor in office he should hector the better men that despised him. When we applied to him the title of 'fool,' it was only in a dramatic sense, in respect of his lack of moral presence, and not by any means in disparagement of his ability or astuteness which we clearly enough recognise. It was a clever stroke, indeed, by which he forestalled the vote of Tennessee in the election, illegal at best, by the employment of the test oath, and LINCOLN was not wanting in nous to decline interfering with its beneficent operation. LINCOLN'S only fault was in not committing the answer to the 'Loyal Tennesseans' to SEWARD; but unquestionably he was right in refusing to nullify ANDY'S action in the premises. Practically the test oath amounts to just nothing at all, for the only voters in Tennessee are of the class of camp followers and dependents upon the Government, and the State is not in the Union nor of it. We can only wonder that a show of opposition could be made among ANDY JOHNSON'S subjects to the Republican party. But the end is not yet. If it shall appear that the people of the Northern States submit passively to this farce of a vote in Tennessee, and shall have reelected, by their suffrages, voluntary or under compulsion, the usurper of their constitutional rights, then, indeed, shall we be furnished with another illustration of the truth of BOLINGBROKE'S language, in his 'Idea of a Patriot King.'

If a people is growing corrupt, there is no need of capacity to contrive, nor of insinuation to gain, nor of plausibility to seduce, nor of eloquence to persuade, nor of authority to impose, nor of courage to attempt. The most incapable, awkward, ungracious, shocking, profligate, and timorous wretches, invested with power, and masters of the purse, will be sufficient for the work when the people are complices in it. Luxury is rapacious; let them feed it; the more it is fed the more profuse it will grow. Want is the consequence of profusion, venality of want, and dependence of venality. By this progression the first men of a nation will become the pensioners of the least; and he who has talents the most implicit tool to him who has none.

The Social Position of the English Clergy.

THE career of the clergy in modern Europe has been more chequered than that of any other class or society of men. A prolonged struggle in which the energy of individuals and the force of coalition triumphed over emperors and kings, military chieftains and standing armies, placed the Church above the law, and caused the temporal powers to tremble at the thunders of the spiritual arm. Not only did the genius of HILDEBRAND and the traditional glory of less ambitious Popes reduce all principalities and dominions within the majesty of the head of the Church, but in the several kingdoms of Europe the offices of state were splendidly exercised by the ecclesiastical hierarchy. When shaken by war or crushed by popular fury, the Church, on the Continent, with tenacious vitality, had risen to reassert her nobility. In the northern counties of England the Bishop of Durham enjoyed Palatinate rights, and maintained an army and navy. Every duty and every independent action of life became subject to archiepiscopal control. Marriage and divorce, the probate of wills, the administration of personal property, the whole province of the Court of Chancery, had fallen under the ecclesiastical authority. The offices of state had been superadded to the judicial functions. In WOLSEY the combination of spiritual and temporal magnificence attained its climax. With the Reformation and its changes, doctrinal and political, the laity regained their lost supremacy, and the condition of the clergy sank gradually but surely. Perhaps the pen of Lord MACAULAY painted their deepest degradation. To furnish a source of pride to an illiterate squire, boasting that his household had its chaplain to say grace, and fancying that thereby he had rivalled the pretensions of the lord-lieutenant, to eat of the corn-beef seated at the extremity of the hall, to decline with scrupulous care both pasty and sweetmeat, to look upon a lady's maid as a suitable partner in life, and to aspire to the hand of a housekeeper of tarnished reputation—this was the lot of the country curate in the eighteenth century. Partly owing to the diffusion of education and more liberal ideas among the laity, and partly to the zeal displayed by the awakened vigilance of the Ministry, the clergy have risen enormously in the social scale during the last seventy years.

> Nunc, positis novus exuviis, nitidusque juventa,
> Lubrica convolvit, sublato pectore, terga,
> Arduus ad solem, et linguis micat ore, trisulcis.

Their advance was at once rapid and real. The name of parson, in the place of recalling niggardly tithes and ragged cassocks, became a passport not only of respectability but even of refinement. The rise in the value of land caused the income of the Church to spring up with elasticity. The wealth of the episcopal sees, deaneries, and cathedral estates presented prizes worthy of arduous competition, while the reform in the tithe law rendered the position of the country rector enviable in a high degree. The consequence of these changes was that the most brilliant intellects and the most elegant minds of the great seats of learning were enlisted under the banners of the Church, and it seemed that though the days of political supremacy had ceased yet the social grandeur of the priesthood was renewed.

A sudden but unmistakable change has come over the condition of affairs. Statistics plainly indicate that Oxford and Cambridge do not contribute their ancient quota to the candidates for ordination, while the want is supplemented by a host of men not of inferior talent to their fellows, but of a different social status. The bishops give the cry, and the examining chaplains reecho it. Again, of the candidates supplied by Oxford and Cambridge but few have attained to high academical honours, while the bar, the educational profession, the Government offices, and even the counting-houses attract wranglers, and first-class men in abundance. Pamphleteers, newspapers, and clerical orators have acknowledged the truth, and enquired the cause. The Bishop of OXFORD has added the weight of his opinion, and the fact stands beyond controversy even though the reason or the remedy may be matter of speculation. 'Our Church,' said that distinguished prelate, whose speech we reported last week, 'is an exceedingly poor Church, if the income be divided among teachers. If divided head by head among the existing clergy, it would come to a maximum of 200*l.* a year to each. In withholding the support needed, you depress the class from which you gather your clergymen to the class who look upon 200*l.* a year as a prize, instead of the class who look upon it as starvation. This is what has been practically done in France. There is not one in a thousand educated for the ministry of the Church of France, who does not come from the low peasant class of the community.' The argument is sufficiently convincing; but the question is, in what respect the income of the Church has been changed from the condition under which the wisest and best men were attracted. The bulk is not diminished. On the contrary, it is far greater than it was twenty years ago. Not only has land risen in value, but modern legislation has so far affected the tenures of episcopal and capitular estates as to increase the rents and profits in a high degree. The Bishop of Oxford does not overlook the point. He recalls Sydney Smith's parable of the heap of dirt. Bury under the heap a round sum of money. Hundreds will help to remove your heap, in the hope of being the lucky finder of the treasure. The Church of England is paid on the lottery principle. Every French soldier carries the marshal's bâton in his knapsack, and every deacon has a chance of being Archbishop of Canterbury. But the curates are removing the heap of dirt, while the lump of money has no existence. It has been taken away, and its place is not supplemented. There lies the whole secret of the case. A profession may have a thousand members existing in starvation. The odds against success may be as a thousand to one. Once make the one fortunate man truly enviable, and the intellect of the world will compete for the prize. That was the idea of our forefathers. Load with wealth, power, and patronage the man at the top of the ladder, and the first round will be thronged with climbers. But now-a-days spiritual peers are reduced to a mere competence, deans can only be respectable, and sinecure rectors have collapsed. Some hundreds of priests, who once had 100*l.* per annum, now enjoy the magnificent income of 200*l.* per annum, and reformers boldly ask the talents of the age to compete for such a pittance. The Bishop of Oxford says, 'Look how every profession is paying its members.' In point of fact the gross income of the Bar is not greater than that of the Church, but the method of reward is 'to give to him that hath.' There are splendid prizes, the chances are tolerably equal, and competitors come in myriads.

It is not to be imagined that the spurious system of reform to which the Church has been subjected has fallen on the clergy only. The false liberalism has permeated the whole body politic. The system of distributing prize-money in the army and navy aptly illustrates the practice. In the old European war men were pressed and conscripted in such a fashion that many a fat easy-going citizen dreamed uneasily of bayonets and heard in his sleep the thunder of the guns of Bonaparte. Soldiers and sailors were badly paid, badly clothed, badly fed. The ploughboy believed in his own fireside, and looked askance at the sergeant, his ribands, and his shilling. The fisherman trembled as he heard the press-gang on their rounds. But at times some lad of the village, with a scar, it might be, or wasted cheek-bones, appeared. He bore, however, gold, prize-money, his share of some big merchantman which Cochrane had cut out on a dark night from under the guns of the convoy. The news spread, and boys of bold enterprise were moved to think that their luck might be equal to that of the sick sailor. Then again, any act of desperate valour would enlist a hundred hands; neither officers nor men were wanting when thousands of pounds were within reach. A 20-gun tortoise contemplated the destruction of a line-of-battle ship, and cannon in position dwindled into popguns. Now-a-days it is equitable and in harmony with the spirit of progress to divide the fruits of an exploit among a fleet; each sailor receives his 30*s.*, and no distinction is drawn between the desperate valour of a night attack and the tranquil repose of the Admiral's ship. Who will face death in ten thousand forms when success finds a just compensation in the receipt of a few shillings and a silver medal, and when the leader of the assaulting column shares his booty with the commander of the depot? The Bishop of Oxford is right. The curates are removing the heap of dirt, but the lump of treasure is withdrawn.

If the ox is muzzled, it is idle to expect that he will tread out the corn. Men of high education, brilliant talents, and refined manners will refuse to admit the influence of a boorish clergy. The poor and ignorant may teach the gospel to their fellows with unbounded success, but the Bishop of Oxford knows well that wisdom must appeal to intelligence. As he justly observes, something must be added to the wealth and endowments of the Church to prevent the clergy from sinking to that lower level. We fear that the operation is impossible. But it is not the less a duty to point out the consequences of a misguided policy.

THE SERIALS FOR NOVEMBER.*

The Cornhill leads off with 'Armadale,' a new novel by Wilkie Collins. The etching which appears at the head of the story is painfully suggestive of the character of the plot and narrative. Sensational is scarcely the proper epithet. The Archbishop of York must have been presented with the proof-sheets of this latest example of the modern novel before he delivered his patriarchal invective against the modern phase of storytelling. In the frontispiece appears a group that is almost appalling—a gaunt positive Scotchman feeling emotion for the first time in his life; a comfortable German physician with a benignant and simple look; a lady in the last stage of distraction; a man of middle age already in the grasp of death, the miserable victim of the most acute mental and bodily agony, with eyes starting from their sockets, hollow cheeks, and transparent hands; lastly, a young child, who, in jovial ignorance of the tragedy, wheels his toy of horse and rider along the chest of the dying man. In the drama there are two Allen Armadales, one of whom supplants the other in the possession of half Barbadoes, while the latter plays Jacob in respect of the betrothed of the former. Allen Armadale No. 1. murders Allen Armadale No. 2 The murdered man leaves a posthumous child bearing his father's name. The murderer has also a son, Allen Armadale, and the dream of the murderer confessing his crime on his deathbed is that in the second generation hatred ending in mutual destruction will rage between the two Armadales. 'I believed in destiny then; I believe in destiny now,' is the cry of the dying murderer—an idea on which every one of the class of novels which came under the archiepiscopal denunciation has been made to turn.

'Colonel Gordon's Exploits in China' is a fair sketch of the formation of the native force, which, having failed under those accomplished scoundrels Ward and Burgevine, proved under Gordon what results may be obtained by drill and leadership from miserable material. Gordon saved the Imperial Government from the Taepings, yet without prejudice to the authority of Pekin. Perhaps to a weak executive the risk from a friend is greater than the peril from a foe, and a careful perusal of the official history of the Sherard Osborne expedition will demonstrate how narrowly China has escaped the fate or the fortune of India. The description given of Gordon's fleet is highly entertaining, and recalls the devices and desperate enterprises of cotton-clad gunboats in American waters.

> The two little vessels which formed his inland navy, named the Hyson and the Firefly, had been originally built as towboats, for the use of American firms at Shanghai; and in appearance seemed the most unfit of all imaginable craft for warlike purposes. Though differing slightly from each other, a description of one will serve for both these vessels. The Hyson was about eighty feet in length, by some sixteen feet breadth of beam. Drawing barely three feet of water, she was enabled to penetrate the most shallow lakes and canals; and, carrying a 32-pounder bow-gun, with a 24-pounder howitzer overlooking the stern, she fully justified the terror which her appearance excited wherever she threatened the rebels. With the exception of a few planks carried up laterally for some feet fore and aft of her paddle-boxes, she was utterly innocent of bulwarks; and could she have been reached by a raking fire of grape, a shot in the unprotected boiler, or an explosive missile in her captain's sleeping-den in the hold, which was made use of as the powder magazine, the career of the Hyson and her crew might at any moment have been cut short. Her undaunted captain, however, an Irishman named Davidson—a man far more capable of fighting a battle against enormous odds than of subsequently penning a report of his victory, but utterly inaccessible to the bribes which were frequently offered him as the price of desertion with his vessel—handled this curious little war-ship with such daring and discretion, that the mere sight of the smoke from her funnel was sufficient to put to flight a rebel army; whilst in action the execution done by her limited but well-served battery was probably greater than it has fallen to the share of any two single guns to achieve. In addition to the commander Davidson, only two Europeans, a mate and an engineer, were employed on board. The crew, including a squad of gunners, commanded by a Chinese of extraordinary gallantry, who had been advanced to the grade of lieutenant, were all natives; but it not unfrequently happened that the Hyson or the Firefly, was made the headquarters of Gordon himself in action, and on such occasions his 'snake-banner,' a peculiar battle-flag or streamer, forming the insignia of Chinese commanders in the field, might always be seen waving in the prow.

From the 'Scottish Farm Labourer' we shall quote one paragraph:—

> The servants, male and female, in bothy districts, have long been hired at what are called 'Feeing Markets,' or 'Hiring Fairs,' and nothing can be more calculated to lower the moral position of the agricultural labourer than these degrading exhibitions. Upon the hiring day, nearly the whole rural population flock to the 'market.' Great numbers give up their places for no other purpose than to obtain the holiday. Assembled in the county town, they crowd its principal street, packed up in one dense and promiscuous mass, and there remain, like the men in the parable, 'idle in the market-place, waiting to be hired.' No attempt is made to enquire into character, and the labourers who thus exhibit themselves, like oxen, are judged like oxen by their physical appearance only. The long day done, the thoughtless lads and lasses compensate themselves for the tedium of the morning by evening orgies, which many of the women at least may have lifelong cause to regret.

These 'Hiring Fairs' are not confined to Scotland. They flourish in Monmouthshire, and are found at Reading within thirty minutes' journey from the metropolis. The manner in which the muscular development, stout arms, and ruddy cheeks of the dairymaids designate are handled and criticised, would warm the heart of Mrs. Beecher Stowe.

Blackwood is perhaps the best of the magazines under notice. 'Banting on Corpulence' is excellent, and the article on General M'Clellan is at the present moment of supreme interest. Mr. Banting resembles Marius. He has been elevated to the pinnacle of glory to be cast into the depths of reprobation.

> Quid illo cive tulisset
> Natura in terris quid Roma beatius unquam?

He had made the discovery of the age. Galileo was a trifler to him. What reward was too high for the man who had abolished 'walking backwards downstairs,' and had for ever silenced the mocking jeers of the gamins de Londres? Now poor Banting is the laughter of daily journals and the scorn of grave magazines. Because, with noble devotion to the public good, Mr. Banting admitted a predilection for buttered toast, beer, and pastry, pleaded guilty to four meals a day, and the trick of sliding into arm-chairs, nothing is bad enough for him.

> Exilium et carcer Minturnarumque paludes.

Mr. Banting condemned farinaceous food as unwholesome. He was, beyond all doubt, wrong. The greatest of living warriors has defied M'Clellan, and Meade, and Grant, on farinaceous food. But in refutation of the theorist it was scarcely necessary to galvanise into life the miller of Billericay, who arrived at Herculean strength and Tithonian age by the diet of a simple pudding made by boiling coarse flour in water without salt. The hero of the article is M. Brillat-Savarin, plagiarised shamefully by Mr. Banting. The author of the 'Physiologie du Goût' is an unpleasant person. He divides the human race into those who die of consumption and those who degenerate into fatty monstrosities. Persons with brown hair, a long face, and a sharp nose, fall victims to one malady, men with round eyes and short noses, and dear little creatures with dimpled cheeks and pert noses, all fresh and blooming, to the other. After all, Mr. Banting was not a fat man; his greatest weight was but 202 lbs., a ponderosity which has been held indispensable in archbishops and law lords. Probably, however, Mr. Banting was fat enough not to have run any risk of being a Jack Sheppard. On this point the article is decidedly great, and the following passage may be recommended to the lawyers of the Old Bailey:—

> It is a notable fact in criminal statistics that no fat man was ever convicted of the crime of murder. Stout people are not revengeful; nor, as a general rule, are they agitated by gusts of passion. Few murderers weigh more than ten stone. There are, however, exceptions, which justify us in assuming eleven as the utmost limit of the sliding-scale, but beyond that there is no impulse towards homicide. Seldom has such a phenomenon as a fat housebreaker been paraded at a criminal bar. It is your lean, wiry fellow who works with the skeleton-keys, forces himself through closet-windows which seemingly would scarce suffice for the entrance of the necessary cat, steals with noiseless step along the lobby and up the stairs, glides into the chamber sacred for more than half a century to the chaste repose of the gentle Tabitha, and with husky voice, and the exhibition of an enormous carving-knife, commands silence on pain of instant death, and delivery of her cash and jewels. It is your attenuated thief who insinuates himself under beds, skulks behind counters, dives into tills, or makes prey of articles of commerce arrayed at shop-doors for the temptation of the credulous passenger. A corpulent burglar is as much out of place and as little to be feared as was Falstaff at Gadshill—and what policeman ever yet gave chase to a depredator as bulky as a bullock? Corpulence, we maintain, is the outward sign not only of a good constitution, but of inward rectitude and virtue.

The New York World would have embraced with rapturous ardour the panegyrist of 'Little Mac' if the New York public could only have read and digested Blackwood on General M'Clellan before November 8, 1864. There is no doubt that the report of the Federal general derives additional merit from the justification, by events which are now historical, of the military plans and political objects therein detailed. The question asked, 'Shall we crush the rebellion at one blow, terminate the war in one campaign; or shall we leave it as a legacy to our descendants?' shows that one man north of 'Mason and Dixie's line' conceived the magnitude of the situation, and was above the 'ninety days' humbug of Stanton. M'Clellan also strongly advised the protection of private property and unarmed persons, with kindness to private soldiers; and here also he showed himself a prudent man. Doubtless, too, some portion of his failures is to be attributed to the ridiculous caprice and envy of the Washington politicians, and the 'Neglee' correspondence has exposed the villany of Stanton, who, within an hour, wrote the foulest libels of and the most devoted letters to the general of the army of the Potomac. But M'Clellan had the grave fault of concealing or disparaging the numbers of his own men and magnifying the Confederate forces. He is welcome to the alternative. If he, being attacked by 30,000 men, chose to declare that his foe was 100,000 strong, then he either lied with Pope, Butler, and the inimitable Stanton, or he was beyond measure defective in one of the most important characteristics of a general. The article blames him for his fault, but sins equally with the object of its censure. To take, for instance, the battle of Sharpsburg, which the Yankees call the battle of Antietam. M'Clellan estimates Lee's army at 97,445 and the Federal army at 87,164. The article gives to Lee 70,000. M'Clellan admits that at Antietam he lost 12,000 men. Besides these, Hooker's command, 6,000 strong, actually abandoned the field. In other words, the hero of Antietam won what the Federals called a victory at the expense of 20,000 men. But what if General Lee had but half the men estimated by the article? what if his whole army did not exceed 35,000 men, as indeed was the fact? Then are not two things demonstrated—first, that M'Clellan boasted equally with Pope; second, that the Confederates achieved a triumph almost unparalleled in modern warfare? Indeed, when the true history of this war is written, the world will be amazed at the disparity of numbers in the earlier struggles; and now also, though the North has gone mad on the repulse of

* The Cornhill Magazine—Blackwood's Magazine—Fraser's Magazine—Macmillan's Magazine.

Early by Sheridan on the Winchester Pike, it is placed beyond doubt by the evidence of the Richmond correspondent of the Times that Early had orders to stop Sheridan at all hazards, though the Federal army was 35,000 strong, and Early had but a handful of 12,000 men. We will not quarrel with the article, which is on the whole accurate, for imagining that Seven Pines and Fair Oaks were different battles—the fact being that to a place called Seven Pines the Yankees, with their perverse skill in nomenclature, gave the name of Fair Oaks. The political considerations are at least well weighed, and the criticism of M'Clellan's letter of acceptance to the Chicago Convention is most just. 'The advocates of peace,' says the article, 'were silenced (i.e. by the turn of military events), and M'Clellan made that declaration of war principles which, while it was so ill-timed as to deprive his course of all appearance of independence, was also so ill-judged as to alienate from him the strength of his party.'

'Cornelius O'Dowd' has a turn at the new Italian Convention, and tries his hand at the defence of the Irish Viceroyalty. Blackwood has also a review of 'Enoch Arden,' and a 'Vacation Excursion' in that corner of the Alps where Austria and Bavaria meet.

Fraser is not particularly attractive. Dr. Pusey and the Court of Appeal will perhaps draw some attention. Dr. Pusey is roughly handled by his critic, who is more happy when he talks on his own account than when he is censuring Dr. Pusey for the use of language from which he himself assuredly does not abstain. The points discussed are the famous propositions that every clergyman of the Church of England is not strictly bound to affirm (1) that every part of every book of Holy Scripture was written under the inspiration of the Holy Spirit, and is the Word of God; (2) that it is impious or heretical to entertain or express a hope that even the ultimate pardon of the wicked who are condemned in the Day of Judgment may be consistent with the will of Almighty God. The question on the first proposition is evaded and not solved by the suggestion of Dr. Pusey that the words of the Lord Chancellor's decision might be satisfied by proof that a genealogy was spurious. This is of course only advanced by way of a feeler by Dr. Pusey, but the critic falls into the trap. The real point is the nature or definition of inspiration. As the article observes, Usher or Calvin gives a meaning different to that found in Hey's Lectures; Warburton and Tillotson differ from Dr. Chalmers; and it may be added, Dr. Wordsworth differs from Dr. Rowland Williams, the two representing perhaps the notions most distant, yet each holding that Scripture is inspired. Even between such divines as these the question might possibly turn on the degree of inspiration, and the latter divine would perhaps institute comparisons favourable to his view between the Book of Ecclesiastes and the sublime images of 'Paradise Lost.' On the doctrine of the eternity of the punishment a portion of the language employed may be quoted:—

Considering what a doctrine the doctrine in question is if true, the space which it fills in the New Testament is so small, that it is impossible to believe that it occupied in the minds of the writers the position which Dr. Pusey assigns to it. Our Lord speaks of a judgment to come; of rewards and punishments according to the good and evil works of those who are judged; of few stripes for the servant who knew not his Lord's will, of many stripes for the servant who knew it; of not coming out till the uttermost farthing was paid; and besides this, no doubt, of a worm that dieth not and a fire that is not quenched; and also of everlasting fire. This, however, is all. The machinery of legions of fiends, exquisite and refined tortures, and the like, is almost entirely the product of the imagination of the middle ages. Dante and Milton, the legends of saints, and the pictures which represented them—from the hideous daubs on church-walls in Roman Catholic countries, up to the awful imaginations of Michael Angelo—these, and not the New Testament, are the source of that vague popular notion of hell -lurid and vivid because it is vague—which Dr. Pusey cannot bear to see disturbed.

The leaning of Dr. Pusey towards the Evangelical party, as against what is called the Liberal party, of course furnishes matter of attack. The combination of forces whose alliance was not antecedently probable as against a common enemy does not necessarily condemn the allies.

The spirit of Mr. Forster on the reign of Charles I. may be readily discerned by the conclusion arrived at, which is, that 'no one ought to deny the noble qualities of the Cavaliers; but they had one fatal weakness. They were ready to trust a liar because he happened to be a King.'

There are also articles on 'Popular Education,' 'Life at Awamutu,' and 'The Mysterious Maid,' wisely avowing itself to be a sensation tale.

Macmillan has 'The Cambridge Apostles,' the point of which is, that if you wish to make your mark in England you must belong to the strange dozen of men called by the above title, who from time to time have, during their University career, bound themselves together in the links of wisdom and friendship. The list is, beyond doubt, golden; Arthur Hallam, Trench, Alford, W. H. Thompson, Charles Merivale, Alfred Tennyson, Frederick Maurice, and Tom Taylor are the brightest stars in the firmament.

There is also a readable article on Schwalbach and its mineral waters; one on William Blake, 'Pictor Ignotus,' with continuations of 'The Story of Two Families' and of 'A Son of the Soil.'

General Forrest's Flight on the Tennessee River.—The Mobile papers of Oct. 12, publish the following report, addressed to General Taylor:—'Three Yankee gunboats and four transports were up the Tennessee River yesterday, as far as Eastport. They landed 2,000 men and three pieces of artillery. Lieutenant-Colonel Kelly, with Forrest's old command, the 12th Tennessee, surprised the enemy, capturing three guns, 25 prisoners, and 30 horses. Two hundred of the Yankees were drowned in attempting to embark on their boats. The first shot from our batteries penetrated the boiler of one of the transports, and many men were scalded and burned to death. The boats have gone down the river. Our victory was complete.—N. B. Forrest, Major-General.'

THE CONFEDERATE CAUSE IN FRANCE.

FROM A CONFEDERATE CORRESPONDENT.

Paris: November 9.

In my last communication I spoke of the American correspondents of the Moniteur and the Liberal journals; let me now say a few words respecting those of the Patrie and the Pays.

The Patrie has no fewer than four American correspondents—one at Richmond, one at Washington, and two at New York. The Washington correspondent, who appends no signature to his correspondence, and the New York correspondent whose letters bear the signature Albert Fabre, are those whose communications are the most frequent, and who appear to be the best informed in American affairs. They are both of them severe but just censors of Mr. Lincoln's administration, and also of the policy of the Abolitionist party. They each see in the Confederates the true representatives of those grand principles of constitutional liberty which presided at the formation of the Union, and are of opinion that the Democratic party will succeed in reviving a respect for these principles among the populations of the North. They are, however, not mistaken respecting the present tendencies of the majority of these populations, or at least of those by whom they are directed, and regard the election of Mr. Lincoln as certain. In his last letter M. Fabre gave certain reasons in support of his views which appear to me conclusive. In his communications this correspondent deals rather with the political than with the military side of the American question. The Washington correspondent has a weakness for battles: he recounts the victories of the Confederates with the greatest complacency, and smartly ridicules those which are always being gained, in their bulletins, by General Butler and Secretary Stanton.

The Pays has three American correspondents—one at New Orleans, who is M. Emile Lefranc, and two at New York, one of whom signs Frank Harry and the other Alexandre Lustig. M. Harry is of a witty turn of mind; he is fond of anecdote, and has a special relish for jokes respecting Old Abe. I am told that it is the intention of this correspondent some day to publish a collection of these jokes, but this I will not undertake to guarantee. M. Emile Lefranc is the courageous editor of the Renaissance Louisianaise, the only journal published within the limits of the Federal lines, in Louisiana, that still dares to speak worthily and with sympathy of the Southern Confederation. Favourably located at New Orleans, where a portion of the population is still devoted to the cause of the Confederates, with whom it constantly maintains a secret communication in order to acquaint itself with Southern sentiments, M. Lefranc seeks to make these sentiments known to the readers of the Pays. This task he fulfils most honestly and without any party feeling, rendering great justice to the North when, by chance, there is good reason for so doing. M. Lefranc is, moreover, perfectly acquainted with Southern institutions, respecting which he has published a volume replete with the most judicious observation.

If I have dwelt somewhat at length on the correspondence of the Paris journals, it has been to show the friends of the Southern cause how greatly the sources from which these journals derive their information have been increased. But a few months ago, the only source from which their information was derived was the Abolitionist journals of New York: hence, how many have been the errors and how great the calumny which have thus been disseminated, and become rooted, in the public mind! But now, a change in these matters has been effected: the Northern journals have lost all their authority, and the two or three specials, who assumed the character of oracles when the name America was mentioned, have lost their prestige.

You have no doubt noticed that even M. Malespine himself is insufficient for the Opinion Nationale, which, in order to complete the strangling of the South, has engaged the services of an assistant-hangman from New York, M. Cortembert. This Cortembert is so fierce on the Confederate question that he directs no end of arrows from New York against the Agence Havas, which he accuses of having betrayed the North.

You must have remarked that in this American question the Opinion Nationale and the Siècle have each their eyesore; that of the Siècle is the correspondent of the Times, and that of the Opinion the Agence Havas. No sooner does this correspondent or this agency transmit news favourable to the Confederates, than the Siècle and Opinion immediately exclaim—the one, 'The Times correspondent, whose partiality towards the South is so well known;' the other, 'The Agence Havas, whose partiality towards the South is so generally recognised.' Sometimes these two words, 'the partiality,' become lengthened, and are changed into 'the disgraceful partiality,' or 'the culpable partiality.' When M. Malespine is disposed to be more than usually cutting, he writes 'disgraceful;' M. Jourdan, who is more dignified, writes 'culpable.'

To finish with the correspondents of the Paris journals, I may tell you that the correspondent of the Temps has been seized with a desire for travelling, and that he is now engaged on a tour in the West. In his journey from New York to Springfield (Illinois), he has discovered 'that the Supreme Court of the United States lost all its prestige under the long domination of the Democratic party.' It is evident that if he learnt this on his journey, he has forgotten his French, so that this will serve as a compensation. And travels, it is said, are instructive! After this, believe anything.

In the Deux Mondes of Frankfort, an excellent French journal, on which I have not hitherto bestowed the attention which it deserves, I notice a number of interesting and well-written articles on the American war, as also some well-informed communications from New York and Richmond. The last number of this journal contains no less than four articles on America; one on the military situation, two on the state of the finances, and a letter from New York.

I also notice that the Europe of Frankfort, a Radical organ, reproduces, in the form of a feuilleton, a long article from the Revue des deux Mondes upon the American war, from the pen of M. Elysée Reclus. This production, which pretends to be a history of the war, is simply a long diatribe against the South. Allegations of the greatest and most notorious untruth are there most complacently exhibited, and even exaggerated. One reads, among other statements contained in this article, that the Confederate Senate decreed that all Federal officers taken prisoners should be condemned to compulsory labour, and that the negro prisoners of war, whether free or slaves, are all either hanged, whipped to death, or massacred. All that M. Reclus sees in the American revolution is the negro; he bestows but little attention on the white—the negro, and the negro only, absorbs all his sympathy.

I have seen M. Reclus in Louisiana, where he was professor of French. He has taught in one of the Roman families, I do not recollect in which of them, and also, if I am not mistaken, in the family of the brave and lamented General Polk. He is an intelligent man, possessing considerable aptitude, but of an extremely passionate disposition: he married a woman of African origin.

I will only direct your attention to one article which has appeared in the Paris press during the past week; it is by the Baron de Bazancourt, of the France, and its subject is a criticism of the military situation in Virginia. The following are the conclusions of this very competent writer:—

One important fact is therefore clear, namely, that the Federals, possessing interests which assured them a victory, have not yet been able, even after mustering their united forces, to obtain this great military result, which would, they think, so powerfully influence the election question.

If we look at Georgia, or at Missouri, we see contention everywhere, annihilation nowhere. The two parties stand erect, formidable, threatening, restless. Everything still depends upon the future and upon the chances of war.

THE COTTON FAMINE.

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Manchester: November 9, 1864.

The recent decided symptoms of a renewal of distress in the cotton districts, so far from being unabated, are, as might have been expected, growing in intensity with the approach of winter. At the last meeting of the Central Executive Committee held at the Town Hall, Manchester (the Earl of Derby in the chair), the honorary secretary presented but a gloomy report of the past and present, unredeemed by any hopeful expectations in the immediate future. In January last the number of unemployed operatives was (about) 158,000; at midsummer the number had fallen to a little over 100,000; in early autumn it had risen to nearly 136,000; and by the end of last month it reached between 170,000 and 180,000; the highest figure, so far, during the present year. The number on full time last year (155,170) was less by nearly 60,000 than the number so employed in the previous month. Mr. Maclure pointed out, however, even a more unfortunate feature in the present condition of the 'Cotton Famine' than any that had been previously experienced—viz. in the arrival of a time, 'long foreseen,' when others beside the operative class would begin to feel the consequences of a dearth in the raw material.

Between the 1st and 31st of October no fewer than sixty-eight spinners and manufacturers (says the Report) have been compelled to suspend payment; and in this number many are not included who, by private arrangements, have been enabled to prevent their difficulties being publicly known. By these failures, it is estimated that at least 13,600 operatives will be, or have been for the time, entirely thrown out of employment. The increase of indigence has of necessity been considerable, and, unless the state of trade changes for the better much more rapidly than is anticipated, there is every reason to fear there will be a still further increase in the numbers relieved.

The weekly returns presented by Mr. Commissioner Farnall were of the same gloomy character. Up to the close of last week there was an increase in the number of persons receiving parochial relief in the twenty-seven unions of the cotton districts, as compared with the number so relieved in the previous week, of nearly 3,000. Of that serious increase Haslingden contributed upwards of 500, Bury 400, Preston 340, Oldham 320, Manchester 300, Ashton upwards of 200, and Ashton and Salford nearly twice that number. The total number of persons receiving parochial relief during the week adverted to was between 105,000 and 106,000, whereas in the corresponding week of 1861 the number was little beyond 48,000. The increase is therefore nearly 120 per cent. The total weekly cost of outdoor relief last week was 6,363*l.*; whereas in the corresponding week of 1861 it was 2,398*l.*; the increase is, therefore, 165 per cent. With regard to the able-bodied poor receiving relief during last week the number was 8,144, showing an increase of nearly 500 in comparison with the previous week; and more than half of that large number are reported as capable of being employed in public works, but are not so employed at present.

The following more detailed returns will not be without significance, as showing the condition of affairs in towns and villages to which they apply:—

Rochdale.—At the meeting of the Board of Guardians on Friday last, it was reported that during the week 4,300 persons had been relieved at a cost of about 400*l.* From the chief constable's returns of the state of trade it appeared that the usual number of hands employed before the war was 6,744, whereas the number now working full time is 855; working five days a week, 60; four days, 224; three days, 513; two days, 219; and totally unemployed, between 4,000 and 5,000. During the past month nearly 1,000 persons have discontinued to work full time, and the number of totally unemployed has increased by 1,500.

Hyde and Dukinfield.—In this division of the constabulary of Chester there are 89 mills, usually employing before the war 26,450 hands. Of that number only 2,685 are now working full time, between 4,000 and 5,000 four and five days a week, 1,700 three days, 1,600 two days, and between 15,000 and 16,000 are totally unemployed. As evidencing the great distress prevailing in this part of Cheshire, it may be stated that Dukinfield alone had usually nearly 6,000 factory operatives working full time, of which number at the present time only 640 are working full time, 360 four or five days, and between 4,000 and 5,000 are totally unemployed. A slight deduction, however, has to be made on account of those employed under the Public Works Act or those who have emigrated.

PRESTON.—The number of mills now closed in this town is thirty. The trade report published on Monday last shows that three more factories have been closed since last week; that only 9,500 operatives are working full time; 480 five days a week; 1,370 four days; 4,000 three days; 630 two days; and between 11,000 and 12,000 totally unemployed. At the meeting of the local board of guardians on the day above mentioned, it was reported that in the Preston Union there were now upwards of 3,000 cases, comprising between 7,000 and 8,000 persons, who have been relieved at the weekly cost of nearly 500*l.* In comparison with last week those figures show an increase of 140 cases, upwards of 300 persons, and upwards of 20*l.* in cost. The guardians have in their service upwards of 700 able-bodied men. In addition to the number of persons relieved as above, the Relief Committee have this week on their books nearly 3,000 cases, comprising nearly 10,000 persons. As compared with the previous week the increase is 146 cases, comprising 450 persons.

WIGAN.—A slight reduction, apparent rather than real, has taken place in the distress in this town, in consequence of the adoption of the regulations recently enforced by the Central Relief Committee; and some little of the decrease in the pauperism must also be attributed to a slight improvement in the state of employment, which was so bad during the summer that it was scarcely possible for it to become worse. The number of persons on the books of the Relief Committee is now 2,000, whilst the number relieved by the guardians is upwards of 4,000, showing a considerable increase in comparison with the previous week.

STALYBRIDGE.—The monthly returns furnished by the chief superintendent of police for this borough also show a considerable increase. The number of cotton mills usually at work before the war was 39; foundries, 25; bobbin turners, 3; total, 67. The number of mills now working full time with all hands is 7; working full time with part hands, 17; short time, 28; stopped altogether, 15. The number of hands usually employed was 11,493, of which number only 1,700 are working full time, 530 five days, 36 four days and a half, 1,226 four days, 89 three days and a half, 2,120 three days; 1 two days, and between 5,000 and 6,000 totally unemployed. During the past week the Relief Committee alone has relieved 1,553 families.

BLACKBURN.—The increase of pauperism in this borough has been no less marked during the past week. At the weekly meeting of the Relief Committee, held on Monday evening, the number of persons reported to be relieved was 1,693, being an increase of between 400 and 500 since the previous week. It was also reported that the committee have only an available balance in hand of 290*l.* It was remarked that fuel and clothing would be distributed again in the borough as they were last winter. Lady Kay Shuttleworth has contributed 100*l.* through Mrs. Potter for the support of 'sick kitchens' during the approaching season.

THE ROSSENDALE DISTRICT.—The monthly returns for this district show no improvement in comparison with those for other districts. At Bacup the number of hands working full time is 449 against 1,312 for the previous month; four and five days, 1,079 against 1,190; three days, 644 against 525; two days and under, 152 against 160; and entirely out of work, 2,040 against 1,175. And Newchurch, the number working full time is 229, against 683 in the previous month; four and five days, 671 against 608; three days, 248 against 169; two days and under, 70 against 0; entirely without work, 1,161 against 919.

ROCHDALE.—The usual number of hands employed in this borough before the war was about 6,700; of this number only 855 are working full time; 60, five days a week; 224, four days; 513, three days; 219, two days; and between 4,000 and 5,000 are entirely out of employ. Since the previous month 886 persons have discontinued to work full time, and the number of totally unemployed has increased by 1,500.

ARMING THE NEGROES.

(Reprinted from THE INDEX, September 10, 1863.)

WITHOUT placing absolute credence in the startling intelligence brought by the Hibernian, it is safe to speculate upon it, if not as an actual fact, at least as an event which has recently entered into the range of immediate probabilities. We have, in the various rumours that preceded this last direct announcement, so many indications that the question of arming the slave population has been under careful and serious consideration in the Confederate councils. It is also certain that the same subject has been frequently discussed by the Confederates and their friends in Europe within the last few months. The Southern mind, therefore, on both sides of the ocean, has been ripening for this step, and, if not already taken, is prepared to take it.

Intelligent observers of the struggle have long been aware that as a last resort the South possessed an element of latent strength which, whenever called forth, would at once shift the numerical superiority to the side which has heretofore been the weaker, and thus end the conflict. Those who knew the temper of the Southern people knew that, if the alternative were fairly presented between independence and the maintenance of negro slavery, it would not hesitate an instant to sacrifice the latter to the former. The choice made, it is not in the Southern character to resort to halfway measures. If the measure became expedient, it would be carried out thoroughly and without delay. If negroes were to be armed, the arming would be en masse. The chief obstacle lay not in any fear of the use the negroes might make of their arms: on that subject, except in the few localities where the negro has been corrupted by long contact with the Yankees, no Southern man ever entertained a doubt. The difficulty was in the repugnance which a proud nation, regarding the bearing of arms as a privilege and an honour, must necessarily feel in extending that privilege and that honour to a servile race. But at the call of patriotism the Southerners would sacrifice this repugnance, as they have sacrificed property and life, without hesitation and without vain regrets. Our only reason for doubt, then, is, that we do not believe the stress of military necessity so great as to warrant the use of this last, though infallible, reserve. At the same time it must be remembered that the South is led by men who will not wait until driven by necessity to resort to a measure which they foresee that the public safety may require.

The force which the South can thus suddenly throw into the scale, ensuring prompt success, is easily available. Five hundred thousand would indeed comprise nearly the whole number of able-bodied negroes within the jurisdiction of the Confederacy, but these could be spared with less detriment to agricultural pursuits than any equal proportion of any other labouring population. The South has abandoned all its usual staples. Nothing now is asked from the soil but food. For the production of this black female labour will suffice, and in health, hardiness, and strength the females of the African race far exceed the peasant women of Continental Europe. The rich lands of the cotton region are easily tilled, and the young and aged who cannot fight can grow corn and tend cattle. Nor is there any serious difficulty in organising this force. In the South, unlike the North, the relations between the white man and the black are well defined, and are accepted by both without question; they rest upon a reciprocal confidence and a perfect understanding of each other's character. The white man, therefore, will not feel degraded or in an anomalous position in commanding negro troops. If the discipline of the plantation is less rigorous than that of the camp, it is nevertheless an admirable preparation for the latter, and has moreover the merit of furnishing, ready to hand, a class of efficient noncommissioned officers, accustomed to the exercise of delegated authority over those of their own colour, and to the responsibility for their good behaviour. Even the scarcity of arms is no insuperable obstacle. There are, probably, enough of firearms for a select corps of negroes, already familiar with their use; and as for the others, it may be doubted whether they would not be more effective in the field with the more primitive weapons which the blacksmith's shop on every plantation could readily forge out of the implements of husbandry. A hundred thousand negro pikemen or scythemen would probably be a more formidable body for immediate service than the same number of raw recruits entrusted with unwonted weapons. There is no doubt, also, that the greater portion of the negro levies would be quickly thrown across the Northern border, where at worst they would have to meet foes no better armed or drilled than themselves. As for the negro's courage, when supported and led by his master, not against him, we have never entertained a doubt. The Confederate negro troops will be as much superior in steadiness and effectiveness to the black levies of the North, as the Sepoys under European officers were to the mutinous hordes of Nana Sahib. Besides, what the negro lacks in that intelligence which characterises the white American volunteer, he more than supplies by implicit obedience and insensibility to danger, and he thus possesses the very qualities which professional officers are prone to consider the highest of the soldier.

If the military importance of such an enormous accession to the numerical strength of the Confederacy is almost beyond adequate comprehension, the political and social aspects of the measure assume even more gigantic proportions. It is the most complete scheme of emancipation that visionary ever dreamt of, and, though we cannot disguise the terrible danger of thus subverting at one blow the whole social fabric of a great country, it is undeniable that the experiment, if it has to be tried, is tried in this form with immensely superior practical prospects, and under fewer disadvantages. The liberated slave is spared the demoralisation of a violent change of authority and a disruption of natural ties; he does not learn the duties of freedom by those lessons of domestic treachery, of murder and arson, which the North undertook to teach him; he graduates, so to speak, into liberty, under the same guidance and protection around which the best feelings of his nature have wound themselves from his childhood. What the Yankees promised him as the reward of treason, he receives as the guerdon of honourable service; where they would have implanted corroding hatred, there grow the wholesome fruits of genuine gratitude; where they would have made him the irreconcilable enemy of the Southern white man, under whose care he has advanced from African barbarism to civilisation and Christianity, he continues, what he has always been, a humble but confiding friend, yet with titles to respect from the superior race which he never before, or by any other means, could have enjoyed.

The general belief which the mere rumour that such a step was meditated by the South has received, and the dread which it has inspired in the North, are in themselves the most conclusive refutations of the slanders which have been so industriously propagated in regard to the treatment of the slaves by their masters. Surely, if there were a tithe of that repressed antagonism which Abolitionist fictions describe as the relation between a cruelly oppressed race and their oppressors, this act of the South would be the maddest of suicides. If the inventors of these fictions really were so self-deluded as to believe them, they must scout the simple mention of such an act with ridicule. That they accept it as possible and even probable is a confession that they know the South's trust in the negro, and its reasons for that trust. If the South makes this great sacrifice we shall not be without fears for the future consequences upon its industry, but we shall have the consolation that at last this brave and self-devoted nation stand before a prejudiced world in its true light. The most bigoted partisan of the North will then no longer be able to shut his eyes to the only issue involved in this American struggle—a nation, occupying half of a continent, rising as one man, old and young, male and female, master and serf, in self-defence against against a foreign yoke. Whether or no the gift of freedom be a boon to the negro, time and experience alone can show; but the only flag under which he can earn that dangerous boon will then the cross on the white field, the emblem of hope and faith, and not the polluted and dishonoured stars and stripes, the symbol of dominion and tyranny. It will then be seen whether the professed sympathy for the slave is a genuine feeling, or only a cloak to conceal envy of the master. The hypocrisy of the North, which makes the freeing of the slaves a pretext for enslaving the free man, will no longer find any so lost to shame on this side of the Atlantic as to defend it. Among the nations of the earth the Confederate States will stand distinguished for the most courageous experiment of emancipation on record, an experiment on so unprecedented a scale that the boasted self-sacrifices of other nations in distant colonial possessions sink beside it into utter insignificance. And if ever a nation gave proofs of earnestness of purpose and of a character of heroic mould, it will have been that nation which battled for years against a vastly superior foe, and which did not account wealth, dominion, cherished prejudices, both present and future prosperity—nay, its entire social fabric—too dear a price to pay for independence.

A SOUTHERN HYMN.

BY the sword each freeman draws
Freely for the country's cause;
By our fields with slaughter red,
Battle-gorges choked with dead;
By our bleeding fatherland;
By her countless orphan band;
By her martyrs' nameless grave—
God of Justice, hear and save!

By the helpless left behind;
By the eyes with weeping blind;
Choking voices, that in vain
Call the loved ones back again;
By the homes where never more
Father's step shall cross the door;
By the sighs that load our air—
God of Mercy, hear and spare!

By our burnt and wasted soil;
By our homes, the foeman's spoil;
By the grief that never heals;
By the shame no time anneals;
By the wrongs no tongue can speak—
Fears that blanch the brave man's cheek,
Crimes Thine angels' sight that blast—
God of Vengeance, hear at last!

Once set forth in Freedom's track,
Come what may, we turn not back.
Taking each his life in hand,
Face to face with fate we stand:
One resolve in every eye,
Sword in hand to do or die;
And one prayer in every mouth—
'God of Battles, save the South!'

AFFAIRS FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

WEDNESDAY EVENING.

MONEY AND DISCOUNT MARKET.

THE money market is in a much more favourable condition than it was a week or two ago. The engagements have worked down very rapidly, and it is evident that the Bank directors will have without further delay to reduce the terms of discount. Were it not for 'breakers ahead' in one or two quarters, we should have an easier state of things in general. It is highly probable, however, that in the course of the next two weeks, if the Indian payments shall pass off in a satisfactory manner, quite a revulsion will take place for the better, both in discount and the value of stocks. The final step towards this will be in getting the official minimum from 9 to 8 per cent. Subsequently, should affairs prove so encouraging that there shall be a hope of a reaction to 7 per cent., the dread of a bad end of the year might be at once removed, and the current of transactions would be proportionally animated. At once, it is believed the court of directors will place the rate at 8 per cent., since it was to be well understood that in the discount department little or no business is transacting. Of this we may pretty well judge by what is passing out of doors. The rate among the bankers and discount brokers is not more than 8½ per cent. in the general channels, and in exceptional instances the quotation is 8¼ per cent. It is not likely, therefore, many firms will seek assistance with the quotation at least a half to three-quarters per cent. below that figure in the general market. On the Stock Exchange the rates for short loans have been equal to 6 and 7 per cent.; the latest quotations are 4 to 5 per cent.

BULLION AND SPECIE MOVEMENTS.

The bullion market continues to present an improving appearance in every respect, the amount of gold sent into the Bank being 178,000*l.*, against which there has been one withdrawal only of 50,000*l.* for transmission to Alexandria. The arrivals of specie amounted to 313,051*l.*, of which 264,400*l.* was from America, 4,896*l.* from Alexandria, and 43,755*l.* from the Brazils. The shipments of specie for the East by the last packet amounted to only 93,619*l.*, of which 91,073*l.* was in silver, and 2,546*l.* gold. Of this amount 91,073*l.* was for China, 1,546*l.* for Madras, and 1,000*l.* for Alexandria. The silver market remains very steady at previous rates, with but very little doing at present.

HOME AND FOREIGN SECURITIES.

The English stock market has continued exceedingly buoyant throughout the week, the dealers being stimulated by the improving state of the money market, and the prospect of an immediate reduction in the minimum rate of discount. There has not been quite so much business doing to-day, which is generally the case on the eve of the weekly meeting of the Bank directors, when a change is anticipated, and the dulness has been further increased through its being Lord Mayor's Day. The foreign stock market has also been more active, but the improvement in quotations has not comparatively been so great as in the English securities. In consequence of the unsatisfactory state of monetary affairs at Madrid, Spanish securities have declined; but in nearly all other descriptions there has been a rise. Consols closed this evening at 90⅜ to 90½ for money and the account, which, as contrasted with the rates of this day week, is a rise of about 1 per cent. Exchequer bills have likewise further improved, the present quotation being 5*s.* discount to par. Greek stock closes at 22¼ to 22¾, being an improvement of ¼ per cent. Mexican have advanced 1½ per cent., being at present quotation 28¼ to 28½. Spanish Passives have declined 1 per cent., and the Certificates ⅜ per cent., the quotations being 30¼ to 30½ and 13⅝ to 13⅞ respectively. Turkish Six per Cents of 1854 are 90 to 91, being an advance of 1 per cent., and those of 1862, 72¼ to 72¾, or an advance of ¼ per cent.

AMERICAN SECURITIES.

There has again been rather more activity displayed in the market for American Government and railway securities. The dealings have been beyond the usual average of late, and in the early part of the week prices had a firmer tendency, but with the last day or two, in consequence of the pressure of sales, there has been a general decline. United States of 1881 have changed hands at 43, 43¼, 43, 43¾, 43¼, 42¾, 43, 41½, 41¾, and 41; ditto ditto of 1882, at 42¾; Virginian State Six-per-cents at 27 and 27½; Atlantic and Great Western Railway, New York Station, first mortgage at 70; ditto on Pennsylvania ditto, first mortgage at 70½, 70¼, and 70; ditto ditto, second mortgage at 64; Erie $100 shares all paid 41, 41½, and 40; Illinois Central Six-per-cents. at 76; ditto ditto $100 shares all paid, at 51½, 52½, 53, 53¼, 52¾, 53, 53¼, 52½, 53¼, 52¾, 53¼, and 52.

CONFEDERATE COTTON LOAN.

The market has been dull and drooping all the week, with very little business doing. To-day, on receipt of later news favourable to the Southern arms, an improvement has taken place, and we close firm at 60 to 61.

RAILWAY SECURITIES.

The market for Railway Securities has generally throughout the week shown an improving tendency. A large business has been transacted at, in most instances, gradually improving prices. To-day, however, there has been somewhat less buoyancy, and some of the leading stocks have receded about 5*s.* per share. As compared with last week, however, there has been an improvement of 2 per cent. in Great Eastern, Great Northern, London and Blackwall, Chatham and Dover, and London and North Western; of 4 per cent. in Vale of Neath; of 1¼ per cent. in Metropolitan; of 1½ per cent. in North Eastern (York), and South Eastern; of 1 per cent. in West Midland (Oxford), London and Brighton, North Eastern (Berwick), do. do. (Leeds), North Staffordshire, South Devon, and West Cornwall; and of ½ per cent. in Caledonia, Midland, and North British. On the other hand there has been a decline of 1 per cent. in Edinburgh and Glasgow, Great Southern and Western, and North London; of ½ per cent. in Cornwall; and of ¼ per cent. in Great Western. There has been rather more activity displayed in the Foreign Share market, and also in the shares connected with the British Possessions, but prices, though firm, do not present any important variations.

MERCANTILE SUSPENSIONS.

The following suspensions have taken place since our last number:—Messrs. von Leesen & Co., of Hamburg, a large and respectable firm; M. Posno, a diamond merchant, of Amsterdam, liabilities about 170,000*l.*; Messrs. Dovey, Benjamin, & Co., of Crosby Square, in the Brazilian trade, owing to the financial disasters at Rio, liabilities not known; Messrs. Darby & Co., wholesale grocers, liabilities about 80,000*l.*; Messrs. Rougemont, Lowenberg, & Co., of Paris, bankers, liabilities supposed to reach about 600,000*l.*

MEETINGS OF PUBLIC COMPANIES.

At a meeting of the proprietors of the Vauxhall Bridge Company a dividend was declared of 15*l.* per share, free of income-tax, and it was stated that the recent reduction in the passenger toll from 1*d.* to ½*d.* had proved most beneficial to the shareholders.—The Panulcillo Copper Company have issued a statement preparatory to the meeting to be held on the 29th inst. The accounts for the half-year ending June 30 show a balance of 4,863*l.* net profit in the Company's favour, or 2,654*l.* after payment of all the preliminary expenses, &c. The directors, in accordance with the articles of association, have set aside 10 per cent. of the net profits, after allowing interest on paid-up capital to the reserve fund, and recommend the payment of a dividend for the half-year at the rate of 7½ per cent. per annum, including interest at 5 per cent. on the paid-up capital, free of income tax, which will leave 410*l.* to be carried forward to the current account.

THE COURSE OF THE PRODUCE MARKETS.

The produce markets have shown increased firmness in most departments since our last report, and although transactions are not greatly extended, there is more doing generally. Imports have continued very light, and this, whilst tending to keep operations upon a limited scale for want of supplies, has added to the stability of prices. Deliveries from warehouse go on satisfactorily, and stocks are in many cases decreasing. The grain trade throughout the country continues very quiet but very steady, and at Mark Lane prices of both wheat and flour remain the same as last week. The provision markets have been inactive. Fine American butters have, however, sold to a fair extent at 106*s.* to 112*s.*: middling sorts meet very little attention. Bacon is depressed in value generally, but short-rib in American middles still sell at 44*s.* to 45*s.* per cwt. Beef is very dull of sale, and offering at reduced rates. A good business has been concluded in sugar at fully 6*d.* advance, and the market closes firm, with but small supplies offering. Coffee is 1*s.* dearer on Ceylon kinds, and East India descriptions have also sold at former prices, but Brazil coffees remain out of demand. The tea trade has improved slightly, and for common and medium Congous quotations are stronger. Small public sales of Assam have gone at very full prices. Spices are dull of sale, and nutmegs 1*d.* and 2*d.* cheaper. For soft grain rice there is a much better demand at advancing prices. Saltpetre has realised 30*s.* cash for fine, being dearer. American refined petroleum sells steadily at 2*s.* per gallon. Crude is quoted 16*l.* 10*s.* per tun. The oil trade continues very dull. Sperm is quoted nominally 64*l.* to 66*l.* Pale seal 48*l.*, and pale Southern 46*l.* Linseed oil is a shade firmer at 32*s.* 9*d.* to 33*s.* Pale rape is firm at 44*s.* 6*d.* to 45*s.*, and brown at 42*s.* 6*d.* to 43*s.* per cwt. Fine palm is steady at 36*s.* The setting-in of frost at St. Petersburgh whilst a considerable quantity of tallow, is not yet shipped, has increased the value of this article here, and with an active market prices are now quoted for Y.C. old, 40*s.* 6*d.*; new 41*s.* on the spot; 42*s.* 6*d.* spring; 43*s.* 6*d.* buyers March. Hemp is firmer at 31*l.* to 34*l.* for clean Russian. Jute has again risen 10*s.* to 20*s.* per ton, principally on the medium qualities. Common to good sold to-day at 11*l.* to 25*l.* per ton. Cotton was flat just after our last, but is firmer, and rather dearer. There is an enquiry for East Indian indigo of the lower qualities, and prices are quite up to those of the October sales. The periodical sales of cochineal have gone at very full prices to a small advance. Cutch is in good demand at 22*s.* 6*d.* for Pegu. Metals are nearly all in better demand. Scotch pig iron has risen to 51*s.* 9*d.* and 51*s.* 10½*d.* Spelter to 21*l.* 15*s.* Straits tin to 97*l.* three months prompt, and 95*l.* cash.

Liverpool, Wednesday, November 9.—Our cotton market was animated early in the week, but there was subsequently a falling off in business, though within the last day or two there has again been an improvement, and prices once more show a tendency to recovery, but the advance in prices has not been large. The sales this week have been 43,000 bales, of which 17,000 were taken on speculation and for export. The total sales this year have been 2,238,846 bales; and to the same period in 1863, 2,303,418 bales. There have been imported this year 1,922,904 bales, against 1,335,987 bales last year. The trade have taken this year 1,342,415 bales; and in 1863, 1,163,301 bales. The exports this year have been 477,654 bales, against 477,640 bales last year. There have been taken on speculation this year 402,595 bales, and in 1863, 680,996 bales. The stock at the present time is 390,215 bales, against 149,306 bales last year. The latest quotations were:—Fine Egyptian, 24*d.* to 24½*d.*; Dhollerah, 15¾*d.* to 16*d.*; Middling Upland, 23*d.* to 23½*d.*; Orleans, 23½*d.* to 23¾*d.*; Mobile, 23¼*d.* to 23¾*d.*

There has been very little change in the Manchester markets during the week, but within the last day or two there has been rather more regularity as regards prices, and a slight increase in the demand for some of the better classes of goods. Shipping yarns now show rather more firmness, and the spinners generally are asking a slight advance in prices, which has checked business—buyers not feeling disposed to give increased rates. In home trade yarns the market is rather stronger, but without leading to much business, and prices remain nearly the same as last week. Spinners appear very easy about prices, believing that a further advance must for a time take place. The cloth market is rather quiet, but owing to the scarcity of stocks sellers have only been able to complete a few transactions at prices rather over those of last week. In most cases manufacturers are asking higher prices, which restricts business, buyers evidently being more cautious than they were a few days ago. The latest quotations were:—⅞ Grey Printers, 6*s.* 6*d.* to 13*s.* 3*d.*; ⅝ Grey Madapollams, 5*s.* 9*d.* to 8*s.* 9*d.*; ⅝ Grey Printers, 8*s.* 9*d.* to 15*s.* 9*d.*; ⅝ Grey Shirtings, 10*s.* 3*d.* to 22*s.*; Water Twist, No. 20, 1*s.* 6*d.* to 2*s.*; No. 30, 1*s.* 10*d.* to 2*s.* 4*d.*; No. 40, 2*s.* 4*d.* to 2*s.* 9½*d.*; Mule Twist, No. 20, 1*s.* 2½*d.* to 1*s.* 10*d.*; No. 30, 1*s.* 6*d.* to 2*s.* 1*d.*; No. 40, 1*s.* 8*d.* to 2*s.* 3*d.*; No. 50, 1*s.* 11*d.* to 2*s.* 6*d.*; No. 60, 2*s.* 2*d.* to 2*s.* 8*d.*; No. 70, 2*s.* 5*d.* to 2*s.* 11*d.*; No. 80, 2*s.* 7*d.* to 3*s.* 1*d.*; No. 90, 2*s.* 9*d.* to 3*s.* 3*d.*; and No. 100, 3*s.* to 3*s.* 7*d.*

THERE are, at this time many thousands of Confederate prisoners of war confined in the various forts and camps of the Northern States. A large proportion of them are wounded or sick, and all are in a state of destitution, the accounts of which, as given in private letters and in the newspapers, present a picture of human suffering, which has scarcely a parallel in modern times. The merest necessaries of life are wanting, and frequently the wounded prisoner has no raiment save that which is stark and stiffened with his clotted blood. Horrible as war is in all its features, assuredly it has no greater horrors than the long agony of the poor captive who, when the feverish excitement of the contest is over, is left to the bitter charity of strangers and foes, without one friendly hand to soothe the pains of body or friendly voice to whisper hope and comfort to his despairing mind. These men, cut off from the assistance of their kindred or the protection of their Government, have peculiar claims on the patriotism of their countrymen in Europe, and upon Christian benevolence everywhere. They did not recklessly or from choice embrace the profession of arms, but in exchanging the comforts, and often the luxuries, of home for the toils and hardships of a soldier's life, they obeyed a stern sense of duty and the call of their country in its extremest need. An unusual proportion, also, of those that fill the ranks of the Confederate armies belong to the higher walks of life, upon whom privations, such as are endured by prisoners in the hands of the North, fall with increased severity.

The Southern Prisoners' Relief Fund is intended to mitigate some of these sufferings which cannot altogether be relieved. Within little more than a twelvemonth, nearly £3,000 have been collected and expended in relief. The managers of the Fund are assisted in their efforts by self-devoted ladies in the principal Northern cities, who visit the sufferers and give them such aid as the means at their disposal render possible. Of late the Federal Government has granted permission that this Samaritan work may be done openly. It is earnestly hoped that all Southerners residing in Europe will support the Fund to the extent of their ability, and its objects may recommend themselves to all, irrespective of country or political convictions, who sympathise with the sufferings of their fellow-men.

Contributions will be received by J. H. ASHBRIDGE, Treasurer, Walmer Buildings, Water Street, Liverpool; or in London, by HENRY HOYZE, Esq., 17 Savile Row, W.; in Paris, by H. O. BREWER, Esq., 6 Rue Circulaire; and DANIEL HUBBARD, Esq., 24 Rue Lord Byron.

The Seizure of the Confederate States Steamer 'Florida.'

WE are authorised to publish the following

OFFICIAL REPORT OF THE COMMANDER.

Bahia: October 13, 1864.

SIR,—It is with great pain that I have to report the seizure of the Confederate States steamer Florida, lately under my command.

I arrived at this port on the 4th inst., at 9 P.M., to procure coal and provisions, and also to get some slight repairs, after a cruise of sixty-one days. Just after anchoring, a boat passing around us asked the name of our vessel, and, upon receiving our reply, stated that the boat was from Her Britannic Majesty's steamer Curlew. Next morning I found that the United States steamer Wachusetts was at anchor near us, but no English steamer; so I at once concluded that the boat which had hailed us the evening before was from the Wachusetts.

We were visited on the morning of the 5th by a Brazilian officer, to whom I stated my wants, and was informed by him that he would report the same to the President, and that until his answer was received we could hold no communication with the shore. At noon I received a communication (which was left on board the Florida) from the President, stating that he was ready to receive me. At our interview he informed me that forty-eight hours would be allowed me to refit and repair, but that should his chief engineer, whom he would send on board to examine the machinery, deem the time too short, he would grant the necessary extension. He was most urgent in his request that I would strictly observe the laws of neutrality, at the same time stating to me that he had received the most solemn assurances from the United States Consul that the United States steamer would do nothing while in port contrary to the laws of nations and of Brazil; and that he desired the same from me, which I unhesitatingly gave. The Brazilian Admiral, who was present at the interview, suggested that I had better move my vessel in between his ship and the shore, as our proximity to the Wachusetts might cause some difficulty. My assurances to the President seemed to set his mind at rest on the score of any collision between the two vessels, and upon leaving him I immediately repaired on board and moved the Florida close inshore to the position suggested by the Admiral. I found the Brazilian engineer on board, and was informed by him that it would require four days to repair the pipe of the condenser. Feeling now no apprehension of any difficulty occurring while in port, and wishing to gratify the crew with a short liberty, not only on the score of good conduct, but also of health, I determined to permit one watch at a time to go ashore for twelve hours, and sent the port watch off that afternoon. About 7.30 P.M. a boat came alongside, stating that she was from the United States steamer Wachusetts with the United States Consul, who had an official communication for the commander of the Florida. The letter, with the card of the Consul, was handed to First Lieutenant Porter, who, after examining it, and finding it directed to Captain Morris, 'sloop Florida,' returned it unopened to the Consul, stating that it was improperly addressed: that the vessel was the Confederate States steamer Florida, and that when the letter was so directed it would be received. The next day (6th), a Mr. de Vidiky came on board, having received a letter from the United States Consul enclosing one for me. He requested me, before receiving my letter, to permit him to read to me the one sent to him. It was a request to Mr. de Vidiky to carry a challenge to the commander of the Florida, and, in case of its acceptance, to offer his (the Consul's) influence in having the repairs of the Florida speedily finished. I informed Mr. de Vidiky that I had heard quite enough, and, finding the letter to me still improperly addressed, declined receiving it; but at the same time said to him that I had come to Bahia for a special purpose, which being accomplished, I should leave; that I would neither seek nor avoid a contest with the Wachusetts, but, should I encounter her outside of Brazilian waters, would use my utmost endeavours to destroy her. That afternoon, the port watch having returned, I sent the starboard watch (the other half of the crew) ashore on liberty, going also myself in company with several of the officers. From our nearness to the Wachusetts, persons on board of that vessel could well see these men leaving the ship. At 3.30 A.M. I was awakened by the proprietor of the hotel at which I was staying, and told that there was some trouble on board the Florida, as he had heard firing and cheering in the direction of the vessel, but on account of the darkness was unable to discern anything. I immediately hastened to the landing, and was informed by a Brazilian officer that the United States steamer Wachusetts had run into and seized the Florida, and was then towing her out of the harbour. I hurried off to the Admiral's vessel, and was told by him that he was at once going in pursuit, which he did as soon as steam was raised on board a small steamer belonging to the fleet. The Admiral's ship being a sailing vessel, sloop-of-war, was taken in tow by the steamer, and went out of the harbour. He returned in the afternoon with all his vessels, having been unable to overtake the Wachusetts. Upon mustering the officers and crew left on shore, I found there were four officers, viz. Lieutenant Barron, Paymaster Taylor, Midshipman Dyke, and Master's Mate King, and seventy-one men, of whom six had escaped by swimming from the Florida after her seizure. Of the actual occurrences and loss of life on board the Florida, I have been able to find out very little. The substance of what I have gathered from the six men who escaped is as follows: That at 3.15 A.M. on October 7, Master T. T. Hunter, jun., being in charge of the deck, the Wachusetts left her anchorage, and taking advantage of the darkness, steamed for the Florida, from whom she was not seen until close aboard; that she was hailed by Mr. Hunter, who, receiving no answer, called 'all hands' to quarters. Before the officers and crew were all on deck, the Wachusetts struck the Florida on her starboard quarter, cutting her rail down to the deck and carrying away her mizen-mast, at the same time pouring a volley of musketry and a charge of canister from her forecastle pivot-gun upon our decks. The Wachusetts then backed off, and demanded our surrender, to which demand Lieutenant Porter declined to accede. The enemy then fired again and again into us, which was returned by the officers and crew of the Florida. Another demand was then made for our surrender, and Lieutenant Porter answered, 'I will surrender conditionally.' The enemy then stopped firing, and the commander called for Captain Morris to come on board; Lieutenant Porter answered that Captain Morris was on shore, and that he as commanding officer would come on board as soon as he could get a boat ready. The enemy then sent a number of armed boats to take possession of the Florida. As soon as Lieutenant Porter was heard to surrender, fifteen of our crew jumped overboard to escape capture, of whom only six succeeded, the remaining nine having been shot in the water by the men on the forecastle and in the boats of the Wachusetts. Mr. Hunter was wounded and a number of men killed. The enemy made fast a hawser to the foremast of the Florida, and, after slipping her cable, towed her out to sea.

I called in person on the President as soon as possible, but could get no further information from him. On the 8th, I sent a protest to the President, of which I send you a copy, marked 2. On the 10th, our agent was informed by the interpreter that the President did not intend to answer my protest, as the Confederate Government had not been recognised by Brazil, and that I could find all the official correspondence in the newspapers. I then wrote the letter marked 3, in which reference is made to a letter from the President marked 4. Just before leaving Bahia, having received no answer, I sent our agent, Mr. James Dwyer, to the President. The result of his visit is contained in his letter marked 5. The Bahia papers contain a number of reports as to the killed and wounded on board the Florida, all of which I have thoroughly sifted and find no foundation for the same.

At the time of her seizure there were about twenty-five tons of coal on board, most of which was dust. The list of officers captured is contained in the report of Paymaster Taylor, marked 6.

The enclosed newspaper is an official extra, containing all the Brazilian official correspondence in reference to the Florida.

I am, very respectfully,
Your obedient servant,
(Signed) C. MANIGAULT MORRIS,
Lieutenant Commanding C. S. Navy.

OFFICIAL CORRESPONDENCE.

(TRANSLATION.)

Consulate of the United States of America,
Bahia, October 5, 1864, 9 A.M.

To His Excellency Antonio Joaquim da Silva Gomes,
President of the Province of Bahia.

SIR,—This morning a steamer anchored in this port bearing the flag adopted by those who are involved in the rebellion against the Government of the United States of America, and I am informed that the said vessel is the Florida, which is engaged in capturing vessels navigating under the flag of the United States of America, and in destroying them by making bonfires of them and their cargoes.

The vessel in question is not commissioned by any recognised Government whatever, and her officers and crew are composed of persons of various nationalities, who are not subject to any international or civilised law, and are consequently not entitled to the privileges and immunities conceded to vessels navigating under the flag of a civilised nation. I therefore protest, in the name of the United States of America, against the admission of this vessel to free practice, by which she might be enabled to supply herself with coal, provisions, tackle, or utensils of any kind whatever, or receive on board any persons whatever; finally, against any assistance, aid, or protection which might be conceded to her in this port, or in any other belonging to this province.

I likewise claim that the piratical cruiser which, in combination with the pirate Alabama, violated the sovereignty of the Imperial Government of Brazil, by capturing and destroying vessels belonging to citizens of the United States of America, within the territorial waters of Brazil, near the island of Fernando de Noronha, in April, 1863, be detained with all her officers and crew, in order to answer for so flagrant a violation of the sovereignty of the Government of Brazil and of the rights of citizens of the United States within the jurisdiction of the Brazilian Government.

I avail myself of this occasion to renew to your Excellency the assurance of my distinguished consideration.—I have the honour to be, with the greatest respect,

Your obedient servant,
THOMAS F. WILSON,
Consul of the United States.

(The above agrees with the original in English.
(Signed) A. S. BORGES, interpreter.)

Answer of the President of the Province.

Palace of the Government of the Province of Bahia,
October 5, 1864.

In a note dated this day, Mr. Thomas F. Wilson, Consul of the United States, claims that the steamer Florida, now anchored in this port, shall not be admitted to free practice, nor obtain permission to provide herself with coal, provisions, supplies, and utensils of any kind whatever, nor receive on board any person whatever; he likewise requests, that as this cruiser, in combination with the Alabama, violated the sovereignty of the Imperial Government of Brazil, by capturing and destroying vessels belonging to citizens of the United States of America, within the territorial waters of the Empire, near the island of Fernando de Noronha, in April 1863, she may be detained with all her officers and crew, in order to answer for this flagrant violation of the sovereignty of the Government of Brazil and of the rights of citizens of the United States, within the jurisdiction of the Brazilian Government.

In reply to the Consul, I have to inform him, that as the said vessel belongs to the Confederate States, in whom the Imperial Government recognised the character of belligerents, all the assistance required by humanity may be furnished her, which does in no wise constitute assistance for warlike purposes, as laid down by international law, and does not conflict with that neutrality which this Government studiously seeks to preserve, and has always preserved, in the contest between the States of North America. The undersigned cannot, therefore, admit the first portion of the claim of the Consul, in the general manner in which it was presented, and particularly in relation to those articles considered as contraband of war in conformity with instructions issued on that subject by the Imperial Government, and according to which the said vessel will only be permitted to remain in this port for a length of time absolutely indispensable.

In regard to the second part of his note, it is my duty to observe to the Consul that even if it were fully established that the Florida had previously violated neutrality, such a proceeding would scarcely authorise us to refuse her permission to enter the ports of the Empire, and could never warrant us to commit the acts required by the Consul, which would be equivalent to a hostile rupture, without the intervention of the Supreme Government of the State, which is alone competent to authorise such a rupture.

I renew to the Consul the assurance of my esteem and consideration.

(Signed) ANTONIO JOAQUIM DA SILVA GOMES,

To Mr. Thomas F. Wilson, Consul of the United States.

Interruption of Relations with the American Consul.

Palace of the Government of Bahia,
October 7, 1864.

Sir—The undersigned having been informed of the serious outrage perpetrated by the steamer Wachusetts, of the United States of North America, in violating the neutrality of the Empire and contemning its sovereignty, by capturing treacherously and under shade of the night, within the very port of this capital, the steamer Florida of the Confederate States—and, as in addition to the most sacred regulations of international law observed among civilised nations, prohibiting the commission of such reprehensible acts by civilised nations, the undersigned regarded as a pledge of respect for the neutrality of Brazil the word of honour of Mr. T. F. Wilson, the Consul of the United States of North America, who, in the most explicit terms, undertook to secure a compliance on the part of the captain of the said steamer Wachusetts with his duty by respecting the sovereignty of the Empire and by abstaining from all hostile acts whatever within its territorial waters—the undersigned cannot refrain from protesting solemnly and energetically against the outrage alluded to, and the more so as he considers the Consul himself as implicated therein, inasmuch as, notwithstanding his formal promise, he has volunteered no explanation tending to diminish his responsibility.

And as the occurrence, and the silence hitherto observed on the subject by the Consul of the United States, evidently prove that the undersigned can no longer confide in the said Consul to cause the neutrality and sovereignty of the Empire to be respected by the belligerent vessels of the said States, he has resolved to interrupt official relations with him, until the Imperial Government, which is about to be informed of this unexpected and deplorable event, shall have deliberated upon the subject, in full possession of all the facts and according to its superior wisdom. The Consul is likewise hereby notified, that positive orders have been to-day issued to the different authorities to refuse admission to the Wachusetts into any of the ports of this province. For this purpose the most energetic and forcible means will be employed (according to the instructions of the Minister of Foreign Affairs of June 23 of last year), if such shall be rendered necessary by the reluctance and criminal obstinacy manifested by that steamer in failing to comply with the intimations conveyed to her, thus continuing to infringe upon the duties imposed by international law and the honour and dignity of her own flag.

ANTONIO JOAQUIM DA SILVA GOMES.

THE BRAZILIAN ACCOUNT.

(From the Jornal do Bahia.)

THE Confederate States' steamship Florida, arriving from Sainte-Croix-de-Ténériffe, after a voyage of sixty-one days, entered port on the 5th, in order to repair her engines, and to take in water and provisions; her crew having been for a considerable time reduced to a daily ration of salt meat and compelled to drink filtered sea-water. The American Consul, appealing to the provincial president, demanded that he should refuse this vessel an entrance into the port, and that he should inflict some punishment upon her for having violated the Brazilian waters by burning an American vessel near the island of Fernando de Noronha. The president replied that he had granted the vessel two days in which the repairs necessary to her engines were to be made.

At the time of the Florida's arrival there was also in port the Federal steamship Wachusetts, and on the Florida's entrance the deck of the former vessel immediately presented a scene of the greatest excitement and commotion. The president of the province, foreseeing that an engagement was likely to take place, obtained the consent of the American Consul that the country should be duly respected, and that no act inconsistent with neutrality should be committed either in the port or within the neutral limits; and with a view to still greater security, the Florida placed herself beneath the broadside of the guardship.

On the 6th, the crew requiring rest, half of their number received permission to go on shore, and returned on board in the evening, several of the sailors being much intoxicated. The commander of the Florida, thinking himself perfectly safe in a neutral port, had permitted eighty of his crew and some officers to sleep on shore on the nights of the 6th and 7th inst. At ten minutes past three in the morning, the officer of the watch, Hunter Junior, was surprised in noticing that the Wachusetts was shifting from her moorings, whereupon he summoned his men to their posts, which was, however, a task difficult of accomplishment. At the same moment he found his vessel attacked by several boats, each of which was filled with armed men, who, upon receiving a charge of musketry from on board the Florida, were immediately supported by the Wachusetts. This vessel, without exciting suspicion, and taking advantage of the night, which was very dark, to hide the steam arising from her engines, had slipped her cables and advanced rapidly towards the Florida, passing on her way beneath the stern of the corvette D. Januaria, by which latter vessel she was ordered to cast anchor immediately; so far, however, from listening to these orders, the commander of the Wachusetts hastily directed his vessel towards the stern of the Florida, which had been turned towards the north by the ebbing of the tide. Scarcely had he approached the vessel when he gave orders to fire the gun placed on the prow of the Wachusetts and loaded with small shot, which carried away a mast, sending at the same time a number of his crew on board the Florida, from which vessel only a feeble discharge had been received.

It appears that several lives were lost on both sides in this engagement, in which the weapons used were side-arms and revolvers. It was, however, of short duration, since the united force of the Florida did not amount to more than fifty men. Amongst the killed is the officer of the watch, who was struck by a bullet in the breast and afterwards hanged. It is reported that an officer named Stone, after having himself killed six men, finding himself so surrounded that he was unable to make any further resistance, fired a pistol into his mouth and immediately expired; also that another officer, having leaped on board the Wachusetts, and stabbed six men in succession, at last fell, being beaten to death by the butt-end of a musket.

Out of fifteen sailors who threw themselves into the sea, only four escaped, being rescued by some merchant-vessels which were moored at a short distance. The eleven others were killed by musket-shots from the enemy, who had collected themselves together to the number of nine in order to shoot a single man.

To this contest succeeded a short silence, which was soon followed by prolonged huzzahs from on board the Wachusetts.

A boat was then despatched to this vessel by the naval commandant, Gervazio Mancebo, under the orders of Lieutenant Varella, with orders to the commander to moor immediately, threatening at the same time that his vessel should be scuttled if he persisted in the attack. The commander gave his word of honour that he would remain quiet, and that he would immediately return to his moorings. This answer was made by the commander to the officer from the ship's side, the latter not being permitted to come on board.

The Wachusetts had, however, craftily attached a tow-rope to the Florida, and, feigning to resume her moorings, steamed off in a south-western course, passing within a cable's length of the prow of the corvette D. Januaria. Eight shots were then fired by the latter vessel, to which the Wachusetts did not reply; on the contrary, she redoubled her efforts to place herself beyond the range of the corvette's cannon, nearly all of whose shots had been effective.

In the mean time, the crews of all the men-of-war being at their posts, the naval commandant ordered the steamship Paraense, whose fire had been lit at the commencement of the conflict, to tow the corvette as soon as her steam was sufficiently up; and the latter vessel, being in sailing order, was, with the aid of the steamship, quickly in a condition to reclaim the prize. The vessels then started in the following order: the steamship Paraense, the sailing corvette D. Januaria, and the yacht Rio-de-Contas. The Florida being towed by the Federal vessel, it appeared evident that the corvette would soon overtake her.

Chase was then given to these vessels, which were now five miles in advance and under full steam.

Up to seven o'clock in the morning the Paraense, which towed the corvette, gained greatly upon the American vessels, and fighting appeared imminent, when the wind began to fall.

At this time the Florida, which had been hitherto towed, began to make her way under full steam and heavy sail, thus gaining, with the Wachusetts, the advantage over the Brazilian vessels in pursuit.

The chase was vigorously continued by the corvette and the other vessels; but the Americans, still making great way, disappeared from the horizon, and the Brazilians, having lost sight both of land and of the fugitives, abandoned the pursuit at 11.45 in the morning.

The naval commandant, despairing of success, then went, in company with his officers, on board the Paraense; and leaving the corvette and the yacht Rio-de-Contas at sea, returned to the port, which they reached at 3.30 in the afternoon.

The Florida, at the time of her departure, was engaged in repairing her engines, some of the tubes belonging to which still remain in the naval dockyard.

When the proceedings related above became known in the town, the populace immediately repaired to the residence of the American consul, where, after having, by a shower of stones, knocked down the arms placed over the door, they dragged them through the streets. The police then took charge of the consulate, and brought a picket of soldiers for its protection, which remained there during the whole night.

The president of the province has withdrawn the exequatur from the American consul, Mr. Wilson, who, having slept on board the Wachusetts, has gone off in that vessel, and abandoned his post.

To the Editor of THE INDEX.

BAHIA: October 13.

SIR,—The mail steamer being on the point of leaving, I can give you only a very succinct account of the extraordinary event which has filled our town with consternation and passionate indignation. You may, however, depend upon the accuracy of my statement, derived from information on the spot, and confirmed by eye-witnesses.

On the 4th inst. the Confederate steamer Florida came into port for a supply of coals and provisions, and also to make some necessary repairs. Permission was of course granted, and it being found upon the inspection of the Brazilian engineer that the repairs would require more than the customary forty-eight hours, the injured machinery was removed to the Government arsenal, in order to avoid any possible delay. At the time of the Florida's arrival the United States steamer Wachusetts had already been in the port nearly nine days, a concession beyond the usual rules applied to foreign vessels of war, which, as the Wachusetts required no repairs, can be explained only by the friendly relations heretofore subsisting between Brazil and the United States. The commandant of the port, however, to prevent any risk of hostile collision, exacted a pledge which was given by Mr. Wilson, the American Consul, on the one part, and Captain Morris, the commander of the Florida, on the other, that the neutrality of the port should be rigidly protected. For additional protection, the Florida was ordered into the inner harbour, and anchored under the guns of the fort. Moreover, two Brazilian men-of-war moored alongside of her.

The next day the American Consul sent to the commander of the Florida a letter which, not being officially addressed, the latter declined to receive. A second attempt to send the missive by the hands of a Brazilian gentleman was equally unsuccessful, but Captain Morris, learning from the bearer that the letter was a challenge from the commander of the Wachusetts to fight outside the harbour, replied verbally that while in neutral waters he could not entertain a challenge; that he had come to Bahia for a special purpose, which being accomplished, he would go to sea without either seeking or avoiding an encounter with the Wachusetts.

Fancying himself in perfect security, Captain Morris had given alternate detachments of his crew leave to go on shore. On the night of the 6th he himself, a large proportion of his officers, and about half the crew were on shore. From this point we have the narrative of the six men who subsequently escaped the massacre. Towards morning, in the darkest hour of the night, the watch on board the Florida observed a vessel rapidly approaching. When observed she was already quite close, but still her character was not immediately suspected. The watch had barely time to give the alarm before the approaching vessel, which proved to be the Wachusetts, had struck the Florida, at the same instant sweeping her deck with a raking fire of musketry and grape. The Wachusetts then backed and opened her broadsides upon the Florida. The latter vessel being anchored, while her assailant was under full steam, and moreover having her guns unshotted, as is the custom of foreign men-of-war in neutral ports, could only offer a brief and desperate, but ineffectual, resistance. Utterly taken by surprise, her crew, as soon as the men appeared on deck, many of them in their night-clothes and half-naked, were mowed down by the hailstorm of musketry and canister. The officer in charge had therefore no alternative but to surrender. Before, however, he could lower his boat to obey the Wachusetts' summons to come on board, the armed boats from the Wachusetts were approaching the Florida. Seeing this, and fearing that no quarter would be given, fifteen of the Florida's crew jumped into the water to swim on shore or to the neighbouring vessels. The boats from the Wachusetts opened fire upon the fugitives, and nine of them were shot in the water. The only excuse I have yet heard whispered of this inhuman act is that the Federal officers supposed Captain Morris to be among the fugitives.

The action was nearly over when the Brazilian authorities became aroused to what was going on. The Admiral sent his boat to the Wachusetts with a peremptory summons to return to anchor. A promise to this effect was given, but the Admiral's boat was not allowed to come alongside. Meanwhile, the Wachusetts had made fast her hawser to the Florida, and with her prize in tow steamed out to sea. The fort fired three shots at her, but without effect. The Admiral's flagship being a sailing vessel, pursuit was impossible. When a short time later a steamer could be got under way, the Wachusetts was already too far to be overtaken.

I cannot describe to you the rage and indignation of the population of Bahia. The American Consul's house was surrounded by an angry multitude, the consular coat of arms and flag torn down; but the Consul himself, foreseeing this, had taken refuge on board the Wachusetts, and was beyond the reach of personal violence. His exequatur was at once revoked by the President of the province.

All the leading merchants and the foreign Consuls have united in a memorial to protest against this lawless and murderous act, and the hope is universally expressed that the perpetrators may be disavowed and punished by their own Government. A reward of $500,000, offered by the Chamber of Commerce of New York for the capture of the Florida, is believed to have been the inducement of the Federal Consul and commander for this piratical defiance of international law.

The London Press on the Seizure of the 'Florida.'

THE Morning Herald of November 3 has the following:—

A despatch communicated to us by a contemporary who maintains close relations with the agents of the Confederacy narrates a proceeding without precedent or parallel in the history of the world. An act of pure, simple, unmistakable piracy has been committed by one of the great maritime Powers in the harbour of a friendly State. This is no case of uncertain evidence or doubtful law. There is no question as to the distance from shore at which the outrage was committed. There is no doubt, difficulty, or confusion as to the meaning of the law. The criminal can have no excuse, true or false, to plead; and if the offended Power had taken him in the act, and hanged him at the yardarm of his own ship, his Government would have no right to complain. Nay, if his own Government do not instantly release his prize, and offer a complete apology to the injured State, it will be the duty of all the maritime Powers to interfere, and demand reparation for a gross offence against the public law which binds and protects them all. The Confederate steamer Florida had sought refuge in the harbour of Bahia, belonging to the empire of Brazil. The refuge could not be denied her by a neutral Power which continues to permit the ingress of her enemies. Every belligerent has a right to the hospitality of a neutral port, unless that hospitality has been, by previous proclamation, equally denied to both. When within the neutral port he is perfectly safe from molestation. Suppose the Florida had been lying in the Mersey; for a Federal officer to attack her there would have been an offence of precisely the same character as if he had attacked her crew in the streets of Liverpool. If he killed any one we should be entitled to hang him as a murderer; if he carried off the vessel we should be entitled to pursue, sink his ship, recover the prize, and extort from his Government an apology for the outrage. In a word, there is no more uncertainty as to the law of neutral harbours than as to the law of murder on land. The Florida, therefore, was under the protection of the Brazilian flag so long as she chose to remain in Bahia. If, during her stay, a Federal cruiser should enter that harbour, it was the duty of Brazil to take care that an interval of at least twenty-four hours should elapse between the departure of one belligerent and the pursuit of the other. To render the performance of that duty and the office of protection more easy, knowing the lawless temper of the Yankees, the Florida anchored under the guns of the Brazilian forts and men of war. In that position she was captured by a Federal man-of-war, the Wachusetts: in direct and flagrant violation of the neutrality of Brazil, the rules of war, and the universal law of nations. We challenge the Federal organs in this country to offer anything in the shape of an excuse for this act of piracy. They cannot deny that a neutral harbour is as sacred as neutral territory; they cannot deny that to violate either is a heinous and unpardonable crime; nor can they, as they have so often done heretofore, accept the statements of Yankee officers in disproof of the most positive testimony to the facts of the case. There is no manner of doubt here either as to the facts or the law. What, then, do the organs of Mr. Bright and of Mr. Adams think of their Northern clients?

If it should prove that Brazil was a consenting party to this act of unparalleled treachery and lawlessness, her dereliction of duty will in no sort exonerate the principal offender. Brazil could not give him the right to attack a Southern ship in her waters without previously declaring war against the Confederate States, which she has not done. But there is not, as yet, the slightest reason to suppose that a Government hitherto respected, and deserving of respect, had suddenly been guilty of so infamous a treason against the laws of hospitality, neutrality, and national independence. It is incredible that any sovereign having the slightest respect for himself or for his Crown could have given permission for the violation of his neutrality by a foreign Power. We do not believe that Lord Russell himself would permit a Federal man-of-war to seize a Confederate ship in an English port; and we have no reason for supposing the Emperor of Brazil to be no braver or more dignified than Lord Russell. The only fault of which the Brazilian authorities seem to have been guilty is that of timidity. Their duty was to fire into the pirate the instant that her designs were disclosed. That they did not do so must be ascribed to their fear of the vast naval superiority of the United States, their knowledge of the lawless character of their Government, and their just apprehension that, if they should do their duty, and enforce the rule of public law upon the too-powerful criminal, they would not be supported by the only Power whose flag divides with that of the Union the fear and respect of the American States. If England had been, as she ought to have been, on loyal terms of friendship with Brazil, and had been governed by men in whose honour and courage the allies of England could confide, the Imperial Government would never have made so unworthy a concession to the menaces of the Yankees. Time was when even so feeble a sovereign as the Emperor of Brazil would rather have had his capital blown to pieces than forfeited his honour by such a compliance; but since those days the self-respect of minor Powers has been grievously impaired, and by nothing so much as by the blustering, insulting diplomacy of Lord Palmerston and of the present Foreign Secretary. Brazil may have to render a strict account hereafter for her conduct on this occasion. There is no doubt that her compliance, however reluctant, would justify the Confederate States in exacting a signal reparation. But the real guilt rests with that Government on whose protection Brazil ought to have been able to rely, and which, as she well knew, would have abandoned her to her fate.

The case is one in which all maritime Powers are interested. When the lawless violence of Captain Wilkes led him into a far less flagrant outrage on our own flag the other Powers frankly and loyally came to our assistance, and, taking up the cause in the common interest of the civilised world, addressed a sharp and peremptory remonstrance to the Government by which the piracy had been sanctioned and seemed likely to be supported. Brazil is not able, as we were, to avenge her own honour. It is imperative upon the maritime Powers at large, and upon France and England in particular, to take up the case on behalf of one too weak to protect herself. We are all equally interested in maintaining the sanctity of neutral waters; for there is no nation whose ships may not, at one time or another, be forced to seek shelter in the ports of a friendly Power; and if they are liable to be there seized or attacked by an enemy international confidence and maritime commerce can no longer exist in time of war. We can hardly hope that England will do her duty. The cowardice of some members of the Administration and the Northern sympathies of others have induced them hitherto on every occasion to take the part of the Federal Government, whether against the Confederates or against their own countrymen. No word of rebuke from England followed the outrage committed by the seizure of two Confederate officers in Morocco; and we dare say that this outrage on the collective rights and interests of the maritime Powers will be regarded by Lord Russell with similar equanimity. But the Emperor of the French is neither a coward nor a Federalist; he regards with equal disgust and contempt the cringing servility of the English, and the brutal insolence of the Federal Government; and it is not impossible that he may choose to exhibit in striking contrast the dignified disinterestedness of France and the selfish timidity of her ancient rival, by undertaking personally to redress a wrong which, though it be an injury to the civilised world at large, is yet especially addressed to the first of naval Powers, and cannot be passed over in silence without degrading yet further the tarnished honour and damaged prestige of England.

The Times has the following:—

The capture of the Florida by the Wachusetts in Brazilian waters was reported by telegraph from Lisbon some days ago, but it was not until yesterday that the flagrantly lawless nature of this proceeding could be appreciated. The story, as it has now reached us from authentic sources, beats those related of Paul Jones, and carries us back to the time when the Spanish main was made infamous by the piratical deeds of civilised nations.

After giving the facts of the seizure, the Times proceeds:—

Most aggressions on neutral rights, such as the pursuit of a flying enemy within the jurisdiction of a neutral State, have some kind of excuse, whether in authority or usage, but we cannot even conjecture what defence can be set up for this. The United States have invariably claimed the absolute inviolability of neutral territory, and the American text books of international law are full of the most dogmatic assertions of this principle. One of the most recent of these, which bears the name of Halleck on its title-page, recapitulates the law on this subject with great force and clearness. 'The armed cruisers of belligerents, while within the jurisdiction of a neutral State, are bound to abstain from any acts of hostility towards the subjects, vessels, or other property of their enemies; they cannot increase their guns or military stores, or augment their crews, not even by the enrolment of their own countrymen; they can employ neither force nor strategem to recover prizes, or to rescue prisoners in the possession of the enemy: nor can they use a neutral port or waters within neutral jurisdiction, either for the purpose of hindering the approach of vessels of any nation whatever, or for the purpose of attacking those which depart from the ports or shores of neutral Powers. No proximate acts of war, such as a ship stationing herself within the neutral line, and sending out her boats on hostile enterprises, can, in any manner, be allowed to originate on neutral territory: nor can any measure be taken that will lead to immediate violence.' We owe our readers some apology for reentering upon ground already familiar to most in connection with the Alexandra case, but this summary may at least serve to remind them how far beyond the extreme pale of international law the Wachusetts placed herself by cutting an enemy's ship out of a neutral port. Had the Florida, for instance, actually sailed from Bahia, the Wachusetts could not have followed her till after the lapse of twenty-four hours, without infringing the law of nations. To attack her by night in the harbour, and that after a solemn pledge had been given that neutral rights should be respected, was neither more nor less illegal than it would have been to kidnap Mr. Mason in the streets of London. The plea that was urged by Lord Ashburton and admitted by Mr. Webster in the very dissimilar case of the Caroline—that of 'a necessity of self-defence, instant, overwhelming, leaving no choice of means, and no moment for deliberation'—was here conspicuously wanting, and we cannot believe that the Federal Government will condescend to make use of it. It may possibly be alleged that the Consul was carried off against his will by the captain of the Wachusetts, who is likely enough to claim the whole credit and responsibility of the exploit, and it is to be feared that some of Mr. Barnum's countrymen may chuckle over its shameless audacity. But the New York Chamber of Commerce has a character to lose, and, unless we are greatly deceived, will scruple to forfeit it by rewarding or justifying a crime so utterly subversive of confidence between neutrals and belligerents.

The Morning Post has the following:—

Whatever may be the shortcomings of the Federal Government, it cannot fairly be alleged that they are not served by very zealous officers. The representatives of what was once the American Union conceive it to be their mission to restore that Union in all its pristine integrity and splendour, and, so that the end shall be accomplished, they have on all occasions manifested the most supreme indifference as to the means by which it is attained. Animated by these feelings, they have no little reason to congratulate themselves on the readiness which their chosen servants have on every possible occasion manifested to give effect to their views. In their belligerent character their relations have been twofold—namely, with their enemies and with neutral States; and the obligations arising out of these relations they have, whenever it suited their purpose, or seemed to do so, studiously disregarded. The usages of civilised States impose restrictions, dictated by humanity, on the mode of conducting hostilities; but, in their anxiety to resuscitate their model republic, they have declared that, if needs be, the territory of their foes shall be converted into a howling wilderness, and the people by which it is inhabited utterly exterminated. Nor have they been more mindful of the duties imposed by the laws of nations in their relations as belligerents with neutral States. It is needless to recall a memorable occasion on which an officer in the Federal navy grossly outraged a foreign flag, and was nevertheless applauded for his zeal by the head of his department and publicly thanked by the House of Representatives, pending the receipt of those demands for redress from the aggrieved State, with which, notwithstanding all their braggadocio, the Federal Government deemed it expedient to comply. In a word, whenever they believed they could do so with impunity, the Government of which Mr. Lincoln is the head, and its officers, have equally set at defiance public opinion and public law. Serious, however, and manifold as have been their transgressions hitherto, they have been eclipsed by the outrage recently committed in the harbour of Bahia. The capture of the Florida by the Wachusetts, when lying at anchor in Brazilian waters and under the guns of Brazilian forts and ships of war, is perhaps, for cool audacity, and the contempt manifested for the territorial rights of a neutral State, unrivalled even in the records of American impudence.

(Here follows the report.)

Such is the plain, unvarnished statement of one of the most wanton and, we would also add, the most wicked outrages ever committed by a vessel of war belonging to a belligerent Power whilst in neutral waters. It is the joint act of the late American Consul at Bahia and the captain of the Wachusetts; and, until an opportunity has been afforded to the Federal Government of repudiating it, and meting out to the perpetrators the punishment which they deserve, the blame attaches solely to the latter. It is believed that the immense reward offered by the New York Chamber of Commerce for the capture of the Florida furnished the main inducement for thus setting the laws of nations, of honour, and of humanity alike at defiance, and for this reason the American Government may perhaps feel the less reluctance to disavow the act of their officers. But when we bear in mind the habitual arrogance of that Government, and when we recollect how powerless Brazil is to enforce redress, if redress should be refused, we cannot help entertaining misgivings respecting the future course of the Federal authorities. In any event, however, this outrage cannot be allowed to pass unnoticed by the other neutral Powers. When Commodore Wilkes dragged the Confederate Commissioners from beneath the protection of our flag, France, Russia, and other Powers instructed their representatives at Washington to protest against an act which was directed, not against the rights of this country alone, but against those of every neutral State. It is in the same light that the insult now offered to Brazil should be regarded, and it should equally evoke the strenuous protests of every maritime State. What was done in Bahia may be repeated in an English or a French port, and the case of the Brazilian Government may any day become our own. No justification can possibly be offered for the capture of the Florida and for the murder of a portion of her crew; and it would not only be graceful, but it would be prudent, on the part of the European maritime Powers to cause such representations to be made at Washington as may secure for the Brazilian Government that redress which, though entitled to demand, they would, without aid, be unable to secure.

The Daily Telegraph has the following:—

The capture of the celebrated Confederate cruiser Florida in a Brazilian harbour has been attended by such breaches of good faith and international rights as must be somewhat shocking even to an American conscience. We suppose that the duplicity and falsehood to which the commander of the Federal steamer Wachusetts resorted for the purpose of securing his prize will be excused on the ground that everything is fair in love and war; but this is true only as between the contending parties, and does not justify insult or injury of neutrals. The offence of which the aggressor has been guilty is precisely the same in nature as if he had pursued his antagonist up the Thames into the Pool, and had poured broadsides into her within sight of London Bridge. The practical difference between the two cases, however, is this—that the neutral Government upon which the outrage has been inflicted is too weak to effectually resent it; whereas, had a similar indignity been practised within the British jurisdiction, the offending vessel would have insured her own capture or destruction. The gist of the offence in the present instance is not the stratagem practised against the Florida, but the outrageous violation of the neutral rights of Brazil. We do not, of course, expect that United States ships should exhibit candour and perfect good faith towards their crafty and light-heeled foes; we do not expect the police to announce to a burglar that he is 'wanted' until they are tolerably confident that he is within their grasp. The constable generally prefers to slip on the handcuffs quietly when the fugitive is not on the look-out, and similarly we may be sure that Confederate commanders, if caught at all, must be caught napping. They will not voluntarily put themselves in the way of antagonists of greatly superior power, and therefore, so far as relates to the combatants, we do not know that there is much to be complained of in the recent capture. But the subject as it affects the Government of Brazil is altogether different, and it is one in which we, as neutrals, are very much interested. The point at issue is this: Shall the belligerents be allowed to fight out their quarrels in the territory of foreign States which studiously hold aloof from the conflict? It is almost superfluous to answer the question, and absurd to cite authorities in support of the obvious rights of neutrals to protect their territory from the ravages of a war in which they do not participate. If any exception to this principle were tolerated, we might have cannon-balls flying among the shipping of the Thames or Mersey, and Yankees and Southerners fighting pitched battles in our streets.

That such an event should cause anything but unmitigated satisfaction in New York is not to be supposed. The sharp practice, the broken pledge, the shameless falsehood, will appear of small moment compared with the capture of a hated foe. The disgust and amazement with which we should learn that an officer of Her Majesty's navy had deliberately violated his word of honour are feelings with which the American public evinces but little sympathy. Their present satisfaction, moreover, is not subject to that serious qualification which existed in the capture of Messrs. Mason and Slidell from an English vessel. In that case, the most rabid of the Federals must have been somewhat troubled by the apprehension of British resentment. In the present instance there is no need for similar alarm. Brazil is much too weak a Power to cope with the United States. The insulted Government has, by withdrawing the exequatur of the American consul, evinced its indignation, but is of course unable to obtain real redress. The unscrupulous Federals will, therefore, regard their achievement with unmitigated satisfaction. They overlook the fearful cost to themselves at which successes such as these are purchased—the loss of national honour, and the universal distrust of other nations. If they could adequately measure the self-injury which results from their Punic disregard of honour, truth, and international rights, they would discover that the capture of the Florida is in reality a ruinous triumph.

The Standard has the following:

We published yesterday a detailed account of the piratical capture of the Confederate sloop of war Florida in the neutral harbour of Bahia. As simply announced by telegraph the case looked black enough; the particulars now received enhance, if that be possible, the guilt of the captors. It appears that their piracy was preceded and prepared by a deliberate perjury, and aggravated by cold-blooded murder. At the same time we are glad to find that we were misled in regard to the conduct of the Brazilian authorities; that they were deceived and surprised, and did their utmost to prevent or punish the crime. The facts are these. The Florida entered the harbour of Bahia while the Wachusetts was lying there, and required permission to take in coal, and to make some necessary repairs in her machinery. These demands the law of nations would not permit the Brazilian authorities to refuse, even had they been as servilely devoted to the Federal cause as Lord Russell himself. The visitor was permitted to repair her engine, and to remain so long as might be necessary for that purpose, and no longer. For greater security she was anchored under the guns of the forts, with two Brazilian men-of-war near her. One of these, however, appears to have been a sailing vessel, and the other a steamer of small size, so that they were not powerful enough to afford any real protection if the Federal vessel should be disposed to employ violence against a neutral flag in a neutral harbour. The American consul, however, solemnly pledged himself for the good conduct of the Wachusetts; and the captain of the Florida was so far satisfied that he allowed the damaged portion of the machinery to go on shore; and he himself, with half his crew, was on shore on the night of October 6. Before daylight the Wachusetts suddenly steamed down upon the Florida, carried away a portion of her bulwarks, and fired into her repeated volleys of grape and canister, killing and wounding many of her men. The officer in command, being utterly unable to make any effectual resistance, at length obeyed the summons of the assailant, and surrendered his vessel. Fifteen of the seamen hereupon jumped overboard and swam for the shore; but nine of them were murdered by the cowardly scoundrels on the Wachusetts, who fired upon them while in the water. After they had taken possession of their ill-gotten prize the captors fastened a rope to her mast, and proceeded to tow her out to sea. The consul, Mr. Wilson, whose honour had been pledged for the conduct of the Wachusetts, made his escape on board her. The pirate was summoned to return to her anchorage, but contemptuously pursued her course; and the Brazilians had no force capable of bringing her back. But for this circumstance, of course, the crime would never have been committed. To shoot seamen in a neutral harbour is an act of precisely the same character as to shoot them down in the streets of a neutral town; and had the assassins been taken Brazil would have been entitled and bound to bring them to trial and execution with the least possible delay. As it is, they have escaped; and their crime now rests upon the shoulders of their Government. Mr. Lincoln must either bring them to a courtmartial for piracy and murder, or adopt their act, and proclaim to all the world that the Government of the United States is hostis humani generis; that it respects no public law, no sovereign rights, no neutral territory, which it dares to violate; and that if it refrains from attacking Mr. Mason in the streets of London, and chasing Confederate cruisers into the ports of France and Spain, it is only from fear of the vengeance which Powers greater than Brazil may exact. Those who remember the famous suppressed dispatch, in which Mr. Seward threatened that Federal vessels should pursue and attack the Alabama in English ports, may easily conjecture what course the Government at Washington is likely to adopt towards the officer who has rendered so important a service at the trifling price of outraging and affronting the feeble empire of Brazil.

On the character of the act we need waste few words. There is no sort of question as to the absolute jurisdiction of independent Powers over their own ports. A belligerent has no more right to assail his enemy in a neutral port than on neutral soil; in either case killing is murder, and the attack may either be punished on the spot, by the municipal laws of the offended country, or made the subject of reclamation or reprisals against the Government of the offenders. Any Power of the first rank would, in such a case, at once avenge its honour by war: or, if it could act with sufficient promptitude, by pursuing and either capturing or sinking the guilty ship. The warmest partisans of the North would not venture to propose, if such an outrage had been committed in the Mersey or the Thames, that we should adopt any milder measures. But as Brazil is the sufferer, and as certain persons in this country, whose own misconduct has involved them and the nation in unpleasant relations with that empire, have done their best to get up a feeling of ill-will towards Brazil, one organ is found willing to attempt an apology for the outrage, in reliance on English prejudice against the victim. Two precedents are cited. It is said that English ships once destroyed some slavers, and a fort which protected them, on Brazilian territory. This has no sort of connection with the present case. We claimed a right to put down the slave trade; and if we had that right we were entitled to destroy slavers and their protectors. This is a case where no right can possibly be claimed—a case of naked, lawless violence against an unoffending neutral in his own harbour. The other alleged precedent is the seizure of an American privateer in a Portuguese harbour. At that time Portugal was almost an English dependency; and so little was the Peninsula considered as neutral that contraband cargoes bound thither were condemned by American Courts as if they had been sent to England herself. But what is conclusive against this precedent is, that the United States extorted and obtained from Portugal compensation for the capture. There is, therefore, no precedent for such an outrage, but a very strong one for its condemnation and punishment. The last excuse alleged for the outrage is a very strange one. Mr. Seward has repeatedly alleged that the Brazilian Government favoured the Confederate vessels; therefore he has a right to attack them in Brazilian harbours. It happens that Mr. Seward, whose veracity on such matters is not unimpeached, has made the same charge against England. Will our contemporary advise us to submit in patience if some Federal cruiser should seize the Tallahassie in a British port?

The duty of England in this matter is clear and pressing—to return to Brazil the support we received from our allies when a far less atrocious insult was offered to our own flag in the case of the Trent. To shrink from this duty is to expose ourselves to the bitter contempt and scornful reproaches of all who remember how ready we were to welcome the disinterested efforts of other Powers in the cause of public law and neutral rights, and witness our own unwillingness to raise a finger when the rights infringed are not our own. The character of the Florida has nothing to do with the matter. She is called a privateer, which is a silly piece of childish petulance, inasmuch as she is a commissioned man-of-war; and she is accused of violating public law by burning her prizes, though all persons who have ever looked into a law book know that a captor who cannot bring an enemy's ship into port has a right—nay, is bound—to 'sink, burn, or destroy it.' But if these petulant falsehoods were facts they would not affect the case. The Florida is a belligerent ship; Bahia is a neutral harbour; and the seizure of a belligerent ship in a neutral harbour is an unpardonable crime, not against the belligerent, but against the neutral, and against the collective interests and rights of the neutral world which are not affected by the character of the captured ship. The question is not one 'between Brazil and the United States,' it is one between the United States and all maritime Powers. It is the question of right against might, of national sovereignty against high-handed aggression, of public law against a lawless nation and a Government which has defied and insulted the opinion of Christendom. Those who set the example of disregarding the plainest rights of neutrals, and carrying the evils of war into the waters and territories of peaceful nations utterly unconcerned in their quarrels, are the foes not of one nation, but of all, and the common interests of the civilised world demand that a peremptory interposition on the part of the great Powers should oblige the perpetrators of a piratical outrage on an unoffending State to make an ample, complete, and humiliating apology and reparation.

The Globe has the following:—

It may be, perhaps, premature to speak of a matter upon which we are as yet but very curtly informed by telegraph, and respecting which another day or two must supply us with more exact particulars; but there seems little room for doubt that one of the officers of the Federal navy has committed a gross breach of international law. We allude to the capture of the Confederate steamer Florida, of which The Index, the London Confederate organ, gives the following official account:—'The Confederate authorities in London have received a telegraphic despatch, dated Lisbon, from Captain Morris, commander of the Confederate steamsnip Florida, announcing the capture of that vessel, on October 7, by the Federal steamer Wachusetts, in the harbour of Bahia. At the time of the capture the Florida was lying under the guns of the Brazilian forts and of the Brazilian fleet, and Captain Morris was on shore.'

If this statement be correct, there can be no doubt that another outrage of even a graver and more unjustifiable kind than that which called forth such decided action on the part of our Government just three years ago has been committed. In the present instance Brazil is the Power directly aggrieved; but in a certain sense the act affects every Power with a seaboard. Nothing in the international code is more distinctly laid down than that belligerents shall not engage in neutral waters, and a clear distance of three miles from any point of the shore is prescribed as that within which no act of war shall take place. Indeed, for all purposes, the waters within this line are as much part of the country which they lave as the streets of her capital or the palace of her monarch. Offences against the person or property of individuals within those limits, are open to be dealt with by the municipal law, equally with a murder or a robbery on shore. The reason for this is so obvious and so important that the nations of the world cannot but regard any departure from the rule with anxiety and displeasure. Neutrals must not be endangered by a war with which they have nothing to do. We would not allow Federals and Confederates to fight it out in Fleet Street, to the nuisance, and perhaps destruction, of the peaceful inhabitants. The right which we have to keep our soil free extends beyond our shores to that distance which has been agreed upon as a fair line of protection from the projectiles and explosions incidental to a naval action. . . . . .
The Florida and her Federal assailant were equally enjoying the hospitality of the Brazilians, and the rules for preventing the abuse of that hospitality are so clearly laid down that the belligerents have no right to leave the neutral limits within twenty-four hours of each other. That this offence should have been committed, as we are told, under the guns of the Brazilian forts, and in the midst of the Brazilian fleet, is a matter for surprise, and it certainly seems to give some sign of probability to the statement, that the local authorities were more or less parties to the proceeding. We should hope, however, that the detailed accounts will clear the Brazilians of what would be an act of gross treachery on their part—an act more detestable, both morally and internationally, than that of the Federal captain.

The following remarks appeared in the Globe on the receipt of full advices:—

The subjoined extracts, which we lay before our readers, from a private letter from Bahia, confirm, from a trustworthy and independent source, the main facts of the treacherous and lawless capture of the Confederate war steamer Florida, while anchored in a neutral port, and under the immediate and recognised protection of a neutral State. Unfortunately, as the captors doubtless anticipated with some degree of confidence, that protection proved anything rather than effective when it came to voies de fait. On the other hand, it may fairly be urged that any local authorities might be taken by surprise, who had gone to sleep, as they might well suppose themselves safe in doing on the security of the pledged word of the commissioned officer of a hitherto reputed civilised Government, and with the additional guarantee of the equally pledged word of its resident commercial representative at their port. If the Confederate captain and crew themselves were caught napping after such positive assurances, notwithstanding the better knowledge they may be supposed to have had of the extent to which they could trust their enemies, the Brazilian functionaries may comparatively be considered excusable for not having been wide awake, at three o'clock in the morning, against the occurrence of an outrage which they had the word of honour of officers—who were to be supposed men of honour—would not be attempted. The rescue of the honour of the Federal flag now rests with the Federal Government.

Here follow the extracts alluded to. The Globe then continues:—

The bait held out for the capture of the Confederate cruiser by the New York Chamber of Commerce (500,000 dollars) coupled with the reliance which may be assumed to have been felt by the captors on the lack of vigour of the Brazilian local authorities, may be considered as accounting for the extraordinary audacity of this most lawless proceeding. And we cannot but say that it may be very gravely doubted with what degree of propriety a commercial body take upon them to offer such inducements to a national service. Is it to be supposed that officers, who hold their country's commission, will do less than their duty, unless, in addition to the ordinary and legitimate prizes which reward success in doing it, mercantile men bribe them to their work with promised dollars? Or could it be intended to incite them, by holding forth that bait, to do more than their duty? It is for the New York Chamber of Commerce to answer. With the Federal Government, they stand before the tribunal of the whole civilised world, and it is not too much to say that the conduct which they may hold in this case will decide whether they deliberately elect for themselves the position of outlaws in the face of the jurisdiction of the whole civilised world.

The Daily News has the following:—

We have not thought it necessary, in the case of the Florida, seized by the Wachusetts in the neutral harbour of Bahia, to depart from the usual English course of hearing the evidence on both sides before forming an opinion. At present we believe not a line has been published in this country from any officer or friend of the Government of the United States with reference to the proceedings, either of the captain of the Wachusetts or of Consul Wilson, and of course there has not been time to learn how they are regarded at Washington. The accounts that have appeared in the English press are almost exclusively of Confederate origin, and leave traces of the natural feelings of their authors. If they are substantially true, the Captain of the Wachusetts has done his Government more injury than it was in the power of the whole Confederate navy to do, by committing a lawless outrage for which it will have to give satisfaction. The rules of maritime law as to the rights of neutrals are too plain, and the interests of all maritime Powers in maintaining them too evident, to admit of any controversy as soon as the facts have been ascertained, nor is there any doubt of the language which every English journalist will hold on the subject.

The following is from the Morning Star:—

When we have stated these general principles, however, the case is by no means complete. A neutral, to enjoy immunity and to have her sovereignty respected, must respect herself. She must take care that she does not favour one belligerent at the expense of another, that she does not permit one to use her ports as convenient naval bases from which cruisers may issue, furnished with all the necessary appliances of war, for the purpose of destroying the commerce of the other, and then make a practice of running for protection to the same harbours so as to elude the pursuit of enemies. This would not be tolerated by any belligerent who was strong enough to resent it; and, unfortunately for Brazil, the Confederate privateers have constantly been hovering around her ports, and, while burning United States vessels trading to Brazil, off the Brazilian coast, have run into her ports at the first sign of danger, have got coals consigned to them from Liverpool to be delivered in Brazilian harbours, and generally have made themselves disagreeable visitors. The Alabama on one occasion burned three or four American whalers close to a Brazilian harbour, and the Government of the Emperor punished by removal the governor of the island, who, after the occurrence, permitted Captain Semmes to obtain supplies. It is impossible to separate the act which has just been committed from the whole circumstances which have occurred during the war, and looking at those and the correspondence which has already taken place between the two Governments, we should imagine that the United States rely for justification upon the peculiar and exceptional circumstances connected with Brazilian neutrality. On July 13, 1863, Mr. Seward directed the Minister to the Brazils to say to the Secretary for Foreign Affairs of that empire, 'that if nations shall, in violation of our rights, suffer their ports to become bases for the operations of pirates against us, we shall adopt such remedies as the laws of self-defence allow. It is the earnest desire of the United States to remain at peace with all nations. We have sought specially to deserve the friendship of Brazil, and shall persevere in that friendly policy so long as the Emperor shall accord to us commercial and national rights, which are not less essential to Brazil and all the other American States than to ourselves.' From what has taken place we may fairly infer that the United States Government had come to the conclusion that Brazil was giving undue protection to the Confederate cruisers, such protection as amounted to an unfriendly act to the United States, thus forcing them to fall back upon those laws of self-defence which, after all, must be the paramount rule for all nations. Of the necessity for the application of those abnormal rules the United States is the proper judge, and it is a right which no State worthy of being included in the family of nations would ever consent to give up at the dictation either of a neutral or of foreign Powers. If Brazil has cause of complaint she may insist on an apology or reparation, and if that is refused withdraw her ambassador, as she did from this country a few months ago, as a formal protest against a Power which she is not strong enough to fight.

One thing is very clear—it is not a question which England can touch even with the longest possible diplomatic pole. In these days of steam cruisers English interests imperatively require, in the event of war, the observance of a strict neutrality by neutrals. If we should ever be unfortunately precipitated into war with the United States we must have no Alabamas and Floridas from France or Holland preying on our commerce, burning our ships, and then sneaking into a neutral port whenever a frigate appeared in sight. We must have no coaling of privateers in French, Dutch, or Spanish ports; no rendezvous for coal-laden jackals at the Azores, no toleration, in short, for belligerency under the garb of neutrality. Then this wretched vessel which has been captured was provided to the Confederates by a breach of our own laws, and by a violation of the proclamation of our Sovereign. The Liverpool shipbuilders have shut our mouths on the question. We could not touch the case without being taunted with the paternity of our bastard progeny. We should be told that had the vessel not been permitted to sail from our ports, the difficulty would never have occurred. Not only her origin, but the character of the Florida's career prevents us interfering. The burning of vessels on the high seas without taking them into port for adjudication is a more flagrant breach of international law than her seizure, even were there no justification, and England, above all nations, has no interest in fostering these ocean outlaws. Again, the character of our relations with Brazil entirely precludes our interference. She accuses us of seizing her own vessels in her own harbours unjustifiably, and has withdrawn her ambassador in consequence; we formerly entered one of her ports and captured four vessels, alleged to be slavers, and when a fort tried to protect them with its fire we demolished the fort. There is on record a resolution of the Brazilian Legislature desiring to place their ships under the protection of some strong Power to save them from what they called the violence of British cruisers. Clearly our protest against high-handed dealings with Brazil would be regarded by the world as the sublimity of hypocrisy. So far as we are concerned the Florida must 'slide,' and we contemplate the result with equanimity, as the question is entirely one between Brazil and the United States now, and between Brazil and the Confederate States hereafter, should they ever establish their independence.

THE PRESIDENTIAL ELECTIONS OF 1856 AND 1860.

WITHIN the next four days, in the ordinary course of postal service with America, possibly within the next forty-eight hours, we shall hear the result of the recent Presidential election in the United States. While the steamer which bears the intelligence is nearing the shores of England, it may not be unprofitable for us to recur to the incidents which attended the last two preceding elections, and therein to mark the signs that indicated only too truly the approaching dissolution of the great Republic. Few, perhaps, who witnessed the exciting movement of that stormy drama, still fewer who participated in its action, looked forward to a close so tragical and so immediate. That the political strife, which had been gradually growing fiercer and fiercer for years as it absorbed within its elements the hate of sections and the frenzy of fanaticism, would at last end in blood, no thoughtful observer of the times could doubt; but men weakly deferred the evil to some distant future which should be sufficient thereunto, and patriots of a generation gone by had fondly uttered the prayer of WEBSTER that upon their eyes that day of darkness might never dawn. And yet it came, bringing its desolation which would now seem to have been inevitable. In the retrospect of the eight eventful years which have passed since North and South were first distinctly arrayed against each other upon a geographical line, narrowly noting the evidences that were afforded from time to time during that period of a deadly animosity between the two divisions, it appears to us little short of amazing that the struggle was not clearly foreseen, and that the authors of the great sorrow did not shrink back appalled from the too apparent consequences of their madness and folly.

It was in the contest of 1856, indisputably, that the great masses of the Northern people, under the leadership of corrupt disappointed politicians, were for the first time organised against the South upon a sectional issue, and urged on to dominate over the weaker party by the mere force of a numerical majority. The nomination of JOHN C. FREMONT by the Republican Convention which assembled at Philadelphia in June, 1856, was made at a time seemingly most propitious. When the old Whig party died, upon the defeat of its candidate, General WINFIELD SCOTT, in 1852, a new organisation had suddenly sprung into existence under the denomination of the 'Know-Nothing party,' so called, for no other reason that can be perceived, than that whoever was outside of its pale could 'know nothing' of its operations. An oath of secresy was taken by all who united themselves with it, and the meetings of its local clubs were conducted with closed doors. In the party slang of the day, the Know-Nothings carried on their work in the 'culvert,' and the 'dark-lantern' was the emblem of their order. They were known to each other by pass-words and grips of the hand. In the Northern States, this new society grew all at once extremely formidable. It triumphed in the municipal and State elections everywhere. The Democrats found themselves powerless to contend with an opposition which worked in the dark, and ruled its individual members by the irresistible authority of a sworn allegiance. The term by which this mysterious and most potent opposition was generally called in the popular assembly, in the streets, and in the beerhouses, was SAM; and SAM marched on from victory to victory, claiming town after town and State after State for his own, to the consternation of the Democrats, until it appeared almost certain that he would walk into the Presidency, and hang up his hat in the White House at Washington. But his career was brought to a sudden and melancholy termination. Virginia was about to elect a Governor, the second that had ever been chosen in that State, so well known for its conservatism and its adherence to constitutional liberty, by the direct vote of the people. The cardinal doctrine of the Know-Nothing party was Native Americanism, by which was meant, not a wholesome reform in the laws of naturalisation, but the political excommunication of all foreigners, and a bitter warfare upon the Roman Catholic Church. Virginia was not blind to the evils that had been brought upon the country by the undue immigration of foreigners, and the over-easy admission of them to the high privileges of citizenship; but if there were two heresies in politics more odious to her than all others, they were secresy in matters of public concern and the imposition of religious tests. She had always repudiated the ballot-box and demanded vivâ-voce voting at the polls, holding that no man had a right to vote who had not the manliness to avow his sentiments; and her Bill of Religious Freedom, from the pen of THOMAS JEFFERSON, was one of the muniments of their liberties of which her sons were most justly proud. Accordingly, when the people came to record their suffrages for a Governor, although the Know-Nothings had made the most energetic efforts to secure the success of their candidate, and up to that hour had never been defeated in an election, the Democrats prevailed by a very large majority, and HENRY A. WISE had the honour of having given the quietus to SAM for all time. Never, perhaps, in history had the fortunes of a party or an individual undergone in so short a period so complete and mournful a change. In 1854 his word might have prevailed against the world. In 1855 there were none so poor to do him reverence.*

It was just at this crisis in political affairs, when the Whig party was quite dead, and the Know-Nothings had been effectually vanquished and dispersed, that the Republicans or Freesoilers began to combine for a vigorous contest with the Democrats, who alone remained in the field. FRANKLIN PIERCE was in office, a pure man whose administration of the government had been guided by honest impulses and wise counsels; but the leaders of the Republican party, among whom WILLIAM H. SEWARD had already become conspicuous, thought they saw the opportunity of success in the restless efforts of the 'outs' against the 'ins,' and they speedily formed themselves into an organisation, which was all the more dangerous because it was likely that the vote of the South would be divided between two candidates. In the preparations for the campaign two candidates were, indeed, presented to the people —JAMES BUCHANAN of Pennsylvania, nominated by the Democratic Convention, and MILLARD FILLMORE of New York, who was brought forward by a ghostly assemblage of the departed Whigs at Philadelphia. But, happily or unhappily, as may be thought by persons of various opinions, the sectional triumph was not won in 1856, and the arbitrament of the sword was postponed for four more years, which were to be crowded with causes of embitterment and exasperation. Mr. FILLMORE received only the vote of Maryland, and this was secured by frauds in the city of Baltimore without a precedent theretofore in the history of the United States. The undivided South cast their votes for Mr. BUCHANAN; and the Northern States, with the exception of California, Illinois, Indiana, and Pennsylvania, voted for FREMONT. But the exception was everything. The electoral vote of Pennsylvania alone decided the contest. Had it been given to FREMONT, it would have secured his election. But Pennsylvania voted for her own son, and thus the sectional triumph was for the time averted—as some delusively imagined, was shown to be thenceforth impossible. We cannot fail to be struck, however, with the fact that in the narrow escape of the country at that juncture, and the small margin that was left to the Democrats in their success, lay the certain doom of the Union. Such was the campaign of 1856.

It will probably distress the political sensibilities of none, at this day, to declare that Mr. BUCHANAN as President was a failure. The Republicans, who felt their strength, did whatever they could to embarrass the Administration; and the fruitful source of controversy, that had been brought into Congress in the legislation rendered necessary by the territorial question, especially as it applied to Kansas and Nebraska, might well have perplexed wiser Cabinets and rulers than held their seats in Washington. The imbecility of the PRESIDENT was, perhaps, not fully shown until, near the close of his administration, he was called to deal with the Commissioners of the Seceded States. But we will suffer the weakness and duplicity of that mauvais quart d'heure to pass without comment. The causes of excitement and animosity between North and South were of such a nature, however, that no ability at the head of affairs could have sufficed to compose the quarrel or to postpone yet longer the inevitable resort to arms. In Kansas the fight had already begun, and the churches of the North had been converted into armouries, if not into drill-rooms, for the recruits that were sent to shoot down the Southern citizen who should practically assert his right to carry a slave into that territory. Not to refer to private combats and individual outrages, which had inflamed greatly the popular mind, the JOHN BROWN raid into Virginia with fire and sword, approved, as it had been, by the general acclaim of the Northern people, was of itself enough to embroil the country in war. There was a pretence of disclaimer of this armed invasion; many honest men of the North were shocked at an attempt to excite a servile insurrection throughout the Southern States, and meetings were held at various points, in which 'Union-saving' resolutions were adopted that denounced the purpose of John Brown; but it could not be concealed that the great heart of the North—that heart which responded to the eloquence of Wendell Phillips, and was stirred by the poetry of Whittier—was sympathetic with the murderer of Harper's Ferry. The pulpits rang with execrations of Virginia and Governor Wise when John Brown came to his just fate upon the gallows; funeral guns were fired on that day. flags drooped at half-mast, New England and the North-West gave every outward manifestation of their grief and their purpose of revenge. With such a condition of the Northern mind, and the South naturally aroused to resentment and suspicion, the Presidential campaign of 1860 was begun. It is not worth while to enquire into the fatuity by which the Conservatives of the whole Union were divided in their votes between three candidates—Breckinridge, Douglas, and Bell; while the destructives, embracing the immense mass of the people north of a certain arbitrary latitude, were united upon one—Lincoln. Nor shall we waste time in showing how the 'rail-splitter' came to obtain the nomination at Chicago—by what chicaneries, what intimidation, what small malice of Greeley towards Seward, what promises of preferment, and all the disgraceful et cetera of party intrigue, the wily statesman of Auburn, the smooth, easy, all-accomplished Chase, the 'Pathfinder' who had lost his way four years before, the classical Sumner of the broken head, and others were set aside for 'Old Abe.' We have only to deal with the fact that one Republican sectional candidate appeared in the field with three competitors, the representatives of differing political creeds, but embodying no sectional animosity, and upheld by no mass of men seeking to make war upon the social institutions of a particular division of the land. The result was not difficult to anticipate. The Republicans, in the insolence of numbers, threw off all disguise, and declared their contest to be a sectional one. In the larger cities, vast processions of 50,000 men, wearing 'wide-awake' hats, and calling themselves 'Wide-awakes,' marched with torches and clubs, to the sound of military bands, through the streets at midnight; and it was the boast of the Republican papers, that these men were under military organisation and could handle the musket were the occasion presented for employing it. No one who saw the Republican processions of September and October 1860 in the city of New York, as they passed along Broadway, with their flaming lights and revolutionary banners, and heard their choruses of 'Old John Brown's a-marching on,' and other songs of hatred for the Southern people, could fail to perceive in the spectacle a presage of approaching wrath, and the earnest of a sanguinary conflict in which these 'Wide-awakes' should bear a part. Ellsworth's Zouaves were made up entirely of the members of a Republican Club in Chicago.

* An amusing caricature was brought out in Virginia illustrative of this election, which was quite as successful as anything ever done in England by Gilray or H. B. The Whig party had been represented in former contests by the device of a raccoon, and the Democrats maintained that the Know-Nothings were only that 'same old 'coon' in another guise. The caricature to which we refer represented 'Sam' in three cartoons. The first, entitled 'Sam in 1854,' showed us a raccoon dressed as an 'awful swell' walking out with an eye-glass in his dexter orb, and a gold-headed cane in his hand. The second, entitled 'Sam in 1855,' was a drawing of a tree in the forest, with the bushy tail or brush of a raccoon sticking out of a hollow in the trunk, and Governor Wise in hot pursuit. The third was a view of the front door of the Governor's house in Richmond, with a 'coon skin nailed up against a board, with the title 'Sam in 1856.' It is remarkable that the whole foreign element of the population of the United States should have so readily enlisted in the service of the Yankees, who would have deprived them of all political rights, to make war upon Virginia, who saved those rights from annihilation.

It is worthy of remark, however, that while such scenes as these characterised the campaign of 1860, in advance of the election, the voting at the polls was conducted with a degree of decorum almost without a parallel in American politics. No violent outbreaks attended the registration in the cities, while in the country districts the polling passed off more quietly even than a militia muster or a quarter sessions. The overwhelming preponderance of the Lincoln vote in the North caused the deposition of the ballots to seem only a matter of form, while the extraordinary fact that no Lincoln electors were voted for in any Southern State withdrew from the contest the only cause of outward disturbance. The calm that brooded over the land on that 6th day of November, 1860, was the calm which precedes the worst fury of the elements in the natural world. Less than two months had passed before the Federal officers were preparing to uphold the authority of the Union in retaining the forts in the harbour of Charleston; and the folly of the Administration precipitated the struggle which has wrought, during the last four years, such a fearful sacrifice of human life in the Western world. And thus the election of 1860 terminated, before the inauguration of the successful candidate, in the downfall of the Republic and the beginning of sorrow for the American people. It was better, perhaps, that it should have been so; for surely it were preferable that the South should have undergone all the material waste and personal anguish that has followed in the smoking track of war, than that it should have been delivered over to the North to undergo the bitter humiliation of enslavement for its citizens, and the ruin of its wide territory, upon whose products the prosperity of mankind so largely depended. The sufferings of the South are but for a time, the assured inauguration of a bright career of liberty.

Notes on Events of the Week.

AMERICA.

Mr. Lincoln has added a new star to the 'glorious galaxy' of States which are honoured by his rule. The territory of Nevada has, by proclamation, been 'admitted as a State into the Union' just in time to give him three votes at the election. For, although Nevada is a mere slice cut arbitrarily out of the huge blank which on the map of the United States represents the almost unknown Western wilderness—although it has no population except a few thousand miners, temporarily attracted by its reported wealth in precious metals, and the garrisons and settlers of a few isolated frontier posts established for their protection against the Indians—yet by this sudden elevation to the rank of a State it becomes entitled to two votes in the Federal Senate and one in the Federal House of Representatives, consequently three in the Presidential election. By the same easy method, Mr. Lincoln might easily compensate the Union for the loss of the South, and, at the cost of a few more proclamations, rule shortly over as many States as composed it at the time of his election.

The campaign before Richmond is virtually at an end. Grant's troops are engaged, we are told, in erecting log-houses for winter quarters, and will remain upon the James River, we suppose, until the spring, when the plan of attack for the reduction of the Confederate capital may be resumed. The reason given for this early abandonment of active operations is, that the Federal commander has no longer men enough to continue the campaign, and must await the result of another draft, which cannot bring him proper reinforcements for several months. We are no longer in doubt as to the design of the conjoined assault of Grant and Butler on October 27. It was not a reconnaissance in force, as was represented, but a serious attempt to flank the army of General Lee on the right and left wings at the same moment. Three army corps were thrown forward by Grant on the extreme left (right of Confederate position) in the hope of carrying the works protecting the Southside railway, but they were driven back by the Confederates with a loss, estimated by the enemy, of 1,500 killed and wounded, and 'many prisoners,' number not stated. General Butler's movement was even more unsuccessful. His blow was directed upon what was thought to be the weakest point in the Confederate lines, but it was parried by the ever-ready Confederates, who poured such an effective fire across the line of retreat that two entire brigades were wholly cut off and made prisoners. On the night of the 30th, the Confederates made a sortie into the lines of Grant, penetrating them to a considerable distance, and returning to their own position with 400 prisoners whom they had captured. Grant has, therefore, not been able to lend the éclat of military success to Lincoln in the Presidential election.

The Federal General Sheridan has fallen back nearly to Winchester, and is kept in a lively state of anxiety, lest the army of General Early, which, notwithstanding it has been annihilated three or four times, appears to be still in excellent fighting condition, should attempt another passage of the Potomac into Maryland. Much grave apprehension was felt by the Federals with regard to the advance of this utterly demoralised and worthless army of Early, and despatches from Hagerstown, Maryland, report the sound of their cannon in the direction of Sheridan's position. But this position must have been moved much further to the north, if the cannonade of an attack by Early could be heard at Hagerstown.

General Hood is reported as having crossed the Tennessee River at Cypress Creek, Alabama, on October 30, and to have advanced with 30,000 men into Tennessee, where Forrest, Buford, Chambers, and Bell, were concentrating their forces. The Confederates had destroyed the steamer Mazeppa and captured the Undine on the Tennessee River. Besides the armament of the Undine they had fourteen pieces of artillery. General Hood has probably reached the interior of the State ere this, and it may be hoped that he will yet drive the Yankees beyond its borders. Such confidence had been inspired by his movements in the people of Tennessee, that the Confederate Governor had issued his message convening the Legislature of the State at Jackson. General Buford, it was reported by Louisville papers, had been sent against Columbus and Paducah, in Kentucky. All the warehouses and shops in the latter place had been closed and the goods removed, and the Federals were preparing to defend the town.

Advices from Missouri represent General Price as retiring into Arkansas with abundant material supplies, collected during his recent occupation of Missouri.

General Longstreet's headquarters were at Gadsden in Georgia, and the garrison of Atlanta was stated as being only 6,000 men. But we are at liberty to place small confidence in this estimate.

We have received Southern newspapers to the 29th ult. They contain hopeful accounts of the condition of the armies and the military situation everywhere. A grand disaster is confidently expected to befall Sherman's army in consequence of the brilliant strategy initiated by General Beauregard and carried out by General Hood with his usual dash and vigour. The appeals of President Davis have evidently had immediate and complete effect. According to the Charleston Mercury of October 22, 'The ranks of General Lee's army are rapidly filling up, and the corps, divisions, brigades, and regiments, depleted by many battles, are assuming their former proportions. At dress parade on Sunday last, a Virginia regiment, which had inscribed on its battle-flag the names of our earliest battles, turned out eleven hundred muskets, and one of our smallest divisions numbered seven thousand effective men.' The press continues to discuss the proposal of arming the negroes, and appears to give it an almost unanimous approval. According to the Confederate, a journal published at Raleigh, North Carolina, arrangements are progressing at Richmond to arm 300,000 slaves for the spring campaign, the owners to be compensated by the Confederate Government. The same authority states that these slaves are to receive, besides their liberty, a grant of land of fifty acres each at the conclusion of the war.

General Wallace, commanding at Baltimore, has suppressed another newspaper, called the Loyalist, in that city, for stating that a call for 300,000 more recruits would be made during the winter, and no substitutes allowed. As the name of the paper sufficiently indicates its devotion to the Republican autocrat, we may assume that the real offence so severely punished is that of an indiscreet revelation.

Various disgraceful attacks by Republican mobs upon Democratic meetings and processions on the eve of the election are chronicled in the Northern papers. In some instances there has been considerable loss of life.

The latest advices from Charleston and Wilmington announce that the yellow fever has been checked by recent heavy frosts, and give hope of its speedy abatement.

The preparations for the threatened attack on Wilmington seem to have been made on an enormous scale. The fleet under the command of Admiral Porter consists of more than 60 vessels, mounting about 600 guns. Six of the vessels are ironclads. A land force will be at hand to occupy any works which the fleet may succeed in capturing. The new torpedo vessel Stromboli was expected to perform miracles of destruction—in fact, to revolutionise naval warfare. The Confederates, on the other hand, are full of activity, strengthening the defences and mounting fresh guns. All non-combatants have been ordered to leave the port. Fort Fisher is a work of no ordinary character, and New Inlet Channel may prove an entrance of destruction to the Federal fleet. The defences at the western bar are equally formidable. It is assumed on all hands that the fleet under Admiral Porter is destined to attack Wilmington. It may possibly turn out that the James River is the real point contemplated; at any rate, the season of the year lends colour to the notion that even electioneering necessities must succumb to the perils of the North Carolina coast in the month of November.

The Confederate ram Albemarle, on October 4, ran out as far as the Croatan lighthouse, captured the keeper, blew up the lighthouse, and destroyed its contents. She then put back through the Federal fleet. Lieutenant W. B. Cushing, with Picket Boat No. 1. of Porter's squadron, was sent on October 17 to blow up the Albemarle. On his return he reported that he had succeeded in blowing her up on the morning of the 28th, with the loss of his own boat, and that the destruction of the ram was complete. Cushing and one other man escaped; the rest of his crew were captured. The Admiral says that Commander Macomb writes that, 'from circumstances which have since occurred, he (Macomb) was able to inform Porter that the ram was sunk.' The Admiral quotes a second authority to confirm Cushing's statement. Did he think the story of his subordinate too marvellous to be true?

It appears, upon the authority of Admiral Buchanan, that at the fight in Mobile Bay the Federal fleet numbered 14 steamers and 4 monitors carrying 199 heavy guns besides boats' howitzers, with crews of 2,800 men. The Confederate squadron had 22 guns and 470 men. The loss of the Federals was 420 men, that of the Confederates 2 killed and 20 wounded.

There is a grim joke, not at all inconsistent with Mr. Lincoln's character, in the suggestion that Butler would be appointed to the command of the city of New York pending the elections. The rumours to this effect preceded, and are in a measure confirmed by, the unexplained presence of that redoubted warrior against clergymen and women. Verily this would be for the North taking to its own lips the bitter cup of which the unhappy populations of New Orleans and Norfolk have drunk to the dregs.

The amount of Federal debt outstanding up to the month of October was officially stated at $2,017,099,515 75 cents., being an increase of $61,000,000 since the last monthly announcement. The interest then payable stood at $56,646,000 in coin, and $28,657,000 in lawful money. The amount in the Treasury was nearly $27,000,000, and the unpaid requisitions $37,500,000.

The Hon. J. P. Benjamin, Secretary of State, has addressed a note to the Confederate representative at Brussels, directing attention to the enormous and increasing weight of the Federal debt, and the unavoidable insolvency of the Northern States. He estimates the annual interest at $81,778,043, and observes that that sum already exceeded the total revenue of the United States as it existed prior to the secession of the Southern States. The rate of increase in the debt was $2,215,200 per day, and the increase was entirely in the interest-bearing debt. He calculates that on the opening of the spring campaign the Federal debt will amount to $2,430,000,000, bearing interest to the amount of $112,780,000. In addition, there were the burdens of the pension list and unliquidated claims, reaching to hundreds of millions of dollars. Then again, according to Mr. Fessenden, the taxation on the Federal States exceeded by upwards of $30,000,000 the revenue of Great Britain, as estimated for the current year by Mr. Gladstone. The population subject to taxation in the North was about 23,000,000, of whom a large number had been converted from producers into destroyers. The war could not be carried on by the North except by a daily increase to the public debt of $2,250,000, and it was clear that if the war lasted one more year the United States would, even if desirous, be utterly unable to meet their obligations. If the capitalists of Europe cut off the supplies, the United States could not continue the war, and in the cessation of war lay the only hope of payment for the foreign lender. It will be observed that Mr. Benjamin's estimates are on the most moderate scale.

THE mail steamers which have arrived from North America during the past ten days have brought nearly $3,000,000 in specie.

AT New York on the evening of November 5, gold was at 245¼.

ENGLAND.

THE crime of Müller has been followed by a murder of less romance, but equal atrocity, and in the latter case both the victim and the supposed murderer are foreigners, the latter being a Dutchman and the former a German. The facts of the crime are as follows:—A party of men were out shooting in Plaistow Marshes, close to Silvertown, on November 8, when one Richard Harvey, who was beating the rushes for game, came suddenly upon the trunk of a dead man. The corpse lay on its back, and was headless. The spot was fifty yards from the river bank, and the reeds were seven feet high. The body was dressed in a pair of black cloth trousers and Wellington boots. It had no other covering. The body, in the presence of the police, was removed to an hotel in Silvertown, and a surgeon was summoned. The muscular portion of the neck down to the bone had been eaten away by rats; the flesh of the left hand and part of the flesh of the right hand had been eaten away. It seemed that a knife and chopper had been used in severing the head from the trunk. The body was that of a well-fed muscular man, and had probably lain in the marshes for four or five days. On the ensuing day a vigilant search developed the details of the tragedy. At a considerable distance from the spot where the trunk was found runs a ditch seven feet wide and three or four feet deep in mud. Here was found a pool of blood four feet long and one foot broad. From the ditch to the spot above named traces of blood were plainly discernible, and at about two-thirds of the distance was seen a circular patch of blood such as would have been caused by a momentary deposit of the head. As far as can be surmised from a view of the scene of the murder, it seems that the victim must have been walking in front of his murderer at the approach to the ditch, the narrowness of the path precluding the possibility of two men walking abreast. Into the ditch the victim descended first, and at that precise moment a blow must have been dealt him across the left eye and temple. He fell forwards, while his boots were driven into the clay of the ditch. The murderer must, by means of a large-bladed knife or chopper, have severed the head from the body, dragged the trunk about eighteen yards, then, having deposited the trunk, proceeded to a further spot and dug a hole twelve inches deep for the head, which was there discovered by the police. The face of the victim bore the characteristics of a German physiognomy. Ferdinand Edward Köhl, of Plaistow, a sugar-baker, and native of Holland, a dull-looking man of twenty-seven years, and Hannah his wife, an English girl of eighteen, were arrested. Before the magistrate, Heinrich Zutch, a shoemaker, identified the body from the boots, which the deceased had shown to him in order to have them repaired. Elizabeth Warren, of Plaistow, said that the prisoner formerly lodged with her, that he went to Germany, and returning, brought to her house a young man whom he used to call John. On his return Köhl married the female prisoner. The young man John lodged at the house of witness for thirteen days. He could not speak English. He was young and remarkably handsome. The prisoner spoke of the young man as bound for New York, with a salary of 200*l.* a year. The latter had at one time handed to witness six sovereigns, a silver watch, gold Albert chain, and ring. All these she returned to him. When he left her house he had four sovereigns and some silver, and when he paid her he said that if he changed another sovereign he should not be able to pay his passage to New York. She kept some of his clothes because he did not pay the whole of his bill, but she restored the things on the following day. The deceased left her house with the male prisoner, two lads, and a German whom they called 'Butcher.' The latter paid the balance of her account. This occurred about a month since. The deceased said that he was to sail a few days afterwards. She had not seen Butcher since. Mr. Howie, Superintendent of Police, said that he went to the house of the male prisoner and enquired whether a young German was missing. The prisoner said that the German who had lodged with him was missing; that he and the German had gone to the docks to look for a ship, and on returning the prisoner went into a sugar-bakery, leaving the German in the street; that on emerging from the bakery he missed the German, and had since searched in vain for him; that he could not identify the body, not having seen the head, but that the trousers were like those of the German. Henry Lee said that on November 3, at 10 A.M., he had seen the prisoner, and the German whom he believed to be deceased, walking along the river wall near the sugarhouse towards Silvertown. He remarked to two fellow-labourers that those were the two men he had seen together at the shop of Zutch. It would be about four minutes' walk from where he saw the two men to the place where the body was found. At half-past four on the same day he met the prisoner, who told him that the young man was missing. Witness replied that he had seen the prisoner and the young man that morning walking by the river bank. After hearing the evidence, the magistrates discharged the female prisoner, and remanded Köhl for further enquiry.

AT 8 A.M. on the morning of the 14th instant, Franz Müller was hanged, for the murder of Mr. Briggs, in front of the Debtors' Gate of Newgate Prison. Unremitting efforts had been made by the German Legal Protection Society to obtain a respite of his sentence, on the ground that fresh evidence threw grave doubts on the justness of the verdict of the jury; but Sir George Grey could see no reason why the sentence of the law should not be carried out. Müller continued to deny his guilt to the very last. On several occasions Dr. Capell, the Lutheran minister who attended him even to the gallows, adjured him, if he was guilty, to confess the fact; but, sometimes vaguely, at other times more circumstantially, always persistently, the condemned man asserted his innocence. During the whole of the Sunday night a small crowd stood around the fatal space which was to contain the scaffold; the continuous drizzle, which at times increased to a pitiless pelting storm, was strong enough to prevent the crowd increasing, though not able to disperse the small nucleus which had taken up a front position before the gate of the gaol. At about 5.30 A.M. the weather began to clear, and as the dawn grew brighter the whole length of the Old Bailey gradually filled with that horrible crowd, the sickening refuse of the world's metropolis, in whose favour public executions are still preserved as an English institution. Right well did they act up to their character on that morning. If it be possible that filth, violence, and obscenity can by their accumulation form a greater crime than that of murder, truly Müller looked down from his scaffold upon many a greater criminal than himself. At 5 minutes to 8 the bell of Newgate began to toll. At the sound of it even that nauseous mob became sober, and stood silent with doffed hats as the awful procession came up the steps. Two chaplains were there—one English, the other German. The former was silent; the latter began to address the condemned man with an awful earnestness and somewhat excited gesticulation. At the last moment, as he laid his hand upon that of Müller, the wretched man appeared to bow his head; almost at the same instant the drop fell. The two clergymen hurried from the fatal platform; when at the bottom of it, Dr. Capell, the German, sank into a chair and gasped out 'Thank God!' At the last moment Müller had confessed. After denying his guilt to every one, whether friend or stranger—after denying it before receiving the holy sacrament—after twice denying it while the rope was round his neck, and he stood under the beam of death—he had used his last breath to utter the words, 'Ich habe es gethan'—'I have done it.'

LORD PALMERSTON, in the course of a speech of thanks for the toast of Her Majesty's Ministers, at the Guildhall Banquet, said that there was one dark spot in the picture which the affairs of the world presented. That dark spot lay on the other side of the Atlantic. Every man of right mind must grieve that that bloody and disastrous war, which broke out three years ago among the kindred nations of the northern part of America, still bedewed with the blood of its people the tracts of territory which ought to be cultivated and become the source of wealth and happiness to mankind. He trusted that the contending parties, within some period not remote, would find it better to be reconciled than to fight, and that their disputes would be settled by amicable arrangement between themselves. The beginning of that strife was expected to be attended in this country with the most disastrous results to our manufactures. Those alarms had been found to be groundless. At all events, out of evil some good might come, for he trusted that in future the sources of cotton supply would be spread over a great portion of the globe, and that this country would be no longer dependent upon any one country for the materials which were essential for the industry, the wealth, and prosperity of a great part of the population of the country. Probably no man in England but Lord Palmerston would have delivered such an oration as this, for no one else could presume sufficiently on his position to allow himself to utter such unreasonable language. Perhaps Lord Palmerston thought it good enough for a Guildhall dinner; but even in that place he might recollect that he is the Prime Minister. When he said that alarms at the effect of the war upon our manufactures were groundless, he must have been absolutely oblivious of the misery of half a million honest men, of the blows dealt at the commercial condition of the country, of the enormous and increasing prices of calico, woollen, and cloth goods, and all kindred fabrics, to the taxation of the resources of every family. Yet Lord Palmerston may be pardoned, for he sees an end to our troubles. He looks to other sources of cotton supply. Last year this expectation had some little foundation, for the prospects of cotton other than American were not quite desperate; now the situation offers no support whatever for the supposition. In India 60 per cent. of the cotton crop has failed, and the remnant will break the hearts of the mechanics and the pockets of the millowners. In Turkey there is a similar failure. We have demonstrated by unanswerable statistics that the imports are wholly inadequate even when the calculations are based on plentiful crops; and Lord Palmerston chooses a year of blight and barrenness to utter his oracular congratulations. 'Out of evil comes good'—that is the cry of the Abolitionist who desires to see slavery destroyed at any price; and Lord Palmerston promotes the conviviality of the Corporation of London by the consoling reflection that out of the slaughter of a million men and the burning of a million homes England may get Surat rubbish instead of New Orleans Fair.

SOME words which fell from the Chancellor of the Exchequer when presiding at the annual dinner of the Queen's Westminster Volunteers, deserve record as pointing out an important characteristic in the composition of the force. Mr. Gladstone said:—

> Until the Volunteer force came into existence there was one special gap and one special defect in the military institutions of the country. We had an incomparable army and navy. I hope in this assembly we may call them incomparable without disparagement to the army and navy of any other country. We had an admirable army and navy, composed of officers and men. The officers were taken, speaking generally, almost uniformly from the upper classes, and the men from the lower classes of society. I am not going to set up against the upper or against the lower class, or any other class of society; but still I do maintain that between those two classes of society there is a class which is of considerable importance, termed the middle class of society. That middle class of society has, like every other class, its merits and its faults. But it is a class of very great weight and very great consequence in every well-regulated country. In point of fact, if you go into any ill-ordered country, you will generally find that it has not a good sound middle class; and if, on the other hand, you go into a well-ordered country, you will find that there is in it a strong middle class. In fact, the middle class is in a very great degree the cement between the upper and lower classes. Until the volunteer force came into existence an Englishman of the middle class, possessed of political power, and wanting in none of the gifts and qualities which belonged to the other classes, had, I may say, speaking generally, no opportunity of exhibiting his desire for, and contributing his fair share to the defences of his country. I hold it to be a great permanent, national, and social gain that the creation of the Volunteer force has united as it has done in perfect harmony every class from the highest aristocracy of the land, which you see at the head of some of your metropolitan regiments, and the honest, laborious, industrious, ingenious mechanic, who has contributed so large a share towards making England what it is. The Volunteer force has brought all these together into one well-commanded body; it has supplied the lack and defect which existed before, and has added a new social bond as well as a new military defence to the institutions of the country.

MR. M'CULLOCH died on Friday, November 11, in the seventy-sixth year of his age. He was born in Wigtonshire, and on quitting school entered the office of a Writer to the Signet. He, however, abandoned the law, and went to the University at Edinburgh. His career as a literary man dates from 1817, when he first became connected with the Scotsman. He held, for a short period subsequent to the year 1823, the Professorship of Political Economy in the University of London. In 1838, he was appointed Controller of the London Stationery Office. His works, remarkable for industry, lucidity, and laborious compilation, will carry his name down to many generations of political economists. The two principal achievements of his life were the 'Dictionary of Commerce and Commercial Navigation,' and the 'Statistical Account of the British Empire.' His edition of 'Smith's Wealth of Nations,' 'The Principles of Political Economy and the Principles and Practical Influence of Taxation and the Funding System,' are works valued by the statesman and by the student of political economy.

THE ship Great Western, bound from Liverpool to New York, has been stopped by the authorities. She is supposed to have on board a large number of passengers kidnapped for the Federal service.

IRELAND.

The town of Athlone has performed the feat of arresting a Federal recruiting agent in the very act of decoying British soldiers. On Sunday last a number of young soldiers of the 25th Regiment were enjoying themselves in a convivial manner in a public-house, when a worthy individual of about sixty years of age, and of military mien, joined the party. His proposition to pay for the liquor at once placed him on familiar terms with the soldiers; and, after a grand discourse on the American war generally, the stranger proceeded to dilate on the love of the United States towards Ireland, and the duty of the Irish to requite that benevolence by fighting for their adopted country. Emboldened by the seeming assent of his audience, he proceeded to administer to four of the party an oath of allegiance to Mr. Lincoln. Meanwhile, one of the soldiers had left the house, and, having secured the assistance of a policeman, returned just in time to arrest the agent in flagrante delicto. The latter now awaits his trial at the sessions. A search discovered in his portmanteau divers papers relating to military affairs, and a letter instructing him in what quarter money, when necessary, would be supplied.

CANADA.

Reports have been prevalent at Montreal that the Federal Government had notified the English Government that, for the purpose of protecting the frontier, the armament maintained on the Canadian lakes by the United States will immediately be increased.

THE CONTINENT.

FRANCE.

WE may be thankful in England that we have been spared the necessity of adjudicating upon another crime committed by a foreigner—a murder more revoltingly cruel than that for which Müller has just suffered, and more destructive in the number of its victims. Fortunately for us, the murderer had so framed his plans that England is not required to perform upon him the stern office of judge. Leduc was a native of Montcavarel, near Montreuil, and had for many years followed the occupation of a waiter, in which capacity he has lately been employed in the Etablissement des Bains at Boulogne. He is married, and his wife lives in Boulogne; but he appears to have been in constant communication with the opposite shores, and to have kept a mistress and two children in London. On the 6th instant he crossed over from Folkestone with his two English children; he was seen at 7 P.M. with them in his company; at 8.30 P.M. he appeared at his wife's house alone, with his clothes wet. He accounted for the fact by saying that he had fallen into the port; it is proved, however, that no accident of the kind happened. He left his house, and returned again at 10.30 P.M.; he was in a very bad temper, and demanded money of his wife, threatening to shoot her if she did not give him some. She gave him five francs to pacify him; he stopped all night in the house, and left it on Monday morning to go off by the railway. On that morning the inhabitants of Boulogne were awakened with the horrible story that the bodies of two children had been found in the port, and that a murder had undoubtedly been committed. Suspicions fell instantly upon Leduc. The police were despatched in large bodies to Montcavarel, the native place of Leduc; it having been judged, and rightly, that his five francs could take him no further than that place. The most intense excitement reigned meanwhile in the town. The fishwomen went by hundreds to view the bodies of the children. With the impulsiveness of their sex they gave full vent to their pity of the victims and horror of the murderer. One woman said she had to work hard to support her four children, but would willingly have increased her labours to provide for those two innocents. So incensed were they with Leduc that it was feared he would be sacrificed to their indignation when captured, without the formality of a trial. At last the news came that he had been arrested at 8.30 P.M. on the 8th inst. He was brought to Boulogne with the greatest secresy, and taken to the Hôtel de Ville. On the next morning he was examined by the magistrates, and confronted with the bodies of the children. He examined them with calmness, and steadfastly asserted his innocence; he allowed that they belonged to him, and said that 'as for the brigand who made away with them, I shall have his life, or he shall have mine.' On the 10th inst. he was examined a second time, and the carpet-bag and portmanteau brought over by him from Folkestone were opened and turned over in his presence. Not many articles were taken out before the prisoner's ease of manner vanished. He said: 'It is useless to proceed; I admit that I committed the crime.' The case was concluded, and the prisoner will be sent to trial at St. Omer.

The sovereigns of South America are being treated with scant ceremony in Europe. The Emperor of Brazil has lately been elected a corresponding member of the Geographical Society of London. Well, this, if not a very lofty or very valuable distinction, is at least not damaging to his Imperial Majesty's character; but the King of Araucania and Patagonia, Orlli Antoine I. — alas for his Majesty!—has been brought before the Correctional Police Court of Paris on a charge of common swindling. It appeared that this gentleman, whose private name is De Tonnens, emigrated to South America in 1858. He found the Araucanians without government or organisation; he suggested to them the advantages of a constitution, and offered to make one for them. The Araucanians accepted his offer, and elected him king. The Patagonians, determined not to be outdone, begged him to accept their crown also. Thus he became Orlli Antoine I., by the grace of God and the national will, King of Araucania and Patagonia. This imposing title did not deter his neighbours the Chilians from attacking him, taking him prisoner, and condemning him to death; he was saved by the interference of the French authorities, and returned to France. Here he attempted to raise a company for the creation of a factory in his kingdom; his manifesto, however, fell flat; not a sou was subscribed. At last the hotel-keeper, on whom he had been living for four months, waxed impatient, demanded his money, and in default of it summoned him for swindling. The presiding magistrates gave his ex-majesty a sharp rebuke, but finally dismissed the case, the evidence showing that the unfortunate Orlli Antoine I. really believed in the possibility of a return to his kingdom. He has mistaken the character of modern times; 'Restorations' were possible before events marched on with their present railroad pace. The Bourbons are extinct in France and Naples; the House of Lorraine will never again rule in Florence; King Otho will not return to Greece; the United States and the Confederates are for ever sundered; and Araucania and Patagonia will never again see their ancient King.

The Marquis de Beaumont insured the life of a M. Driencourt for the sum of 2,000*l.* in the International Life Assurance Company in 1854, and paid all premiums on his policy up to 1863, in which year M. Driencourt died. The company declined to pay the sum assured, on the plea that the assurance of the life of a third party, a stranger to the contract, was illegal in England, and that such an assurance was a mere wager on the duration of a human life. The case came before the Tribunal de Commerce de la Seine, who decided that the law of England had nothing to do with a contract made in France by a person ignorant of that law, and that the assurance of the life of a third party was not a wager, but constituted a certain debt, the payment of which was postponed until the occurrence of an event, i.e. the death of the third person. The company was accordingly ordered to pay the amount of the assurance with costs. This trial is remarkable as bringing out, with great distinctness, the difference between the French and English law in a matter which is daily becoming of more importance. In England we are consistent in condemning 'time-bargains' on the same principle of the illegality of wagers. In France they are equally condemned, but at the expense of legislative consistency.

The grandest defence which it has ever been our lot to see crowned with success was that of a young gentleman suspected by his uncle of too great fondness for his young and pretty aunt. The uncle was seventy, the aunt twenty-three, and the nephew twenty-seven; this alone was a primâ facie case against the young man. But there was more than this; the uncle had pounced upon a packet of letters which left no doubt of his nephew's sentiments. There was a child too; and, as the old man said, the only ray of comfort that he saw on the birth of the child was, that, being legally bound to recognise it, he could deprive his nephew of that share in his fortune which otherwise he should have been forced to leave him. The President of the court saw the letters, and asked the defendant how he could hope to explain them. 'Easily,' was the reply; 'the letters are only so many chapters in a novel which I am writing in an epistolary form.' 'A novel, eh? but,' said the uncle, 'they are addressed to my wife.' 'A mere coincidence; my heroine is to have the same name, that's all.' 'And you waited all this time to tell me so!'—then to the Court, 'I withdraw the charge.' Apparently the young gentleman's novel will be very one-sided, for we do not hear of any letters in the same collection addressed from the lady to the gentleman.

On the 9th inst. the Convention between England, France, Belgium, and Holland, on the subject of the exportation of sugar and the drawbacks on reimportation, was concluded and signed in Paris.

The King of the Belgians is now paying a visit to the Emperor at Compiègne.

The advices from Algiers are exceedingly satisfactory; the insurrection is daily losing ground. An immense mass of ammunition and provisions has been forwarded to the inland city of Laghouat, which will now become the base of the operations of the expeditionary army.

ITALY.

The debate on the Franco-Italian Convention was renewed in the Italian Parliament on the 8th inst. It was hoped that it might be closed on the 17th inst., but the habits of a young debating society always tend to produce prolixity. In accordance with the methodical habit borrowed from the French system, the names of those who intend to speak on the subject are put on the paper; they amount to seventy-four, and each of these is allowed to say his full say. In some instances the House rose in the middle of a speech, and the orator was then allowed to begin again with restored vigour on the following morning. Once the speaker, Signor Laporta, after speaking for three hours, coolly asked the House to adjourn for a quarter of an hour; the request was granted, but on recommencing he was soon obliged to ask for another rest. As very few of the speakers have any style to recommend them, and none have any new arguments to bring forward, the debate is very flat. No one doubts as to its result; consequently, the public trouble themselves little about the speeches. Signor Visconti Venosta, late Foreign Minister, made a good speech in favour of the Convention. Signor Buoncompagni made a very wearisome one in presenting the report of the Committee on the transfer of the capital, which was in favour of the Government proposals. Signor Ferrari, an eccentric but able member, who prides himself upon the fact that he has never once before voted in favour of the Government, made an amusing speech on their side. He approves of the adoption of Florence for a capital, and thinks that Rome is too thoroughly saturated with the tyranny and duplicity, first of the Emperors and next of the Popes, ever to make a good capital. As for the extinction of the temporal power of the Popes, that he has no doubt, will be effected by the Convention; Rome will become Italian, but it need not therefore become the capital of Italy. His only difficulty was to find an historical precedent for the transfer of a capital, and to do it he was obliged to travel as far as China, where, in the year B.C. 2000, he discovered his desired parallel, to the huge amusement of the House. General della Marmora addressed the House on the 12th inst. He stated that he had been originally opposed to the treaty, as one likely to disturb the freshly cemented union of the Italian provinces. However, on coming into office, and finding the Convention already signed, he reasoned himself out of his fears, and determined to support it. He regretted that any suspicion had been thrown on the conduct of France, and stated that the Emperor had always spoken and acted in the most favourable manner for Italy. 'I have great confidence,' he said, 'in the Emperor, who has entirely devoted himself to the Roman question. I believe also that he will assist us for Venice; I speak as a private person. Some solution may become possible with respect to Venice. I believe the mind of the Emperor of Austria may be brought to fresh resolutions with this object.' This remarkable statement was received by the House with the greatest applause; whether it will be received with equal favour in the French Cabinet is a question. It establishes a sort of 'solidarity' between the positions of Rome and Venice which must be unacceptable to many people, even though true. Evidently, if the Emperor is inclined to assist in giving Rome to the Italians in the same sense in which he would assist in giving to them Venice, or has already given to them Lombardy, it must be by taking it or allowing it to be taken from its present masters. The Marchese Pepoli followed on the same side. He took a more European view of the question, pointing out that the solution of the Roman difficulty by France in favour of the 'nationality' principle was a counter-stroke to the settlement of the Slesvig-Holstein and Polish difficulties by Germany and Russia. He hoped the Convention would reestablish confidence between England and France, disturbed by the refusal of the former to participate in a Congress. The task of Italy was to further this alliance, which alone could secure the triumph of liberal ideas. He implored the Chamber to support the Convention, as its repudiation would be the destruction of the Liberal party throughout Europe.

General della Marmora found it necessary to explain his observations with regard to Venice in a speech delivered on the 15th instant. He said no menace to Austria was intended, and that the Italian Government deeply deplored the movement in Friuli.

The financial scheme proposed by Signor Sella has been received with less surprise in Italy than in any other country in Europe. The proposal to anticipate the land-tax, and to levy increased duties on such necessaries as salt, grain, and tobacco, appeared to all strangers to be suicidal. In Italy, however, it is believed that the application of these financial measures will be far more easy than was expected. One municipality—that of Brescia—has declared its readiness to anticipate the payment of the land-tax for 1865 on account of its citizens. The fulness of this liberality will only be perceived when we observe that there is no chance that the land-tax now anticipated will be remitted for many years. Thus, the anticipation of it is only a new method of getting out of the people a forced loan, without paying interest for it.

Florence, the future capital of Italy, has been suffering seriously from floods. Its communications are cut off on every side by the destruction of the railways and telegraphs. The lower parts of the town are inundated, and the Arno has risen to the level of the parapets of the quays. Much property has been destroyed, and many houses threaten to fall in; but as yet few lives have been lost.

One or two fresh bands of insurgents have been discovered in Venetia, within the province of Friuli. Some of them have contented themselves with the pillage of the post houses, but others have attacked the Austrian troops. In one engagement the Austrians lost several men, and had a lieutenant killed. The insurrection is not, however, flourishing; the inhabitants of the country decline to take a part in it.

The Czarewitch is now at Turin, and has exchanged visits with the King. Prince Omberto is doing the honours of the city to his illustrious visitor.

DENMARK.

The treaty of peace was approved by the Folksthing (the Lower House) on the 9th inst. by 75 votes to 21. All the deputies from Slesvig and the Danish enclaves voted against its adoption. The bill was then sent up to the Upper House (the Landsthing), where it was approved by 55 votes to 4, four members abstaining from voting. The four in the minority, with the four behind the chair, were again the members from Slesvig. The King signed the treaty at a Privy Council held on the 12th inst., immediately upon which Count Moltke-Hvidtfeld was despatched to Vienna with the ratified treaty. One curious result of the treaty is, that, peace being now reestablished, the King of Denmark will, according to the etiquette of royalty, send ambassadors to Vienna and Prussia to announce to the rulers of those countries his elevation to the throne—an event which may be considered to be pretty familiar to them, considering that upon it some of their gravest arguments for the justice of the late hostilities were founded. The Danish journals announce that the new Danish frontier is to be strongly occupied, and the villages on the west coast of the island of Fünen facing the mainland are to receive permanent garrisons. The army is to be immediately placed on a peace footing, and all the ships of war are to be disarmed.

GERMANY.

According to trustworthy advices from Germany, it appears that Count Mensdorff has taken a very decided attitude with regard to the German Federation. He objects in toto to the manner in which the authority of that abstract body has been set at nought lately. He at first refused to sanction the notice given by the two great Powers to the troops of the Federation to evacuate the Duchies; and at last he only consented to a compromise, whereby the so-called army of execution was to be withdrawn, and a mixed force admitted into the country for the preservation of order, of which at least one-third should be troops of the Federation. The civil commissioners of the Bund should also be admitted to a corresponding share of the authority over the country. This has delighted the hearts of the Union States, who were becoming more and more dissatisfied with the conduct of affairs by Prussia; they remembered that their plenipotentiary, Herr von Beust, has already suggested that the surrender of Slesvig-Holstein, a part of the German Federation, to two private members of the same Federation, is illogical and therefore illegal; and they were afraid that Prussia would take advantage of the one illegality to proceed to another, and annex the Duchies to herself. Count Rechberg was supposed to be too thoroughly committed to a common action with Prussia to be able to protest against this usurpation, even if he had wished it. The appointment of Count Mensdorff and his immediate action has, to a great extent, extinguished their alarms, in spite of the continued assurances that the alliance between the two great Powers is as intimate as ever. A curious reason is given for the change which has lately taken place in the attitude of Russia with regard to the Duchies. It will be remembered that the Emperor of Russia ceded all his rights to the throne of the Duchies to the Grand-Duke of Oldenburg. This was, in fact, to acknowledge that the treaty of London of 1852 was null and void; but if this were acknowledged, then, according to the arguments which have already been detailed in these pages, the title of the present King of Denmark, the future father-in-law of the heir-apparent of Russia, is also destroyed. In order, therefore, not to compromise the rights and dignity of one who is soon to be connected with the Imperial throne, the Emperor of Russia has declined to declare the treaty of 1852 invalid, and has cooled the fierceness of his partisanship for the Grand Duke of Oldenburg. The municipality of Kiel presented an address to the Duke Frederick of Augustenburg upon the conclusion of the treaty of peace. In replying to them, the Duke said that they owed much to Germany, and especially to Prussia. It would be to their immediate interest to sacrifice a little to the latter Power. 'The Duchies could play an important part if their position and their sailors were made use of by the Prussian navy.' A suspicion has been already expressed that the Duke Frederick has consented to give Prussia the naval, military, and political use of the Duchies in return for her favourable influence. The speech above quoted can only strengthen such a suspicion. The inhabitants of the Duchies are extremely indignant with Prussia. Some demonstrations were got up in her favour upon the conclusion of the treaty of peace; but in Altona and Kiel few of the citizens could be induced to hoist the black and white flag.

The Reichsrath of Austria has been twice opened—once informally by the Archduke Rainer (Gallicè Regnier) on the 12th inst., and again on the 14th inst. by the Emperor in person. The Imperial speech was long and somewhat discursive. The acceptance of the crown of Mexico by the Archduke Maximilian, and the settlement of the Dano-German war, were touched on with an equally light hand. Italy was not even hinted at. The Emperor congratulated himself and his audience that the state of siege in Galicia, consequent on the war in Poland, need no longer be maintained. He then turned to financial matters. He first said that it was intended to discuss the budgets of 1865 and 1866, the one immediately after the other, in order to introduce a settled succession of time in the sessions of the Reichsrath and the Provincial Diets. Next he spoke of the changes to be made in the taxation, both direct and indirect; of a new customs tariff which is to be brought in during the session, probably in connection with the late Tariff Conferences at Prague; and of the railways, which he hoped would be multiplied throughout his empire. In mentioning these subjects, the Emperor used the alarming word 'politico-economical' several times, which doubtless awed and astounded his hearers as much as it was intended to do. A novel feature in this Reichsrath is the presence of the full number of nine Polish deputies in the Lower House. The Tcheck deputies from Bohemia still persist in their policy of abstention from their Parliamentary duties. In accordance with the words in the Emperor's speech, proclamation has been made throughout Galicia that the civil tribunals will henceforth resume their jurisdiction over all crimes except high treason and rioting; these two will still be subject to the military law. A new state loan for 25,000,000 florins at 5 per cent. was announced in Vienna on the 9th instant; its issue price is 87.

The party of 'reaction' in Prussia is having it all its own way just now. Legal persecution is the favourite plan when it is possible, as, for instance, against the press; when this is not feasible, more violent measures are resorted to. The enmity of the Government seems to be particularly directed against the instructors of youth; nor are they contented with ejecting men from their posts without assigning any reason, but they do the same to schoolmistresses to whom they object. A very hard case is mentioned at Cöslin, where a schoolmistress was deprived of her livelihood in the most summary and inexplicable manner: she herself is of the best possible character, but she has the misfortune to have a brother who is a Liberal deputy.

Amidst the horrible murders which have excited the attention of Europe lately, that of Professor Gregy at Berlin has not been the least appalling. The body of this gentleman was found in the Spree on April 19 frightfully mutilated. It was some time before the police could get any clue to the assassins. At last their suspicions fell upon three persons, Louis Grothe, Marie Fischer, and the widow Quinche. The trial of these persons has just taken place; partly from their own confessions, partly from collateral evidence, it was discovered that the two women were of the vilest character—except that, if possible, Louis Grothe was viler still, for he lived upon the wages of their crimes. Marie Fischer enticed the Professor into the cellar in which the trio lived; he unfortunately yielded only too easily to the temptation. Louis Grothe concealed himself in a neighbouring apartment; when the Professor rose to go, he felled him to the ground; then, attacking him with an axe, he showered blows upon him, 'as if he was chopping wood;' some one, it is not known who, then dealt him several stabs with a knife, until the unfortunate man was evidently dead. They then robbed him and stripped him; they next, in the most methodical way, proceeded to set the room in order, and scrub out the blood on the floor; finally, they put the corpse into a sack, carried it to the river, and flung it in. All the prisoners were sentenced to death.

RUSSIA.

The principal English residents in St. Petersburg assembled on the 12th inst. to take leave of Lord Napier upon his appointment to the British embassy in Vienna. His Lordship in addressing them said the peace of the past year was entirely owing to the attitude of the English Ministry (a fact which we may observe no one yet ever presumed to doubt, although very few care to trumpet it forth). He said that the necessity for peace was restoring the former good feeling between England and Russia, and that a further improvement would take place, by the extension of commerce between the two countries, by the development of the liberal tendencies of the Russian Government, and a more reserved policy on the part of that Government in the Eastern question. He trusted that Russia would soon adopt the principle of free-trade, the absence of which is now so much to be regretted in her system. The telegraph between Irkutsk and Kiacht has been opened, whereby news can be sent to Pekin in four days' less time than formerly.

The regeneration of the Polish peasantry is said to be steadily progressing. The only difficulty is felt with the Schliacta, or body of inferior nobles, who are removed from the rank of peasants by the nobility of their blood only. In former times they subsisted as dependants of the greater nobles; now that these are impoverished, they are reduced to misery, being too poor to hire labourers, and too proud to work with their own hands. As this class number 1,200,000 out of the 4,000,000 which is the population of Poland, the difficulty is very grave.

SPAIN.

The public feeling is calling for an honourable settlement of the debts due from the country. The people are no doubt painfully sensible that the flagrant dishonesty which has so long shut them out of the principal markets of Europe falls little short of that which in Mexico has called for foreign armed interference. Señor Bravo Murillo, indeed, has published a pamphlet inveighing against the holders of Spanish Certificates, who have no right, he says, to provoke solemn declarations and promises on the part of the Government; but the Epoca answers him and says it would be, perhaps, more advantageous to satisfy these creditors, for it is possible that it will be in the end cheaper to pay them than to leave them unpaid.

Severe inundations have afflicted Spain in common with France and Italy. In Valencia, the canals of irrigation for twenty-seven villages have burst, and a number of lives have been lost, besides a quantity of property. Every possible assistance has been given to the sufferers; subscriptions have been liberally filled up; some of the neighbouring towns have given up their whole store of provisions for the subsistence of the unfortunate people.

JAPAN.

A combined attack was made on September 5 upon the batteries guarding the Straits of Simonosaki, by the squadrons of England, France, and Holland. Eight English ships were engaged, three French, and four Dutch The flag of the United States was carried by the Takiang, a merchant ship commissioned by the local Yankee authorities for this very purpose—a proceeding which, in its confession of helplessness and simultaneous arrogation of power, is very like the paper blockade instituted by the same Yankees when the blockade of three thousand miles was effectively enforced by a handful of gunboats and converted merchantmen. The bombardment of the forts lasted for three days, and was throughout completely successful; the batteries were utterly destroyed, and the guns captured. On the 10th, the allied squadrons appeared before the town of Sinonosaki, where they were met by a plenipotentiary from the Prince of Nagato, the refractory Daimio whose hostility has forced the Western Powers to make the attack; a military convention was made between the two parties by which a free passage through the straits was secured to ships of every nation, and a proper compensation promised for the injuries already done. The losses on the side of the Europeans were 15 killed and 90 wounded; the Japanese fought well, and proved themselves worthy antagonists of the greatest maritime Powers of the world.

SOUTH AMERICA.

A most severe flood has visited British Honduras, from the swelling of the Belize River. Heavy rains prevailed continuously for three days, and the river burst its banks and inundated the adjacent country, causing immense damage to the mahogany, cotton, sugar, gum, and plantation crops. The shipping in the harbour of Belize also suffered severely. In the early part of October the heat was great, but the high winds had prevented sickness. The first of a new line of steamers from Liverpool had arrived.

A NEW CONFEDERATE CRUISER.

WE have much pleasure in being able to state that, almost at the same time when the Florida was treacherously seized in Bahia harbour, the Confederate flag was hoisted on a new cruiser at least the equal of the Florida in armament, speed, and general efficiency. The Shenandoah starts upon her career with every prospect of emulating the fame of her predecessors. She is commanded by Lieutenant Waddell, Confederate States navy, and a gallant staff of officers. Having received her crew and armament—everything, in fact, that constitutes her a belligerent vessel—on the high seas, far beyond any neutral jurisdiction, there can fortunately be no pretence of accusing her of any violation of municipal laws or international obligations. It is evident that Federal commerce is baulked of the expected reward of the murderous outrage in Bahia; for already the telegraph has advised us of the doings of no less than three Confederate cruisers, the Tallahassee, the Chickamauga, and the Olustee, all of which have recently issued from their own ports and are busy at work avenging the Florida's fate. To this formidable list of ubiquitous enemies the New York Chamber of Commerce must now add a fourth; and Confederate sympathisers, paraphrasing the familiar 'Le roi est mort—vive le roi!' may exultingly exclaim, 'The Florida is gone—long live the Shenandoah!'

NASSAU.—Our correspondent from Nassau, under date October 22, writes as follows:—'At last we may say positively that the yellow fever has taken its departure. We see it in the flags of the shipping once more flying from the peak; we see it in the increased vitality of trade; we see it in the daily advent of the truants to New York and Canada, who flew like a covey of partridges at the first blast of its withering breath, and in the disappearance of the hearse from the streets through which it so constantly conveyed its tribute of mortality. To be sure, some nervousness still exists among the new arrivals, developing itself in a proneness to umbrellas, light drinks, and avoidance of the night air. Yet Nassau now and for the coming five or six months may be safely rated as one of the healthiest climates in the world. The mercantile campaign against Wilmington and Charleston is consequently just opening, and promises to be carried on more vigorously and effectively than ever before. Cotton arrived freely last moon, and to-day the pioneer arrival of the present moon is hourly expected. I regret my inability at the present moment to continue the blockade statistics, but will bring them down to date in my next. The standard of inefficiency will, however, be found unaltered with regard to the number of losses, but the increased capacity of the boats now engaged in the trade over those of last winter makes a heavy difference both in the supplies furnished to the Confederacy and cotton delivered here. All of them carry full cargoes in, outside shippers offering freely at from 35*l.* to 40*l.* per ton. Notwithstanding the fact that exchange in the Confederacy is now quoted at 25, yet goods of nearly all descriptions pay a fair profit. A recent visit to Havana has convinced me that the closing of the port of Mobile has not materially interfered with the blockade business in that locality. It has merely transferred the business to Galveston, but as that port will not admit of more than seven feet draught of water, there is a great scarcity of the proper description of vessels. Several parties have recently passed through here on their way to Canada and England to procure them, and one recently arrived steamer, the Lizzie, changed chances here to an Havana firm at the rate of 20,000*l.*'

IMPORTS OF CONFEDERATE COTTON.—In our commercial intelligence we give a return of the imports of Southern cotton and tobacco into England from October 27 to November 14. The total quantities received were 9,639 bales of cotton, and 73 boxes of tobacco.

LETTERS FROM NEW YORK.

FROM AN OCCASIONAL CORRESPONDENT.

NEW YORK: November 1.

IT is now freely conceded that the fall campaign against Richmond and Petersburg is at an end, and that no further movement in that direction will be made before the ensuing spring, and perhaps not at all. General Grant, in his two despatches which went out by the steamer of Saturday, asserted that he made a 'reconnaissance' on Thursday, and gave the public to understand that it was a success. Before that day had passed, however, it began to transpire that the so-called 'reconnaissance' was, in reality, a movement of his whole army, and it further transpired that the movement had been def ated, with a loss to the Petersburg wing of the army of 1,500 to 2,000, and to the James River wing of probably 1,000.

This was the end of the 'reconnaissance.' Grant admitted, in the same despatch claiming a success, that the Confederate works were guarded, fully manned at every point along the thirty miles of works, that there was not a weak spot in them, and, after this information had been obtained, he deemed it prudent to withdraw.

This last admission of itself was equivalent to a defeat, though the journals in the Federal interest still insisted upon it all day (Saturday) that 'fifteen miles' of Confederate ground had been gained in the movement, reducing the number finally to three, and to-day to a 'return to the old position.' The Confederate accounts assert that they (the Federals) are not so near the Southside Railroad as they were previous to the fight.

General Grant has telegraphed nothing further since his despatches dated on Friday last, but we have, in place of any additional Federal accounts, two despatches from General Lee, and also some of the details of the fighting from the Richmond papers. These prove clearly a Confederate victory both near Petersburg and on the James, and give the impression that the James River movement was merely a feint to cover the one made simultaneously on the Weldon Road. General Grant has attempted just such a manœuvre twice before, and failed in both instances, and his repeated efforts are sufficient evidence that he has no idea of being able to take Richmond by an assault upon the works which defend it. It is Petersburg and the Southside Road that he imagines to be the key to Richmond, and hence his persistent efforts in that direction. Yet he has failed as lamentably in the grand object of his attainment (Petersburg and the railways) as he has in all his movements directed against the Confederate capital.

If you would have convincing evidence of the public feeling upon the miscarriage of all his plans, I need but refer you to the heavy rise of 20 per cent. that has taken place in gold within two days, the rate as I write being 237.

But to the Southern accounts of this last 'On to Richmond.' On Wednesday evening the Federal troops on the James were thrown across to the north side at Deep Bottom to the number of 20,000 to 25,000 men. About 10 A.M. an attempt was made to turn the Confederate left on the Charles City Road, but it was repulsed with severe loss in killed and wounded, and the capture of 500 prisoners. Butler, it is said, was on the field in person, which may account in part for the reverse. At about the same time an attack was made upon the Confederate lines along the Williamsburg City Road, which, says General Lee, was also repulsed, the enemy leaving his dead in front of the works, and the Confederates holding 400 prisoners and 7 stands of colours. On the following day the James River forces returned to their former position, and thus ended the 'reconnaissance,' or 'feint,' whatever you may call it, on the part of that portion of the Federal army.

While this movement was progressing—or rather failing—on the north side, Grant in person, accompanied by General Meade, was busy in what it is believed was intended to be the real movement on the south side. The 2nd, 5th, and 9th Corps, comprising cavalry, artillery, and infantry, crossed the creek below Burgess Hill, some seven miles below Petersburg; and, driving in the Confederate skirmishers, occupied the Boydton Plank Road. General Mahone, with three brigades, was at once ordered to attack them on the flank, and General Hampton on the rear. The result was not wholly successful, as the force opposed to the Confederates was nearly two to one. Four hundred prisoners, three stands of colours, and six pieces of artillery were nevertheless captured, though the latter could not be secured owing to the Federals being still in possession of a bridge on the road. Towards night an attack was made by the Federals; but, the Confederates being reinforced since the attack made by them, they broke the whole three Federal lines of battle, and the latter withdrew under cover of night, abandoning the road completely, and leaving the wounded and 250 dead upon the field. The Confederates took 500 prisoners, 1,500 stand of arms, three flags, and some wagons and caissons that the Federals left behind in their flight, Thus ended the attempt to carry the Confederate position on the Boydton Plank Road, which failed even before the works that defend the road had been reached.

The same night, about ten o'clock, an assault was made upon the Confederate works on the Jerusalem Road, and also upon the Baxter Road, both of which were repulsed by midnight, and since then the Confederates have been 'let alone.' The army correspondent of the Herald may well say that 'General Lee, it must be confessed, displayed his usual and indisputable sagacity in these operations.' He has indeed; and I repeat the remark made at the commencement, that this last movement of Grant probably ends the campaign—perhaps for ever.

The army correspondent of the Times attributes the failure on Thursday to the want of men. 'Grant,' he says, 'needs reinforcements,' and this is said in the face of a statement in the World to the effect that the army with Grant is the largest that ever menaced Richmond.

Among the prisoners taken by the Federals during the counter movements of Thursday, near Petersburg, they claim to have taken Major Venables, the chief adjutant of General Lee. The Richmond papers, however, do not confirm this capture, though there may be a motive for not alluding to it. The Major, when taken, refused to give the name of the staff to which he belonged, and the Federals are to this hour in the dark as to who their prisoner is. General Dearing, one of the most rising young officers in the Confederate service, lost his life while with his cavalry in the battle of Thursday.

I have just received, through private channels, intelligence of another Federal reverse in Louisiana. We must not look for such information through the New Orleans press, as the publication of defeats is strictly forbidden. The affair I allude to occurred on the 13th, near Evergreen, in the parish of Avoyelles. The Federals, not supposing that the Confederates were in force, marched on boldly, driving the latter before them, until the Federals were got in an ambuscade, when the Confederates opened from all sides simultaneously, and forced the enemy to retreat, leaving fifteen guns behind.

The latest advices from the Valley represent heavy firing just beyond Winchester, from which it was inferred that the Confederates under Early were again advancing down the Valley. The Richmond Whig would seem to intimate that such a purpose at least was on foot, as it announces that Early has advanced his headquarters while Sheridan has fallen back. The destruction of the Manassas Gap railroad has been commenced by the Federals—the depredations of the Confederate rangers upon it rendering it wholly useless as a means of travel.

It is said that Dick Taylor brought 10,000 men with him when he entered Georgia for the purpose of joining the forces of Hood.

Vaughan's brigade of Breckenridge's army is reported

5 o'clock P.M.—Gold has been excited and active all day, with a strong speculative feeling. The rate at one time leaped to 241½—then receded to 236—and is now about 240. Exchange on London 9¼ for gold. Bill-drawers refuse to name a rate for currency.

Cotton is held very firm at $128 to $130 for middling.

News has just come in of a Confederate attempt to pierce the Federal centre at Petersburg, which the Federal accounts say was defeated. The attempt was made at half-past nine on Sunday evening, and the line between the 2nd and 5th corps was penetrated for some distance, with the capture of several hundred prisoners. The Federal breastworks were then charged, but the attack was repulsed, the Federal loss being unknown. No official account of the affair is published. The prisoners taken by the Confederates (387 in number) were all safely removed.

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

New York: November 1, 1864.

The Southern papers received here appear to be unanimous in favour of arming the blacks for the spring campaign. Slavery seems to be entirely lost sight of in the determination to achieve Southern independence. The Union papers at Newbern, North Carolina, send us the following extract from the Southern Confederate, a North Carolina paper, of an article written home by the editor from Richmond:—'The pressure brought upon the authorities here, favouring the arming of the blacks, has been too strong to resist. Hence it is with gratitude that I am able to state officially that arrangements are now being made to arm, for the spring campaign, three hundred thousand slaves, whose masters are to be compensated by the Confederate Government. The slaves thus armed are to have their freedom and fifty acres of land each, which insures them permanent homes in the South.' The measure he speaks of requires the previous assent of Congress. The writer is probably able to say that Government has the project matured, to be laid before Congress when it meets; and that, from the force of opinion already developed, it will be adopted as a precautionary measure in view of ulterior possibilities. The necessity has not arisen; time will be required to organise safely such a change in the social condition of the blacks, and to prepare them for military service. But it will be done whenever the Southern people are convinced that they cannot secure their separation from the North without it.

With regard to the Confederates held prisoners in the North, I find published at the seat of government in so respectable a paper as the National Intelligencer, which vouches for the sincerity and respectability of the writer, a letter from a lady who has herself witnessed the horrors of the military prison at Elmira, in Central New York:—'I have just returned from Elmira. Though not permitted to go inside the prison enclosure, I saw the condition of the fifteen hundred who were taken away for exchange, many of them in a dying condition. There are ten thousand prisoners at Elmira. A great number have been in confinement since the battle of Gettysburg. They have been kept at Point Lookout; have contracted disease from the unwholesome water there; were transferred to Elmira scantily clothed to face the cold Northern climate; no tea or coffee is allowed them; no variation of their scanty prison fare. No wonder that the mortality has been and is frightful—that the sick number fifteen hundred. Sleeping on the ground, under tents, four blankets for five men, many without socks or shoes; when at last taken to the hospital, they are too far gone to be restored to life. Several of those taken away for exchange died on the cars. Happy they to be at rest! No more cold or hunger pangs to suffer! Only think of it. Never to be warm, never to have a full meal, a cup of coffee in a land of plenty; to die of lingering torture. It is useless to appeal to the Secretary of War. It rests with the men of the North to remove this foul stain from our country. The officers in charge of the prison at Elmira are kind and humane, but the condition of things is beyond their power to remedy. A quantity of coarse warm clothing is immediately required. Socks, under-clothing, blankets, and thick knit jackets are wanted for hospital use, and an effort ought at once to be made, such as Mr. Stanton cannot withstand, to have them allowed coffee, tea, and sugar. I cannot, will not believe that my countrymen of the North will permit this state of things to continue. Those fifteen hundred pale faces are before me as I saw them pass me at the depot. Those ghastly, pleading faces! I saw them here again—saw the pile of dead—dead from want of nourishing food—a cup of coffee. I saw in a city whose church steeples tower towards heaven gentle women who would have given this nourishment driven by brutal police and detectives from the mission bequeathed to them by the pitying Son of Mary. Hot tears of shame for my countrymen who permit these outrages upon humanity and Christianity—tears of pity for these poor sufferers—blind my eyes. I cannot write.'

The Government has forbidden the Confederate prisoners at the North to receive any contributions not expressly allowed in exceptional cases by a Government order, and has reduced its rations to what it calls the starvation rates in the impoverished South. It is so in all the prisons; and a couple of weeks ago there was a fiendlike paragraph in one of the city papers exulting over the alleged fact that some of the Confederate prisoners exposed in the pen at Fort Wagner, and fed on quarter rations, had died from exhaustion—were deliberately starved to death; and that others, crazed by hunger, were importuning to be allowed to take the oath of allegiance, that they might get food.

All these horrors, at which humanity revolts, could be stopped if the Government would consent to an exchange of prisoners—like for like—leaving the slave question apart, as the Confederates have constantly proposed to do. They abandon their own men, and inflict unspeakable torments on the prisoners in their own power, on the pretence of a fanatical idea in favour of the liberation of a few blacks, of whom there are at most two or three hundred who are to be affected. This fanatical idea is only a pretence. It is all but distinctly avowed that the real purpose is to exhaust the Southern armies by keeping in prison and using up fifty thousand Confederates, who, if released, would hurry back into the field—at the cost of leaving in the Confederate prisons an equal number of their own men whose terms have expired, and who would not reenlist. It is the ghastly realisation of the exterminating process by which it is so often demonstrated at the North that, with the destruction of equal numbers, the more populous North will ultimately triumph.

The whole country is convulsed with political excitement. Nothing is done or thought of but electioneering, and nothing else will be listened to until after Tuesday next. It is even likely that it will not end with the election. The passions the people are greatly roused, and the audacity with which he President and his party are endeavouring to win advantages by fraud, and control votes by force, are adding fuel to this excitement every day. It is the cry of the Democrats everywhere that Mr. Lincoln does not intend to permit a fair or free election, and will, if reelected, succeed by dishonest, unconstitutional, and arbitrary means; and this state of mind is exasperated by new provocations as the election approaches, and it becomes more evident that Mr. Lincoln could not possibly be chosen if there were a free choice permitted.

The latest and boldest coup d'état was the arrest by military orders and confinement at Baltimore and Washington of the State agents sent by Governor Seymour to collect the votes of the New York soldiers, and the seizure of the ballots and envelopes with which they were charged. The pretence that a subordinate agent had committed a fraud was no extenuation of a high-handed act of military authority, which treats the jurisdiction and the authority of the State of New York with contempt, and grasps into the hands of the tools of the United States Government the power of obstructing or falsifying the entire vote of the New York Democrats in the army. In the mildest form in which it could be viewed, it was a usurpation and an insult to the authorities of New York, and a practical suppression of a large part of the M'Clellan vote in the army, which, even with the most liberal and energetic action, can hardly be reached now so as to be returned in time for the election, and, in the present temper of the Government, can hardly be reached at all. But the case is held to be even worse. It is the deliberate opinion of the public men of the Democratic party of this State, shared universally by their followers, that the case was one of conspiracy, a plot of the agents of the Republican party to trump up a case to base a charge of fraud upon against the Democrats, and afford a pretext to seize their ballots. If they are given up, as they may be, the end will be accomplished of lessening the vote for M'Clellan in the New York election, and perhaps changing the result in the State, on which a great deal depends. The Democrats want New York and Seymour for Governor to be the rallying point of constitutional resistance to Lincolnism, successful or defeated in the general result. If the Democrats lose New York, they are hopelessly prostrate, and there is no help for them, nor for the country thereafter, but in civil war at home. They believe that the votes of the soldiers, fairly taken, will secure this as the rock of refuge in the future, and they will contest it desperately, and they will make a deadly issue with whatever interposes to rob them of it by violence or trickery.

The Administration are making a great mistake in giving their adversaries the advantage of presenting such a case of attempted outrage, and of superadding to the complaint heretofore so vehemently urged against Mr. Lincoln, that he is using the army to coerce the Border States to vote for him, the more dangerous charge that, for the same purpose of selfish aggrandisement, he is instituting or favouring schemes to cheat the soldiers of States indisputably loyal out of their votes. It is bad policy, as John Van Buren said in a speech in Columbia County last week, for a man at Washington to cheat men of their ballots who have muskets in their hands, which they may take it into their heads to use instead of the ballots.

Governor Seymour instantly appointed a commission, composed of men of the highest position and purest character in the State, to proceed to Washington and enquire into the facts, that he may see that the dignity of the State of New York, the rights of the Government of the State and of her citizens be respected, and all attempts to defraud the soldiers of their votes, or prevent their voting, be exposed and resisted. The committee consists of Judge A. J. Parker, Judge W. F. Allen, and Hon. Wm. Kelly, than whom there are not three more upright and esteemed citizens of the State. But what can they do, or what can the Governor do? All the Republican party desired, after securing the Lincoln vote—which has been done fully through the agencies the Government itself instituted long ago and controls—was, that the Democratic votes should be obstructed and their agents delayed a few days, and this is accomplished. The whole transaction is a bitter reproach to Governor Seymour and his advisers, that they yielded, in 1863, against their own convictions, to the popular clamour in favour of the soldiers' vote in camps. Whatever the result may be as affecting the election, the ominous fact is glaring out here, as in many other States, that the Presidency is to be disposed of by the army, and that, in the more powerful States, the struggle between nicely balanced parties is for the favour of the soldiery.

Kentucky has been long made the theatre of executive dictation, and her authorities, which at first were in complicity with Mr. Lincoln, sustaining all his lawless, bloody, and proscriptive conduct towards the South, finding themselves borne down and trampled under by the Federal soldiery, usurping power over the civil Government among them, have been protesting, and declaiming, and denouncing, and threatening for some time past—always, however, retreating when confronted directly by the military power. Governor Bramlette has given some signs of a lurking vitality of civil rights left in Kentucky by issuing a very valiantly sounding proclamation, requiring the Federal authorities to abstain from all military interference with the Presidential election this month. It is directed to the officers of election and citizens of Kentucky. In it he recapitulates the provisions of the Kentucky laws in respect to elections, which he affirms to be the only lawful rules for the government of elections, and asserts the power and the purpose of the State authorities to give effect to them all, and permit no other. He adds:—'There being no power or authority in the Federal or State Governments to authorise military interference with elections, it follows as a consequence that any such interference, under any pretence whatever, must be a wanton violation of the law, and places the perpetrators in rebellious contumacy to the Government.' He therefore directs the officers of election to observe the rules and impose the tests and qualifications for voting, as directed by the laws of the State, and no other, to resist every attempt by the military to interpose, and appeal to the civil officers for support in the arrest of the intruders; if they are too strong, to close the polls and adjourn the election, reporting the offenders to the next Grand Jury for indictment.

It is not believed that the Administration party will suffer the vote of Kentucky to be cast for General M'Clellan. It is in Governor Bramlette's power to refuse to permit it to be cast at all, and thus defeat the calculations which count it among Mr. Lincoln's certainties. Eminent Kentuckians now in the city have said that in a free vote Kentucky can cast one hundred and thirty thousand votes to-day, of which Mr. Lincoln would not receive twenty thousand; yet, by force of military terrorism, he would be sure of the State, if the State authorities do not block the game of fraud, and insist that, if there be not a free election, there shall be no vote.

The President has secured three more votes for himself in his proclamation admitting Nevada into the Union as the thirty-sixth State, by Federal computation, of the number subject to the Union, the twenty-fifth in the roll of States to vote in the election. This makes the whole number of electors (including Western Virginia, and not reckoning Tennessee or Louisiana) amount to 234, of which a majority is 118.

The singularity about the admission of Nevada is that Congress authorised that Territory to make a Constitution and come into the Union with it without any further action, except the issuing of a proclamation by the President reciting the fact. No enquiry is to be made into the terms or provisions of the Constitution, and it is said that the President, in his haste to get the new State ready to vote for him in November has not waited to get a copy of the Constitution, but has declared it accepted, on a telegraphic report of its having been adopted and forwarded. Nevada is situated on the western side of the Territory of Utah, and was only erected into a Territory in 1861, when it had a wandering population of 6,857 all told. To-day it is hurried into the Union, and made equal in its power in the United States Senate to New York with her four millions of inhabitants; and the avowed and only object for this indecent haste is that it may cast a vote for the reelection of Mr. Lincoln. If these men had a deliberate purpose to bring the doctrine of State sovereignty into utter contempt, they could have devised nothing more effectual than this way of bestowing it on a small fraction of party followers as the reward of party services. How old, proud, populous, and powerful States like Massachusetts and New York, Pennsylvania and Ohio, can relish or tolerate such palpable and radical changes in the distribution of power, and such a debasement of their own dignity for such paltry objects, is one of the incomprehensible mysteries of the American character.

LETTER FROM WASHINGTON.

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Washington: October 28, 1864.

The truth has at length come out about the contest in the Shenandoah Valley. The Southern account is very much like the history of the battle I sent you last week. General Early was in command of the Confederate forces—not General Longstreet. Longstreet, though appointed to the command before the battle, did not reach the ground until the day after it. The Southern accounts state that they attacked Sheridan's troops posted on the north side of Cedar Creek, four miles north of Strasburg. The Federal camp was surprised, and after a brief contest the troops were completely defeated. Routed and demoralised, they abandoned everything, and fled four or five miles northward to Middletown. The Confederates pursued them. All their camp equipage, wagon trains, ambulances, and eighteen cannon were taken. Thirteen hundred prisoners were also captured, and with the cannon were sent to the rear. At Middletown, the Federal troops sought refuge behind entrenchments, and, reinforcements arriving from Winchester, a stand was made. The Confederates meanwhile fell to plundering the camp, and became disorganised. Thereupon Sheridan ordered his fresh troops to advance. The Federal infantry followed the retreat to the old camp at Cedar Creek, and then halted. The Federal cavalry pursued further. In Strasburg, twenty-three Confederate guns, and seven of those which had been captured from Sheridan, became entangled in the streets. A panic seized the drivers, and the guns could not be moved. The Federal cavalry captured these thirty guns. Eleven of Sheridan's were carried off, so that the net Confederate loss of cannon was but twelve. No impression was made upon the Confederate rear, and they retreated in good order. They report their loss in killed, wounded, and missing, in the entire battle, at 1,000. Sheridan has made a report of his loss which foots up 4,086. The general impression now is, that the Federal troops gained no victory. At the end of the contest they were in the position held when it began; their losses were far heavier than those of the Confederates; and the Confederate movement prevented any reinforcement of Grant's army, and saved a new attack upon Richmond. To-day Sheridan is encamped on the north side of Cedar Creek in his old position. He has cavalry outposts at Fisher's Hill, south of Strasburg, and at Front Royal, east of Strasburg, on the Manassas Gap railroad. Thirty miles of this road were thoroughly destroyed by the Confederates, and Sheridan is now trying to repair it. His supplies come from Alexandria to Rectortown over the railroad, are landed just east of Manassas Gap, and then have to be wagoned thirty miles to camp, over the most execrable mountain roads, and subject to all sorts of guerilla raids. Mosby is playing all possible pranks on Sheridan's communications, and a large proportion of the Federal supplies go to the Confederate commissariat. It is said that 20,000 men are required to guard the railroad. South of Fisher's Hill the Valley is held by the Confederates. Their headquarters are at Newmarket, but their scouts come all the way north to Fisher's Hill.

In the South-west military affairs are involved in great mystery. On October 17, General Beauregard took command of the Confederate armies, making an excellent address to them, in which, whilst he held out no promises, he spoke hopefully. Atlanta is still isolated from the North. Many rumours have come to us that the railroad running to Chattanooga has been repaired, and communication reopened, and some of them may have wandered across the ocean to you. None of them have any foundation. Months will be required to repair the road, and Slocum with about 8,000 men is still shut up in Atlanta. The Confederates have no large force on the line of the destroyed railroad; all have gone westward; but guerillas control everything there, and capture every courier sent from or to Atlanta. Sherman has some working parties trying to repair the railroad, but they work very slowly, and more than half their time is spent in fighting the guerillas. No news has been received from Atlanta for six weeks. The Confederates are reported to be making the greatest exertions to capture it. Iverson, who, however, has but a small force, has invested it, and a large army is said to be collecting to insure its capture. Hood is leading Sherman on a wild-goose chase over the mountains, westward from Chattanooga. When last heard of, Sherman was at Gaylesville, seventy miles south-east of Huntsville, and in Alabama. Hood had apparently turned southward. On October 25, Sherman at Gaylesville appeared as if he did not know what to do. Hood had disappeared, though in what direction was not known, and it looks very much as if he intends to make a sudden dash upon Atlanta and capture it. Beauregard has evidently out-generaled Sherman, and may yet capture Atlanta. Sherman is far away in an enemy's country, without supplies, surrounded by guerillas, and with a fatigued and baffled army. The Confederates say he has but 50,000 men, only half of whom are with him. Forrest and Wheeler are still near him at Gaylesville, and keep him busily employed. Forrest's last exploit was to send an expedition across the Tennessee River at Florence, Alabama, which marched westward to Eastport, Mississippi, and captured the Federal garrison at that post. It was about 600 Federal troops, under a Colonel Hoye; and the Federal despatch announcing the capture states with great sangfroid that 'Colonel Hoye is not to blame for the disaster, as he simply obeyed orders.'

There have been various minor movements in the region supposed to be reigned over by Sherman. Last week the town of Mayfield, in Western Kentucky, was entered by a body of Confederates. The Court House was burned, and much property seized. The Federal troops in the neighbourhood hid themselves till the Confederates left, and then began to retaliate upon the inhabitants of the surrounding country. The railroad running from Louisville to Nashville is infested with guerillas. One of the most unique exploits (as Mr. Seward would say) of these partisans was the robbing of a Federal mail-carrier by a party under command of a woman named Sue Mundy. She escaped with the booty, but four guerillas, afterwards captured on the Cumberland River, were shot at Louisville on October 25 for her success. On the Mississippi, below Vicksburg, there has recently been a large Federal cotton-stealing expedition. A band of negro troops has visited Port Gibson, Woodville, and other places on the eastern bank of the river, frightening women and children, but getting very little cotton for their pains. Of course they burned houses and carried off helpless old men—such mercenaries always do that.

In Arkansas the Confederates have been achieving great successes. A railroad runs from Little Rock eastward to Duvall's Bluff, near the Mississippi. Over this road General Steele, who is almost useless at Little Rock, gets his supplies. General Shelby, with a Confederate force of 2,500, recently planned an expedition to destroy this railroad. He marched against it and struck it about thirty miles west of Duvall's Bluff. His troops at once began tearing up the rails. They turned eastward towards Duvall's Bluff, tearing up the rails as they went. Bridges were burned, and the road thoroughly broken up for nearly twenty miles. At every station the Federal garrisons were captured, and the block-houses which protected them were destroyed. When about ten miles from Duvall's Bluff, Shelby left the road and marched southward. He captured and carried off with him 577 Federal prisoners and an immense train of Federal wagons loaded with captured ammunition and supplies. His loss, all told, on the expedition was but 73. The aggregate Federal loss in killed, wounded, and captured from this expedition is reported at 2,500, one man for every Confederate engaged. Steele is now cut off at Little Rock, and nothing can be heard from him.

There is no longer any doubt that General Price, with the army which for a month past has been invading Missouri, is retreating southward towards Arkansas. He has captured so much in supplies that this is a necessity. Price retreats southward along the line dividing Missouri from Kansas. After going fifty miles from Kansas City, almost to Fort Scott, a garrisoned Federal post in the south-eastern part of Kansas, he turned south-east, and is now marching towards Arkansas. All the Federal troops had been concentrated at Kansas City, and of course their cavalry followed Price's movements. Therefore we have a despatch this morning that, in the various skirmishes with the Confederate rearguard, 1,500 prisoners, including Generals Marmaduke and Cabell, and twelve cannon were captured. Few people believe this. It professes to have been done three days ago, and if it had been done the War Department would very quickly have told us of it. Of course some stragglers and property were taken, as is always the case on the line of retreat of a great army, but nothing like this. When Price makes his official report of the operations in Missouri, he will give a story of captures of prisoners, cannon, and food, such as few dream of. He has just sent a raiding party to attack a train marching north from Fort Smith in Arkansas to Fort Scott. Half the wagons were burned. A town near by was entered by the raiders, and six Federal colonels who were found there were shot in retaliation for the murder of citizens of Missouri charged with being guerillas.

The movement against the Confederates which is to be made to influence the Presidential election, is to be a naval attack upon Fort Fisher and the batteries protecting the entrance to Wilmington, North Carolina. A large fleet has been for some time collecting at Beaufort, North Carolina, and Admiral Porter, who is to command it, will leave Washington to-day or to-morrow. Another fleet, containing all the ships and troops that can be spared from the South Carolina, Georgia, and Florida coasts, has been collected at Hilton Head, and we have Southern despatches announcing that many of the vessels have already sailed north past Charleston harbour. The attack upon Wilmington is to be made at the middle of next week if possible, so as to have the news in the North in time to influence the voting; so we may look out for the tallest kind of military lying the subject is capable of. The ultimate object of the attack, I suppose, will not be the capture of the town, but merely the seizure of the harbour defences, in order to perfect the blockade.

Admiral Buchanan has just made a report of the naval battle in August last in Mobile Bay. He says he does it to contradict the many misrepresentations which have appeared in Northern newspapers. His fleet was composed of but one ironclad and three wooden vessels, and carried but 22 guns. The Federal fleet was fourteen steamers and four Monitors, carrying 199 heavy guns, besides boats' howitzers in the tops of some of the ships. The Federal force was 2,300 men; the Confederate force but 470. Out of these his loss was but 22, whilst Farragut lost 420. The battle, considering the disparity of numbers and Farragut's subsequent failure to accomplish anything by it, was not by any means disgraceful to the Confederates. There has been no change at Mobile for a long time.

At Petersburg everything is quiet. The Confederates are reported to be massing large forces south-west of Meade's position on the Weldon railroad, as if an attack was contemplated.

The yellow fever is still raging in Newbern and various Federal towns on the Atlantic coast. There are also reports of its prevalence in Charleston and Wilmington.

THE DAY OF THANKSGIVING.

THE following proclamation has been issued by the President of the Confederate States of America:—

It is meet that the people of the Confederate States should from time to time assemble to acknowledge their dependence on Almighty God, to render devout thanks for His manifold blessings, to worship His holy name, to bend in prayer at His footstool, and to accept with reverent submission the chastening of His all-wise and all-merciful providence. Let us, then, in temples and in fields, unite our voices in recognising with adoring gratitude the manifestation of His protecting care in the many signal victories with which our arms have been crowned, in the fruitfulness with which our land has been blessed, and in the unimpaired energy and fortitude with which He has inspired our hearts and strengthened our arms in resistance to the iniquitous designs of our enemies.

And let us not forget that, while graciously vouchsafing to us His protection, our sins have merited and received grievous chastisement; that many of our best and bravest have fallen in battle; that many others are still held in foreign prisons; that large districts of our country have been devastated with savage ferocity, the peaceful homes destroyed, and helpless women and children driven away in destitution; and that, with fiendish malignity, the passions of a servile race have been excited by our foes into the commission of atrocities from which death is a welcome escape.

Now, therefore, I, Jefferson Davis, President of the Confederate States of America, do issue this my proclamation, setting apart Wednesday, the 16th day of November next, as a day to be specially devoted to the worship of Almighty God; and I do invoke and invite all the people of these Confederate States to assemble on the day aforesaid, in their respective places of public worship, there to unite in prayer to our Heavenly Father, that He bestow His favour upon us; that He extend over us the protection of His almighty arm; that He sanctify His chastisement to our improvement, so that we turn away from evil paths and walk righteously in His sight; that He restore peace to our beloved country, healing its bleeding wounds and securing to us the continued enjoyment of our right of self-government and independence, and that He graciously hearken to us while we ascribe to Him the power and glory of our deliverance.

Given under my hand and the seal of the Confederate States, at Richmond, on the 26th day of October, in the year of Our Lord 1864.

JEFFERSON DAVIS.

By the President:
J. P. BENJAMIN, Secretary of State.

The following is from the Daily Telegraph of the 15th instant.

To-morrow, a brave people, compassed round with sore perils and in extreme perplexity, will unite in a solemn act of prayer. From Northern Virginia to the swamps of Florida, from the coast of the Carolinas to the wild lands that roll away to the westward of the Mississippi, wherever soldiers or citizens of the Confederate States of America can assemble together, they will offer up a petition for help and guidance at the throne of the Most High. There is always something sacred in the spectacle of a nation on its knees. At once the cause of quarrel seems to be taken away from the poor tribunals of human judgment, which passion can influence and prejudice can sway, and the appeal is laid before the only court whose decisions cannot err.

More and more clearly has the truth been established, that secession is not a mere freak of anger; that it represents the deliberate resolution of a whole people to be free, and to resist to the death any attempts at coercion. Not more certain is it that Italy hates the Austrian, and will some day try to drive him from her soil—not more certain is it that Poland hated the Muscovite, and fought against him until the noblest of her children had fallen in the unequal struggle—than that the men of the South are absolutely determined never to re-enter the Union which they have left. If the principle of nationality means anything at all—if a people is indeed and honestly free to choose whatever form of government it may prefer—we need scarcely wonder that the English, who mourned the martyrs of Warsaw, and who exulted in the triumph of Garibaldi, should sympathise with the undoubted patriots who fight by the side of Robert Lee. Often have the prospects of the South seemed almost hopeless; but even in the darkest hour of national tribulation there was no flinching. And, whenever the history of this great war shall be written, it will be recorded that never did the Confederates stain the lustre of their valour by such crimes and excesses as have often marred the brilliancy of struggles for national freedom; that they have faced the enemy sword in hand, but that they have never confronted him with the torch of the incendiary or the dagger of the assassin. Many of their best and bravest have fallen. Stonewall Jackson, Cavalier by the magnificent impetuosity of his soldiership, Puritan by the solemn earnestness of his faith; Stuart, the gay chivalric horseman, the Bayard of the South: these and a host of other gallant champions have done their work and gone home for their wages. Lee's toilworn veterans, who night and day keep watch and ward in the trenches that guard Petersburg and Richmond, have seen their ranks most lamentably thinned; but still there is scarcely a whisper of discouragement to be heard. Social miseries and privations have caused almost as much distress to the land as the sword itself; but these also the Confederates were ready to endure—from these also they did not shrink; and the delicately nurtured women of the South, when they had sent their boys to the field of battle, sent their jewels to the treasury of the State.

From a people thus sternly tried, and thus heroically superior to adversity, the voice of prayer may well ascend; nor will any one feel inclined to mock at the devotions of men who have so valiantly faced danger and so patiently endured calamity.

The following is from the Morning Post of November 16:

The Government and the people of the Confederate States of America propose this day, humbly and devoutly, to implore the Divine aid and direction. That which has been but too often a form in the North will, we cannot doubt, be a solemn act of devotion in the South. There can be no lip-worship with a nation that is wrestling for its existence. Where hearts are engaged, and when everything that is sacred and dear is at stake, no words can adequately express the emotion that is experienced. There can hardly be a family in the Southern States that is not mourning its own bereavements, and all more or less have had their share in the common affliction. All, too, must see—without dismay, but with a sad, stern, and invincible resolution—that their national independence and their individual destruction are alike compassed. It is not, however, that they are appalled by threats of extermination. They hope still, by the help of Heaven, to be enabled to deliver themselves out of the hands of those who would make their land a howling wilderness, and to this end brave men under the flag of their country, and heroic women in the churches of their religion, are about to unite in earnest prayer to the God of battles. Nor will they pray alone. Wherever patriotism and enduring courage are honoured, there will their appeal meet with a fervent echo. They have constrained the sympathy, and fairly won the admiration, of the civilised world; but even if their valour had been less conspicuous, the action and the proclaimed intentions of the Northern Government would have enlisted the indignation of free men of every clime in their cause.

The subjugation of the Confederate States may be assumed to be impossible in any sense that is compatible with the ideas of civilisation; and it is unnecessary to discuss the justice of the alleged right which the Northern Government claims to enforce their return into the Union. For all practical purposes it is enough to say that the Southern States assert another right which, to refer only to recent occurrences, has been recognised in Greece, in Italy, and in Mexico, and which constitutes, in fact, the title of the so-called United States of America. In short, they have proclaimed their independence, and will again to-day invoke the blessing of Providence upon the cause they are resolved to uphold to the death. With more valid legal grounds for action than the people of Lombardy and of Naples had, they are contending for the prize those people have, it must be observed by the aid of foreign intervention, obtained; and the sympathy we cordially extended to the Italians cannot in equity be denied to the Confederates. The English people may express in behalf of a nation speaking their own language, and bound to them by ties of kindred, the aspirations they have entertained when other nationalities have risen up to demand neither more nor less than the united population of the Confederate States are now fighting to secure. We may join in their prayers without infringing our neutrality, and as Christians we must deprecate the hostility and coercion that can only be successfully resisted at the cost of humanity, and which, should that resistance, contrary to all reasonable expectation, prove unavailing, would reestablish a nominal sovereignty over the grave of a gallant and devoted people.

OFFICIAL REPORTS.

Headquarters, Army Northern Virginia.
October 27, 1864.

Hon. James A. Seddon, Secretary of War.

THE movement of the enemy against our left to-day was repulsed. Two attacks upon our lines were made, one between the Henrico Poor House and Charles City Road, the other on the Williamsburg Road. Several hundred prisoners and four stand of colours were captured. Our loss very slight.

On the south side the enemy crossed Rowanty Creek below Burgess's Mill, and forced back the cavalry in the afternoon. General Heth attacked, and at first drove them, but found them in too strong force. Afterwards the enemy attacked and were repulsed. They still hold the plank road at Burgess's Mill. Heth took some colours and prisoners.

On the 25th, Colonel Moseby, near Bunker Hill, captured Brigadier-General Dufie and several other prisoners, a number of horses, and killed a number of the enemy. He sustained no loss.

R. E. LEE.

Headquarters, Army of Northern Virginia,
October 28, 1864.

Hon. James A. Seddon, Secretary of War:—

General A. P. Hill reports that the attack of General Heth upon the enemy upon the Boydton plank road, mentioned in my despatch last evening, was made by three brigades under General Mahone in front, and General Hampton in the rear. Mahone captured four hundred prisoners, three stands of colours, and six pieces of artillery. The latter could not be brought off, the enemy having possession of the bridge.

In the attack subsequently made by the enemy General Mahone broke three lines of battle, and during the night the enemy retired from the Boydton plank road, leaving his wounded and more than 250 dead on the field.

About 9 o'clock P.M. a small force assaulted and took possession of our works on the Baxter Road, in front of Petersburg, but was soon driven out.

On the Williamsburg Road yesterday, General Field captured upwards of 400 prisoners and seven stands of colours. The enemy left a number of dead in front of our works, and returned to his former position to-day.

GARIBALDI ON THE AMERICAN QUESTION.—We published in our columns, on October 27, a letter written to the Glasgow Herald by Mr. Robert M'Tear, embodying the most modern opinions of General Garibaldi on the American war, and leading the reader to infer that Garibaldi sympathised with the cause of the Confederate States. Last week we published a letter addressed to the Star by M. Karl Blind, which seemed to justify an exactly opposite conception of Garibaldi's notions. For the benefit of all persons who attach any importance to what General Garibaldi may think on such a subject, we subjoin a replication from Mr. Robert M'Tear, addressed to the Glasgow Herald:—'Sir,—One word in reference to Garibaldi's letter to Karl Blind. That letter and my vidimus of Garibaldi's opinions on some points of the American question (which I adhere to in every particular) are quite consistent with each other. He asserts strong Northern "proclivities," which I neither denied nor doubted; all I attempted was to show that he was not an insensate partisan, but that, like an honest, truth-loving man, he as deeply regretted the many shortcomings and errors of the North as he frankly admitted that many good things had come out of the South. I presume it will be conceded that Garibaldi is not singular in these opinions. As to the paragraph in the Index imputing "recantation" to Garibaldi, had I seen it I would at once have contradicted it. An attempt has been made to disprove the statement that Garibaldi had not "offered" his services to the North; but the documents quoted only prove that an offer was made to him, not by him, and that he declined it. I beg to acknowledge the courtesy of Karl Blind in this matter, and would recommend some others to "assume a virtue if they have it not," and try to follow his good example. As I have neither time nor inclination for further controversy, I shall decline to answer intemperate and personal attacks.—I am, &c., ROBERT M'TEAR.—St. Mary's Hall, November 12, 1864.'

TO OUR FRIENDS AND SUBSCRIBERS.

THE INDEX was established in May 1862, in the darkest hour of Confederate fortunes, by earnest friends of Southern Independence, with the distinctly expressed object of being the representative, in English journalism, of a gallant and struggling people appealing to the world not only for political, but still more for moral recognition. Since accepting this great trust, THE INDEX has unceasingly laboured, by the combined aid of English and of Southern writers, to enlarge and extend the common ground upon which two nations may cordially meet, which need only to understand each other in order to cherish the warmest mutual appreciation and lasting friendship. The chief and almost the sole difficulty has been, and is still, the callous indifference of the British Government on the one hand, and, on the other, the perplexity, to the European mind, of the unsolved and unprecedented problems involved in the management and education of four millions of the African race, intermingled with a population of the highest Caucasian type. This difficulty could be met only by a liberal fairness to every shade of honest opinion, by an inflexible adherence to truth under all circumstances, and by a bold avowal of convictions, even though ill received. THE INDEX does not claim to be neutral, but it claims to be independent in the highest sense of that word. It is because it must reflect and appeal to, at one and the same time, the public opinion of two countries as yet only imperfectly acquainted, that this somewhat unusual self-description is called for.

Thanks to arrangements now in successful operation, by which the Letters of regular Correspondents and Newspapers from all parts of the Confederate States are received within from twenty-five to thirty days from their date, THE INDEX is always enabled to present the very Latest Direct News from the South, as well as a faithful reflex of the tone and spirit of the Southern Press.

All communications intended for publication should invariably be addressed to 'the Editor of THE INDEX, 291 Strand, W.C.,' and unless authenticated by a responsible name, can receive no attention.

Advertisements should be sent and Money Orders made payable to J. B. HOPKINS, INDEX Office.

THE INDEX.

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 17, 1864.

The Day of Thanksgiving.

YESTERDAY, the people of the Confederate States, in accordance with the proclamation of President DAVIS, united in solemn ascriptions of thanksgiving to Almighty God for the victories which have recently crowned their arms, and the signal marks of His guidance and protection that have been vouchsafed to them during four wasting years of war. The attitude of the Confederate States at this moment challenges the respect of the world, and the spectacle presented to us in a nation humbling itself before the throne of the Most High, and looking to the interposition of the Divine Hand for its final deliverance, while it shrinks not from peril or sacrifice in the great cause, is little short of sublime. Well indeed may it have called forth the admiration of foreigners and the warm assurances of sympathy from the press of England. We speak only what all intelligent Englishmen will endorse when we say that yesterday thousands of hearts in this island joined in the prayers that went up from the soil of the South for future triumph, and that the general chorus of praise, inaudible across leagues of ocean, and drowned even at home in the roar of cannon, was swelled as it rose to the Infinite Ear by the accents of strangers. Premiers and Parliaments cannot repress the spontaneous effusions of Christian men and women in behalf of brethren and sisters whose sufferings and heroism have so conspicuously set forth their trust in the ultimate establishment of truth. 'God defend the right!' was the petition with which the Confederates entered upon their struggle for independence, and, now that their devotion to country has been sealed with the blood of their best and bravest, they breathe the same hopeful orison.

The Thanksgiving of yesterday was no unmeaning, no inappropriate solemnity. The boastful adherents of the Federal tyrant affect to believe that the day of Southern subjugation is near at hand, and that the Confederates have little reason for gratitude to God in the gloom which surrounds them. But never from the beginning has the promise of success been more encouraging than at this moment. The vast armies of the United States hang on the skirts of the land on every side; great armadas are on the water, whose Titanic enginery of destruction is to be directed against Southern cities; but through the cincture of fire and steel that girds the Confederacy, from the very midst of the dark clouds that envelope the undaunted defenders of the soil, we catch the signs of anticipated triumph and the cheerful note of undiminished confidence. The pious exercises of yesterday were but an interlude in the conflict, a vigil before renewal of battle; but the day will come, sooner than we dare hope for, perhaps, when the Te Deums of victory, final and complete, shall arise from a land desolated but disenthralled, and the Confederate States of America shall take their proper place among the proudest nations of the earth.

The War.

THERE seems to be good reason to believe that GRANT has made his last advance upon Richmond for the present campaign, and that for the next few months he will content himself with a strong position and threatening attitude in the lines he now occupies. So admirably have both armies developed the system of earthworks of which the illustrious General TODLEBEN is the author, that not only may the defences of Richmond be pronounced impregnable, if properly manned, but even GRANT'S intrenchments are declared by competent authorities to be unassailable by the forces under LEE'S command with any reasonable chances of success. Still, Richmond is not to be captured by soldiers that skulk behind intrenchments, nor is much faith to be reposed in an army of invasion whose generals are content to remain for months on the defensive; and although it might be disastrous to Mr. LINCOLN'S administration to declare the campaign in Virginia at an end, there can be little doubt that the supreme effort of the North has been made, and that if GRANT is hutting his troops, as is reported, it is less with a view to the capture of Richmond than with that of postponing the confession of failure until a more convenient season. The 'reconnaissance in force' of the 27th, though it cost the Federals only between 4,000 and 5,000 men, was undeniably one of GRANT'S greatest failures. We know now that some 80,000 Federal soldiers were engaged in it, and that every preparation was made for a general assault. Whether General GRANT really persuaded himself that he had only the 'spoils of the cradle and the grave' to oppose him, and that desertions at the rate of one regiment a day had left Richmond defenceless, we cannot say. But the fact that, along a line some thirty miles in extent, he found General LEE'S lines well guarded, and that at no single point was he able to make even a temporary impression, seems to have sent the whole North into a sort of collapse of despair; and it is quite plain from the tenor of correspondence from the Northern States that the public regarded the repulse of the 27th as a far more decisive disaster than any previous failure, if not as conclusive so far as the fate of Richmond is concerned. The strategy of the Federal commander was not remarkable for its originality. It was a development of the plan he had on two former occasions essayed to no purpose. Retaining a strong force in his intrenched camp in the centre, he moved large bodies of troops against both wings of the Confederate army; but instead of marching them, as hitherto, against the defences immediately in front, he conceived the idea of turning them, of marching his troops completely into their rear—in other words, of so greatly extending his line as to render it impossible for LEE with his inferior force to oppose the movement. The result, as might have been expected, was absolute failure. His 80,000 men marched out, and then marched back again. They found the advance anticipated by strong intrenchments, of which they had known nothing; they tried left, right, and centre, and everywhere they found the Confederates watchful, numerous, and determined. Not only so, but General LEE, taking advantage of a gap between two of the Federal corps, threw three brigades under MAHONE into the interval, which, taking the Federals on the flank, drove them back in disorder with heavy loss in killed, wounded, and prisoners. Backed by numbers, MEADE, who commanded the attack on GRANT'S left, succeeded in reestablishing the Federal line, but the chances of a successful assault were gone, and at daybreak the order was given to retire. The Confederate cavalry followed up closely, and so hastily was the retrograde movement made that the Federal dead and badly wounded were left on the field. BUTLER'S advance on the right fared still worse. His two corps marched, one upon the defences of the Charles City Road; the other, making a wide detour, upon the Williamsburg Road. Both came upon strong Confederate intrenchments, and were easily repulsed with heavy loss; two whole brigades of WEITZEL'S corps throwing themselves on the ground to escape the Confederate fire, and remaining prostrate until darkness more effectually sheltered them. The total losses of the Federals are estimated at little under 5,000 men. Three days later General LEE became the assailant. A brilliant sortie was made on the evening of the 30th ult., and some 300 or 400 Federal soldiers were captured. Northern correspondents urge, as an excuse for this loss, that the prisoners were 'new men,' and that 'some of them had never loaded a gun.' Is it any wonder that even GRANT hesitated to assault, and that the Federal organs announce that the campaign is concluded?

So far as GRANT may decide, the campaign may be over in Virginia; but the question does not entirely rest with the Federal commander. We are not inclined to think that the Federal troops in the Shenandoah Valley will be allowed much rest south of the Potomac. Mr. STANTON sends no news, but for all that there is good reason to expect another Confederate advance and a determined attempt to drive SHERIDAN out of the Valley. The battle of Cedar Creek is now pretty well understood. It was a brilliant Confederate triumph marred by one of those extraordinary reverses which sometimes overtake a victorious army, and which are invariably attributable to a laxity of discipline. General EARLY is justly severe upon his men, but we cannot help thinking that he expected too much of them. They had marched long distances, they had fought for seven or eight hours, they had attacked and beaten and driven four miles an enemy of twice their strength, and they had done this with comparatively no cavalry force to oppose to SHERIDAN'S 5,000 or 6,000 horsemen. Doubtless the temptation to plunder was strong, and accounted for much of the disorder. But there is such a thing as asking too much from flesh and blood, and this we conceive to have been the chief cause of the day's disaster. How nobly these Confederate soldiers fought is proved by the fact that the admitted loss of the Federals was 7,000 men, killed, wounded, and prisoners; whilst the whole force EARLY had in his command could not have exceeded 15,000. It remains to be seen whether SHERIDAN, after such a diminution of his strength, can maintain his position in the Shenandoah Valley. Every battle has brought the two armies nearer to an equality. If EARLY attacks again—and there is every indication that he is pressing forward with that intention—the battle will be fought, not for Lynchburg, but the towns of Pennsylvania and Western Maryland.

The last mail has not removed the obscurity that has so long surrounded the movements of HOOD'S and SHERMAN'S armies, but it points to Middle Tennessee and the Nashville and Chattanooga line as the country in which BEAUREGARD'S new effort to relieve Georgia is to be made. Southern papers of the 31st ult. represent HOOD'S main army as marching northward for Guntersville, a small town in Alabama, on the Tennessee River, and BEAUREGARD sending on reinforcements from Jacksonville, in the same State, some thirty miles distant. It is further said that a force of some 15,000 men was marching on Atlanta, which was defended by 6,000 men. The precise destination of HOOD'S army was not divulged, but we are told that secrecy and rapidity were two conditions of its success, and that the utmost confidence was reposed in BEAUREGARD'S promise of the expulsion of the Federals from Georgia. With HOOD'S army, FORREST, CHALMERS, and RODDY were cooperating in Western Tennessee; whilst a portion of BRECKENRIDGE'S troops from South-western Virginia, and WHEELER'S cavalry, were acting in Eastern Tennessee. Within a week, then, we may have very important news from the South-west—news which will entirely change the aspect of the struggle. If HOOD can drive the Federals from Atlanta, he will have gained one of the most decisive victories of the war. So far his movement has been a surprise and a success; but the hard fighting has yet to be done. SHERMAN has a fine army under his command, though it has been weakened by the loss of two corps since the fall of Atlanta. Whether the Federal General is a match for his opponents in the strategical ability necessary for the conduct of a campaign in which the odds have been so greatly reduced by the skilful manœuvres of the Confederate commanders, has yet to be proved.

Reconstruction.

IT was our fortune recently to converse with a gentleman thoroughly familiar with the tone of feeling and opinion in that portion of English society which is most deeply interested in the destinies of America, and most anxious for the termination of a struggle which paralyses their trade, locks up their capital, wastes, starves, and disorganises their industry—which, while it continues, renders them dependent on supplies raised by artificial encouragement and abnormal prices, and, by the utter uncertainty of its duration, forbids them to take effectual measures to obtain a permanent substitute which might at any moment be reduced to a third of its present value by the renewal of the cotton cultivation of the Gulf States. It is not, perhaps, surprising that men so keenly interested in the matter should overrate the importance of minor indications, and place their trust in pacific influences and inducements which really have little or no weight with those on whose will the prolongation of the struggle depends. But we were not a little surprised to learn that many men who ought to know better were disposed to rest their hopes of peace on the supposed interests of the Southern leaders, and to imagine that the ambition of these statesmen would induce them to favour any scheme of reconstruction which would restore them to their natural rank and authority as the chiefs not only of the South, but of the Union at large. This is a prevalent delusion among a certain class of politicians in the North, who never understood the meaning of political principles, and conceived that the public professions of statesmen were mere instruments for the advancement of their private ends. But we should have thought that Englishmen better understood both the character of an Anglo-Saxon people and the disposition of the men to whom such a people has been willing, in the crisis of a great revolution, to intrust its destinies. If Mr. Davis and those around him were capable of postponing the welfare of their country to the gratification of their private ambition, is it conceivable that they would ever have obtained that ascendency over the minds of an intelligent and high-spirited nation which has enabled them, in the darkest hour of the national fortunes, to maintain unshaken their hold on the affections and confidence of their countrymen?

No doubt it is perfectly true that the personal interests of the great leaders of the South did not point towards secession. Their vast superiority, in intellect and character, to their Northern rivals, assured them an ascendency in political discussion and administration which no temporary majority could take from them. They were the chiefs of the Union; and that was a far higher office, in point of power and vulgar estimation, than the leadership of a Confederacy which lacks both the numbers and the wealth that made the United States one of the great Powers of the earth. Selfish ambition would have kept them in the Union; it could only be political principle and patriotic self-devotion which induced them, or any of them, to cast their weight into the scale of secession. But this fact alone ought to have satisfied English observers that secession was not, as Northern writers have pretended, the work of politicians. Great revolutions arise from the spontaneous impulse of the people; they cannot be excited by demagogues however eloquent, or got up by statesmen however powerful and skilful. And if ever a revolution was the act of a people, it was that which separated the Southern States from the Union; and, at this hour, the statesman who should propose a surrender or a compromise would irretrievably forfeit his influence with the nation. The same popular conviction which brought secession to pass still exists, more powerful and more unanimous than ever, to forbid the idea of reconstruction. There may be disheartened politicians, disappointed aspirants, who would now consent to retrace their steps; but there is no party in the South which would listen to them.

It would be well that the North, as well as Europe, should learn to recognise this fact; for it is by ignoring it that men not utterly devoid of understanding have come to believe reunion possible. To restore the Union by subjugation is the hope of fanatics; to exterminate the Southern people is the purpose of devils; and if no support were given to the war by those who desire neither subjugation nor extermination, its end could not be far distant. Foreign nations can neither believe in the possibility nor desire the accomplishment of either; and if once thoroughly convinced that no other way to reunion existed, they would make their impatience of an insane and wicked enterprise audible to their hesitating and timid Governments. But, both in the North and abroad, this idea of reconstruction through war—of reconciliation through victory—of bringing the South to terms—is more generally entertained than avowed. The utter impossibility of such a result fairly and fully admitted, it is mere insanity either to protract the war or to defer the recognition of the South. And reconstruction is utterly impossible. The distinct and resolute language of the Confederate Government feebly expresses the fixed, unalterable determination of the country. Independence is the only proposition to which the South will give ear; recognition is the condition precedent of negotiation.

Because there was a large vote against secession, some have imagined that there would be a large vote for reunion. This implies a misconception and an oversight. The vote against secession was not a vote of goodwill towards the North; it was a vote for delay—an expression of doubt as to the policy of the course which the extreme party were pursuing—a vote in favour of a less violent and hasty separation, not against separation itself. And since that time, has nothing happened to change the feelings of the moderate party? Does it make no difference in their views that three years of bloody and desperate war have intervened—that Northern marauders have fired their homes, plundered their cities, stolen their slaves, outraged their families? Things do not stand as they stood then. A river of blood, a dark gulf of hatred and vengeance, lies now between North and South; and not one in a thousand of those who voted against the opening of that gulf would now attempt to bridge it over. The war waged by the North has been no ordinary war, consistent with feelings of mutual respect, and capable of being closed by a peace cemented with goodwill and reciprocal confidence. It has been a war of robbery and murder, of outrage and incendiarism—a war against every individual citizen of the South—a war that has left on every Southern mind the recollection of personal wrong too foul to be ever forgotten or forgiven. French and English were never personal enemies; Yankees and Southerners are such. The war will leave behind it the feelings of a mortal feud, not of a national tournament. Neither in the Senate nor the marketplace could men of the two nations meet on friendly terms. In Congress, the Kentuckian would front the military murderer who hanged his son; the citizen of New Orleans would face the tyrant who sent his aged father to labour at the crank, and his wife to dwell with prostitutes and thieves; the Virginian would encounter the New Englander who burnt his home over the heads of his children; the Tennessean the general from Michigan who shot his brother at his own doorstep; and the representative of Alabama the man who outraged his daughter. Nothing but political separation could terminate the war; for hardly a Southerner could enter the North without encountering a foe who could not meet him and depart alive.

Nor, if reconstruction were morally possible, would it be politically safe. Be the terms what they might, it would be for the South virtually a surrender at discretion, for she could have no security that those terms would be observed—nay, she knows by long and bitter experience that they would certainly be violated. What better terms could she desire than the Constitution gave her—perfect control over her domestic affairs, equal rights in the Territories, security for the restoration of runaway slaves? Yet every one of those conditions of the Union was violated by the North. What better security could be offered for the observance of the new treaty than the powers of the Supreme Court offered for the observance of the old? And yet New England set the Supreme Court at defiance, and Mr. Lincoln has at last converted it into an engine of lawlessness and tyranny. Is it to be said that the conditions of a treaty made after an obstinate struggle would be considered as binding by men who have ventured to pervert a Constitution? The North tried to violate the essential condition of the Missouri compromise within a year after its enactment. It is obvious that no Constitution can be made, resting on numbers as its basis, under which any rights can be secured against the aggressions of a majority indifferent alike to honour and to law. The new Federal compact would be violated as the old was, and with the less delay and hesitation that the one resource of the minority—secession—would have failed. The only escape from ruin and political vassalage would be by a new secession and a new war under much more unfavourable circumstances. Reconstruction, then, means for the South nothing else than submission. Reorganise the Union in any way you can imagine, the power of the North would still be paramount, and continually gaining upon the weakness of the South; and it would be madness for the minority to quit the battlefield, where courage and devotion avail to counterbalance numbers, and carry the contest to the ballot-box, where numbers alone have weight.

Nor has the South anything to regret in the lost Union. It gave her nothing, and she paid a high price for it. She was taxed to build Northern lighthouses, lay out Northern roads, construct Northern harbours; she was laid under tribute to the manufacturers of New England and the iron-masters of Pennsylvania; New York monopolised her carrying trade, at freights exaggerated by the monopoly; her wealth supported the whole brood of Yankee brokers, dealers, manufacturers, of whom she had no need, and who drew their very existence from her. The North rendered her no service in return—gave her no protection, failed to light her coasts, neglected to make her roads, did nothing for her that she could not have purchased better and more cheaply from England, or done equally well for herself. It is very easy to understand why the North should fight desperately to recover the South for the Union—the lucrative commercial tribute of the South for herself; but it is impossible to discern any motive which should induce the South to renew the unequal and unprofitable partnership.

A convention of States is the favourite proposition of the reconstructionists of the North. 'Let the delegates of the various States meet in convention and arrange a compromise.' There are two conclusive objections to this scheme. In the first place, it conveys a double insult to the South. It ignores altogether the Confederation formed at Montgomery in February 1861, and the Confederate Government installed at Richmond in February 1862, sets aside the Constitution and the Government under which the Southern people have lived and fought so long, and treats the States as individuals bound by no common tie; and, again, it implies that they are still considered and included as members of the Union from which they have formally seceded. In the second place, there is nothing for a convention of States to do. The function of such a convention would be properly to amend the Constitution; and it need not be said that the Confederate States have no interest in the Constitution of the United States. Nor is any negotiation required in which such a convention would play a useful part. If it were required to arrange terms, guarantees, and securities for a new Union, such a body would find its proper place. But no such arrangement is possible; as we have shown, no guarantees or securities can be of any use to the South, and no reunion is possible consistently with her honour, safety, or self-government. And in the only negotiation which can lead to peace, a convention would be an absurd incumbrance. A sheet of note-paper will contain all the conditions of peace, and they are all perfectly well known beforehand. Recognition, liberty of the Border States, freedom of the Mississippi—what is there here for a convention of States to discuss?

That the final negotiation, however, will be with the States, and not with the Federal Government, is by no means impossible. The North has always declared that without the South the Union cannot hold together; and the prolongation of the war daily imperils the cohesion of the Federal States. California has taken no part in the war; her Pacific sisters very little; and at present their connection with the Union is so merely nominal that it might be severed without the slightest shock to either. The lawless tyranny of Mr. Lincoln has alienated from him the great States of New York and Pennsylvania, and all but provoked revolt in the West; while New England renders him, in his worst extravagances, a devoted and admiring support. The strain which he is putting on the Federal bond, in the attempt to force his election by illegal votes, is not unlikely to snap it. The patience of the people has been tried to the uttermost already; it will not be surprising if this Presidential election, with the scenes of lawless violence and unparalleled excitement which it promises to present, should bring them into direct collision with the faction that oppresses them, or if the Union should be virtually dismembered by the shock. And should the result be to place a President chosen by fraud and force in the White House, with some of the States in open opposition, and a large party everywhere disputing his title, it is clear that the strength of the Federal bond and of the central authority will be severely tried. The future rests, in no small measure, on the conduct of the State Governments. Prolonged war or satisfactory peace, universal anarchy or an orderly redistribution of power, may depend on their wisdom and firmness. With the great States—any one or two of which could stop the war—the South may negotiate with hopes of a sober consideration and a practical result which could not be entertained in dealing with Mr. Lincoln; but for a formal convention of States, assembled to debate the fate of a Union which was dissolved three years and a half ago, there is, under present circumstances, no place and no purpose.

It would seem, indeed, that the North American continent is destined to contain not one overgrown and overbearing Empire, but many powerful, prosperous, and improving States, whose relations with one another must be those of allies, friends, and neighbours, but not of confederates. The area is too vast, and its vastness creates too many distinct interests, geographical divisions, and local characteristics, to allow of its retention under a single Government. This is, no doubt, a disappointment to the gigantic dreams entertained by Americans of a Republic whose hundred millions of people should spread over the continent and give law to the world. But it may well be a blessing not only to the world at large, but to America herself. National rivalry, the mutual vigilance and control of neighbouring Powers, the contrast and collision of different Governments, have their use in the economy of Providence, and it may be that the time is come when they are necessary for North America. Be that as it may, it is certain that North and South could never again live under one government, unless that government were a crushing despotism; and those who still cherish the vision of reconstruction are engaged in a task as utterly hopeless as those of Sisyphus and the Danaides.

Short-lived 'Conquests.'

Most probably Mr. Lincoln has secured another four years' lease of power. How he acquired it—whether he is the elect of bayonets or of a free ballot—concerns our present purpose but little. It is sufficient for us to know that the party which is bent upon the overthrow of the Confederate States, or the extermination of their people, will wield the whole power of the Northern Government for the next four years. Some regret may indeed be felt at witnessing so tame a surrender of all their liberties by a people once so jealous of even the least of their privileges, at their submission to a vulgar despotism unrelieved by a single quality that can excuse its toleration. Even the optimist must be startled at the political madness that has seized upon the nation, impelling it to the shipwreck of all the elements of its prosperity and greatness, for the accomplishment of an end condemned by the common instinct of humanity.

Such a spectacle may well shake our confidence in self-government, but for the people of the South it can only serve to nerve their arms and quicken their purpose, for upon the struggle they are now waging hangs not alone their own existence as a free people, but the last hope of true republican liberty on the American continent. This acceptance of Mr. Lincoln's rule for another four years forcibly illustrates the blind headlong passion of the North, its disregard of the teachings of the past three years, as well as its indifference to the reckonings of the future. In the face of the meagre results of the enormous expenditure of blood and treasure, can it be believed that the people will persevere in a war of subjugation? If they were to-day any nearer their object, we might applaud their energy, their fortitude, and their faith, whilst condemning and abhorring their purpose.

A glance at the operations throughout the whole theatre of war, during the past three years, shows, particularly in the West, how unprofitable has been the immense sacrifice of men and money, and how short-lived have been the conquests. At the opening of the present year the Federal arms held almost undisputed possession of Kentucky, Tennessee, North Alabama, two-thirds of Mississippi, Missouri, Arkansas, that portion of Louisiana known as the Teche country, and the Texas coast—except Sabine Pass and Galveston—to the mouth of the Rio Grande, and up the line of that river for about 150 miles. Sherman, with an army of 40,000 men, had swept across Central Mississippi, forcing General Polk to the left bank of the Alabama, and so paralysing the movements of the Confederates by the bare weight of numbers, that Mobile, Selma, Montgomery, or whichever was his 'objective point,' seemed within his easy grasp. At the same time a cooperating column of 10,000 cavalry came sweeping down from the line of the Tennessee, so that, for the second time since the fall of Vicksburg, the State was completely overrun. Forrest's splendid victory over this cooperating force will be remembered by our readers, and with the defeat of his cavalry Sherman was compelled to retreat, the Confederates harassing him in flank and rear to within cannonshot of the fortifications of Vicksburg.

While Sherman was thus 'crushing out armed rebellion' in Mississippi, West of the Father of Waters three armies were converging to give the coup de grâce to the 'demoralised hordes' commanded by Generals Taylor, Magruder, and Price. Everything seemed auspicious for the Union arms, and many no doubt believed that the campaign would prove no more hazardous or exciting than a promenade militaire, as Banks expressed it. The Union army of the frontier, under General Thayer, was advancing to occupy Magruder and cut off the retreat of Price, while Steele's army from Little Rock should run him to earth or into Red River. Fort de Russey and Alexandria had yielded to Admiral Porter's fleet and the 16th Army Corps. Banks was 'conquering' for the third time West Louisiana from the Gulf to the line of the Red River, while the whole coastline of Texas and that of the Rio Grande were dotted with the flags of Federal ships or garrisons. Such was the 'situation' in the Trans-Mississippi Department in the early spring of 1864. Did these armies of Steele, Thayer, Smith, and Banks, with their fleet of gunboats, 'finish up the rebellion' in that quarter as they boasted they would do? How the tide of invasion was rolled back, and the confident hosts of the enemy were broken and scattered—his trains captured or destroyed, his transports, and not a few of his gunboats, burnt or sunk—till, to escape total annihilation or capture, he abandoned everything that might impede his flight—may be read in the light of the victories of Mansfield, Pleasant Hill, Grand Ecore, and the other brilliant achievements of Generals Taylor and Price in the memorable campaign on Red River in the spring of 1864. Since then the career of the Confederate armies in the Valley of the Mississippi has been one of unbroken success. They have put the enemy on the defensive throughout the whole Valley. They have wrested from him position after position, till now, after three years of war, the invader is forced to abandon all his conquests in Mississippi, Louisiana, Texas, and Arkansas, with the exception of those covered by his gunboats, and even these could not secure him Galveston. Mississippi and Middle and West Tennessee have been recovered, and the three Federal armies—that of the Tennessee, that of the Cumberland, and that of the Ohio—which overran and once occupied these States, is reduced from half a million to the 40,000 or 50,000 men under Sherman and the few white regiments in garrison along the rivers. The 'conquest' of Arkansas and the Indian territory cost, according to a Federal estimate, fully 50,000 men, so protracted and desperate was the struggle. Fortress Monroe scarce seemed more firmly within the Federal power than this State, every town and strategic point—even those in the Indian territory—having its garrisons, with the White and Arkansas rivers patrolled by fleets of the gunboats. How much of the State do the Federal arms dominate to-day? Helena on the Mississippi, and Little Rock on the Arkansas, each of them under cover of the gunboats. Duvall's Bluff and Batesville on White River, Pine Bluff, Dardanelles, and, we believe, Fort Smith on the Arkansas, have been abandoned. The army of Steele is shut up in Little Rock, while Price marches almost without opposition into Missouri, gathering supplies and recruiting thousands of enthusiastic volunteers, when in good sooth the native and German Radicals of that section were flattering themselves that the defeat of Pea Ridge had rid them for ever of Price and his 'rebel hordes.' Turning to the department of the Gulf, we find all West Louisiana, to Berwick's Bay, recovered from the enemy for the third time, and not a hostile foot upon the soil of Texas; Indianola, Matagorda, Pass Cavallo, Pass Aransas, Brownsville, the whole line of the Rio Grande abandoned. Except the single post at Port Hudson, the army of the Gulf do not to-day hold as much territory as it did three months after Butler's arrival in New Orleans. Truly, the suppression of the rebellion is a big job, as Mr. Lincoln once expressed it, and the wonder is that he will keep pegging away at it—to use another elegant expression of his—seeing what a costly indulgence it is. We know, to be sure, that his political ambition demands a continued prosecution of the war. But it passes our comprehension that the people should thus continue blindly to sacrifice their blood and treasure when thousands of lives and millions of money have already been wasted; while every impartial observer sees that the final result must be the exhaustion of the North—perhaps of the South too—and the political independence of the Confederacy. There is surely a madness that seizes at times upon whole nations as well as individuals; else how can we account for this political blindness? 'Let him alone—Ephraim is wedded to his idols.'

ENGLISH CHIMNEY-SWEEPERS.*

The faculty of invention is limited, and it is not possible to attribute even to Abolitionists the ingenuity necessary to the fabrication of all the stories which have adorned the romances of Mrs. Beecher Stowe. Indeed, a perusal of certain documents stored in the State offices of Boston has more than once raised the suspicion that copious draughts have been fetched from those pure fountains of horrors. Sufferings inseparable, except under the restraining hand of conscientious legislation, from a vast system of manufactures had assumed in the city of piety, learning, and philanthropy, a portentous magnitude, and the record of misery remains as an admirable armoury, the weapons of which, like the more material steel, are cast at home, to be wielded against the foreigner. Of course it was open to men who were vilified as 'men-stealers, heathen, and nigger-drivers,' to retort upon the Puritans of Massachusetts, and bid the physician heal himself, though possibly it might occur to a candid mind that the accusation in either case sprang from hate or recrimination rather than a strong sense of just indignation.

We have abused the iniquities both of Boston and of the enemies of Boston, and now we have a charge to level against ourselves, not from any peculiar desire to induce ourselves to think worse of England and Englishmen, but rather from a feeling of shame that we who never weary of holding ourselves out to Christendom as the chosen race, the children of righteousness, superior to Frenchmen in morality, to Yankees in honesty, to Southerners in ardent love of universal freedom, are detected tripping in a very unseemly manner. We have been convicted on the clearest evidence of selling human beings, of brutally ill-treating children of tender years, of conspiring to defeat the humanity of the law. There is no ground of defence, and confession, to be followed by amendment, is our only resource. Our crime has about it a peculiar atrocity. It has not been committed by the refuse of society, by that crowd of miscreants who seem born for no other purpose than to degrade honester men by their impure contact, but by gentlemen, by peers of the realm, and even by members of the House of Commons. Worse than all, our women have offended equally. Town and country, London mansion and manorhouse, all have been the scene of our iniquity. The police have copied their betters and been indifferent; the efforts of merciful informers have been set at naught by magistrates.

Just as an occasional walk through the wretched alleys of this metropolis is a duty cast on the possessor of wealth, in order that the evidence of his own eyes may prove what a gap exists between the Dives and Lazarus of the nineteenth century, which it behoves the former to fill up, so a certain report, published in the year 1863, may be safely recommended as a salutary alterative to any one who fares sumptuously every day. There he may read, perhaps to his amazement, that it is possibly owing to the sufferings of an infant that he has for the last ten years been enabled to dine in a manner worthy of Philippe's or the Reform Club. He does not rise at 3 A.M., and may be ignorant of the fact that his chimney is purified by the efforts of a climbing-boy. A glance at a portion of the contents of the First Report of the Children's Employment Commission may cause a shock to his digestion, but in the end the result may be advantageous, not only to his fellow-creatures, but even to himself. We had seldom realised accurately the meaning of the word 'horrible' until we had studied the above-mentioned volume, and pardon must be asked and granted if citations therefrom produce a sense of deep disgust.

In the year 1840 an Act of Parliament provided that any person who should compel or knowingly allow any child under the age of twenty-one years to enter a chimney for the purpose of sweeping the same should be fined, and further that no child under sixteen years of age should be apprenticed to a chimney-sweeper. A panic thereupon set in among the masters, and climbing boys fell into desuetude. It is now unhappily placed beyond doubt that the employment of children in the work has increased immensely during the last six years. Thus, a London sweeper affirms that his country customers in the machine trade declare that the use of climbing boys is quite general in the country, while another witness says that there are plenty of men in London that still have boys, and that there are undoubtedly more climbing boys now in London than there were a few years ago. The metropolis is, however, less open to censure than the manufacturing towns, among which Birmingham, Rochdale, Ashton-under-Lyne, and above all Nottingham, seem to enjoy an infamous preeminence. The offence, too, is immeasurably increased by the indisputable efficacy of the machines, rendering the employment of boys a mere satisfaction of the idleness of the master or the unscrupulous perversity of the house-owners.

The method by which the boys are procured for the work is by bargain and sale or by letting. The price at which the unfortunate wretches are bought body and soul varies from 5*l.* to 50*s.*, and the letting value appears to range from 1*l.* to 5*l.* The vendors or lessors, as the case may be, are either mothers of illegitimate children or fathers who derive a small and infamous profit from the letting of their own sons. One witness will suffice. Mr. Clarke of Nottingham says, 'A crown or so is paid down to the parent, and in some cases a pound or so a year is afterwards paid, but generally nothing. I believe this is the rule throughout the country.'

The age of the victim is the next feature of a dark description. Six is the most docile period; at eight the growth becomes too much advanced; while five and even four years and a half have added their quota. 'I once saw (says a witness) a child of only four years and a half in the market-place (Nottingham) in his sooty clothes and with his scraper in his hand. His father told me his birthday, and said that he began when he was four, and that he would make a nice little climber.' The education is attended with much suffering, not merely from the injury done to the hands, elbows, and knees, but from the brutality of the masters. One of these, speaking of a clumsy boy, says: 'Part of his knee-caps got torn off, the gristle all showed white, and the tendons all around were like white string, or an imitation of white cotton; his back was covered with sores all the way up. To harden his knees, a lotion made of urine, simmered with hot cinders, was put on them; and, to make him hold up his knees straight the while, he had a brush tail tied up and down his back, and something else like it in front, and he was made to walk in this way twenty, forty, or fifty times up and down the room. It was like killing him, and I had to stand by and see it all.' Then, again, instances are given of a boy being burnt from the chimney being on fire, of another being flogged for refusing to enter a second time into a hot steam-boiler flue, of another who died in a chimney, and of whom the doctor, at the inquest, declared that 'they had pulled his heart and liver out of place in dragging him down.' Indeed, one gentleman of Leicester has collected twenty-three cases of boys who have been stifled in chimneys since 1840. But even if the perils of flues and the blows of masters leave life to the boys, the existence is one of pain and sorrow. Sleeping in sooty clothes induces a peculiar cancer known as the 'sooty wart,' one of the most frightful forms of disease that ever afflicted humanity. The moral condition of the adult is on a par with his physical state. School is almost unknown; crime is the great lesson, readily learned and never forgotten; and the gaol frequently affords the only refuge to the grown-up climbing-boy. We shall close this sketch, already sufficiently appalling, with one more citation from the evidence. The following is the experience of one of the Assistant-Commissioners:—

On a subsequent night, at about 10.30 P.M., I accompanied the witnesses Simpson and Stransfield to some cellars where they thought we might find some boys 'sleeping black;' so far as the boys were concerned our visit was unsuccessful; my companions said that my enquiries had been heard of and the 'birds had flown;' in one place, however, I saw what they informed me was a specimen of the habits of the ordinary journey sweep, and at the same time an illustration of the practice, for instances of which I was in search, though it happened to be an adult and not a child in the present case.

I followed Stransfield down some broken stone steps into a dirty and ill-drained area in a district of Manchester, where a dense population is closely packed in small and crowded dwellings. He entered a door, and after some delay returned and took me in with him to a low-pitched unsavoury cellar, the only occupants of which appeared at first to be a woman and wo little girls in ragged clothes. After some little time I dis-overed by the fire light, there being no candle, a small bed-tead, which with two wooden three-legged stools and a table onstituted all the furniture of the place; on it was a mattress, nd on the mattress a black heap, which ultimately proved to e a young man who was sleeping underneath the blanket, in hich he used to catch the soot in his trade of chimney-sweep-ng; he and his blanket were both quite black, and that blanket was told, was the only bed covering for his wife and two laughters who were then preparing to join him; I certainly ould see no other. Simpson told me that the stench there at imes was enough to knock him down, and that he would never o inside, but kicked at the door and smoked his pipe outside ill some one came.

Such a state of things is wellnigh incredible in a country that not only boasts of the freedom and happiness of its own people, but has set itself the task of corrector norum to the universe. Happily for the credit of England, the Legislature has—basing its action on this Report—passed strong laws to put down this nefarious system; and the efforts of the Association for Suppressing the Use of Climbing-Boys are such as to give some hope of success.

DISPUTABLE AND INDISPUTABLE LIFE ASSURANCES.*

If there is one thing certain in human life, it is its uncertainty; if there is one thing more uncertain than life itself, it is Life Assurance. Every one who knows anything of the ordinary policies of life assurance knows that they not only can be, but continually are, disputed. But what an indisputable life assurance may be, and how it differs from an ordinary policy, is a matter on which the world in general is in total ignorance. On this point Mr. Robertson's little book supplies us with information. It appears that an ordinary policy of life assurance is coupled with a number of conditions the failure to comply with any one of which renders the policy void. An indisputable policy, on the other hand, is based upon one single condition—namely, that the person on whose life the insurance is effected is alive at the time the policy is granted; and provided this be so, the payment of the annual premiums absolutely entitles the holder of the policy to the amount secured whenever and from whatever cause the contemplated death may occur. In both cases enquiry is made into the facts affecting the proposed insurance, in order that it may be ascertained that the speculation is a reasonably safe one, before the policy is granted. But in the one case the office is contented to rely solely on this preliminary enquiry, while in the other a power is reserved of disputing the liability on a variety of grounds after the death has occurred.

The cases collected by Mr. Robertson illustrate the different grounds on which an ordinary assurance may be disputed, and they are of a number and a nature to alarm any one who is interested in that kind of security. If the policy has been obtained by fraud, if the person on whose life the assurance is made has gone beyond certain geographical limits, if his death has been by suicide, if the policy has been assigned without a formal notice to the office, or if there has been a misstatement in any of the documents lodged with the company preparatory to the assurance, whether that misstatement has arisen from an innocent error or been made fraudulently, and whether the statement be of any or of no importance—on all or any one of these grounds an ordinary policy may be held void. Seeing the great number of statements which have to be submitted in writing to the office before an assurance is effected, it is scarcely credible that such a condition as the last should be inserted in most policies, or be insisted on by any office as a defence to a bonâ-fide claim. But, according to Mr. Robertson, one policy was successfully resisted on this very ground.

It would be more satisfactory if a book, which is based entirely on cases contested and decided in courts of law, had afforded its readers an opportunity of testing its accuracy by giving the references to the published reports where those cases are to be found; but those who are conversant with the dealings of insurance offices know that the instances quoted are by no means exceptional. In the little work before us the objectionable conditions which hamper the policies of the various offices are massed together, as if they were all to be found in every 'ordinary policy of assurance,' whereas in fact there are as many varieties of assurances, and as many degrees of security, as there are offices in existence. It is clear, however, that the one object and intention of life assurances is to provide a security against some of the evils entailed by the uncertainty of human life; and, therefore, in life assurances insecurity or uncertainty is the greatest of evils. It seems almost necessarily to follow that the nearer such a policy approaches to being indisputable, the nearer it attains to the desired end.

New York in time of War.—The equipages on the Park were never more dashing or numerous. A day or two since the Park seemed like the dazzling panorama of an Eastern pageant, with nature and her sublime artist, Frost, to touch the picture with their unapproachable tints. The stores were never better patronised for fine and costly goods. The opera was never more gay and brilliant; the theatres never better patronised, including 'Solon Shingle.' The fancy stores, the superb establishments like that of Helmbold's, just above the Metropolitan, never had more lucrative customers. The hotels were never more crowded, so that you have to order a room a week in advance in order to secure a comfortable one.—New York Herald.

Schenectady, in the State of New York, boasts a novelty in journalism. It has a daily paper with two editors, one Republican and the other Democrat, who each have a page of every day's paper. The second page is for M'Clellan and the third for Lincoln, and spirited controversies are constantly going on within the limits of a single sheet.—Boston Courier.

THE CONFEDERATE CAUSE IN FRANCE.

THE FRENCH PRESS ON THE CAPTURE OF THE FLORIDA.

FROM A CONFEDERATE CORRESPONDENT.

Paris: November 16.

If there be qualities in the character of the French people which are more prominent and more generally recognised than others, they are those of spontaneity, vivacity, and impetuosity. Sometimes, indeed, they are charged with an inability for meditation, are said to lack both calmness and moderation—in a word, to be too prompt in action and too hasty in judgment.

I know not whether these eulogiums or censures, by whichever name they may be called, are merited; but I do know that this French press, which appears so formidable to the Imperial Government, from the frivolous manner in which questions of public importance are examined by it, and the passionate spirit in which it discusses them, is considerably behind the press of all the other large contemporary social centres.

Apart from the consideration of questions of exclusively French interest, I do not know of one the discussion of which has originated in the French press. The French journalist almost invariably follows in the track of his foreign contemporary. It is by the latter that ideas are disseminated in the public mind, and it is he who first directs attention to their consideration. I do not remember the French press having once taken the initiative in the discussion of any subject excepting one in which the village clock-tower was concerned. In support of this statement many instances may be cited; but I will now speak of one only, which is furnished me by the case of the Florida.

If there be one uncontested and incontestable principle in matters of international jurisprudence, it is that which has been so outrageously violated by the Federals in the port of Bahia. Never was so gross an infraction of the law of nations committed; never was so odious a crime perpetrated by a belligerent, without scruple and without either honour or law. If there be one subject on which public opinion may be at once made up, it is that of the Florida. Will it be credited?—the Paris press has allowed an entire week to elapse without having scarcely uttered a word on the subject. Was it meditating, or was it hesitating? However this may be, it was not until the English press had pronounced and repronounced its opinion on this affair that it received any notice from the French journals.

I mention this tardiness without wishing to censure it. All that I would say is, that the French press is not so thoughtless as it is generally considered, and that it gives its opinion only when the opinions of others have been expressed. If from this it be concluded that it receives its opinions cut and dried, an exaggerated deduction would be made from the facts which I have stated; nevertheless it may be truthfully asserted that the opinions of the French press are invariably formed by a comparison with the opinions of others. The French mind excels in arranging scattered elements, in collecting facts, in grouping them according to their affinity, and in deducing from them general laws; it does not create, it does not invent, it generalises. This feature of the French mind is prominently shown in its propensity towards centralisation and in its preferences for precise regulation.

So far as the case of the Florida is concerned, the delay of the French press in the expression of its opinion is not to be regretted. If it has taken its time to speak, it has at all events spoken well.

Indeed, I do not think that any act of the Federals, from the commencement of the war until the present, has ever been so severely judged by the French journals as this waylaying at Bahia. With the exception of the Siècle and the Opinion Nationale, which vainly seek for reasons on which to base an excuse for the commander of the Wachusetts, the whole of the Paris press has condemned this act with equal severity; and what is certainly curious is, that the two most serious and most severe articles which have hitherto been published on this subject have appeared in the Journal des Débats and in the Nord, two ultra-Federal journals. Let us examine these two remarkable and very interesting articles.

The 'Journal des Débats.'

Even though some of the aggravating circumstances with which the capture of the Florida seems to have been accompanied should be either exaggerated or denied, the fact itself, in its expressive simplicity, could neither be seriously discussed nor palliated by any excuse. The Federal Government, notwithstanding all evidence to the contrary, may deny the connivance of the United States Consul at Bahia and of the commander of the Wachusetts; it may maintain that the promise made by the Consul to the Governor of Bahia, that no attack should be made upon the Florida in the Brazilian waters, concerned the Consul only, and that the commander of the Wachusetts was entirely ignorant of this promise. Stripped of its trickery and falsehood, however, the enterprise of which the Florida was the victim is none the less a brutal attack on the Brazilian sovereignty, and a flagrant violation of neutral rights.

The Journal des Débats then reviews the 'captious' arguments (this is the word it uses) which may be advanced by the Federal Government; it shows their utter insufficiency, and restates its opinion in a single phrase which characterises, in very strong language, the international policy of the United States. 'The United States,' says this journal, 'does not acknowledge neutral rights.'

Must it be concluded, asks the Débats, that the weakness of the outraged State was the sole cause of this aggression? Both in France and in England the Americans have respected the principle which they have violated at Bahia; was this respect induced simply by a fear of chastisement? If, therefore, the Federal Government would avoid the accusation of regulating its actions by the strength or the weakness of the States to which it addresses itself it should certainly give satisfaction to the Brazilian Government. Unfortunately, it is to be feared that this Government will persist in maintaining its 'unqualified pretensions;' at all events, one is induced to think so from the arguments put forth by the United States Consul at Bahia in the request made by him to the Governor that the right of free access should be refused to the Florida. The Débats qualifies these sophistic arguments, and disposes of them as follows:—

In rejecting his insolent summons, the president of the province of Bahia, M. Da Silva Gomez, whose good judgment and energy in this matter cannot be too highly praised, had but one answer to make—that the Brazilian Government having conceded to the Confederate States in the present contest the title and character of belligerents, it was neither just nor possible to refuse them the privileges due to such an acknowledgment. And one of the most incontestable of these privileges is the right of seeking and of obtaining an asylum in a neutral port for the repair of damages. The duration and the conditions of this asylum may be a matter of dispute; but so far as the principle itself is concerned, every neutral State is bound to respect it, and in this matter there is no obligation other than the observance of perfect equality towards the belligerent vessels thus admitted.

The following is the conclusion of this remarkable article, which reflects the greatest honour on the impartiality of the Journal des Débats, and also on its writer, M. Ernest Doltaire. (I should state that throughout this article the Florida is called a steamship of the Confederate States navy.)

But again, the real question to which the capture of the Florida has given rise is that of the violation of a foreign territory, independent and sovereign. It is an act as culpably audacious as if an Austro-Prussian vessel were seized by a Danish vessel in the Brest Roads or at Spithead. It is not sufficient that the Federal Government should not acknowledge the rebels as belligerents, that it may have the right to seize their vessels in a foreign territory. To act thus is to commit an act of open hostility against such a territory—to be guilty of an insult which can only be effaced by war or by a prompt and public reparation. Such a reparation was obtained by England in the affair of the Trent, and France, more fortunate, had not even to demand it in that of the Kearsage. Let us still hope, notwithstanding apprehensions to the contrary, that reparation from the Washington Cabinet will be obtained by Brazil.

The 'Nord.'

The article published by this journal is of a more philosophic character than the preceding; its conclusions are entirely based on principles of jurisprudence and international law, and it is in the name of these principles it declares that 'although the belligerent victim of the aggressive act has of itself no reason to reproach its antagonist, which attacks it wherever occasion offers for so doing, it is still justified in expecting from the neutral a protection from all violence.' The Nord remarks as follows:—

The vessel captured in neutral waters acts the part of warrantee, and the neutral that of warrantor. Consulting its individual interest only, it is possible that the neutral may have the liberty to act or not, according as it shall see fit, but towards the belligerent, which has suffered damage for want of due protection, the neutral is compelled to use all diligence in order to afford it the benefit of the satisfaction which it will obtain for itself.

The Nord afterwards examines the accusation made against the Florida by Mr. Wilson, of her having on a former occasion violated the Brazilian waters, and observes:—

Even supposing that this allegation could be proved, we cannot believe that Brazil would have been authorised in abandoning the defence of the Confederate steamship, and in tolerating in her case, by a barbarous compensation, reprisals which would only add another evil to the one already committed. It should seek to redress the wrongs of both the adversaries, but without compounding with either the one or the other by granting them a bill of indemnity for misdeeds which compromise its political and juridical rights in its own waters, and which are inconsistent with the laws of neutrality. It should also remember that it is not permitted, in a moral point of view, passively to submit to such an outrage, as also that it is the duty of all neutral nations to support it with their most zealous cooperation; they have each and all to avenge a neutral law which has been scandalously disregarded. As soon as the rights of one neutral are infringed, the rights of all the others are attacked; the situation is one of joint responsibility, and the cause a common one.

It would be impossible to say anything more just, or in better terms, than this.

The 'Constitutionnel.'

This journal, in a long and elaborate article from the pen of M. H. Marie-Martin, expresses itself in language equally energetic with that of the Journal des Débats, over which journal it has, in this question, the priority:—

Neutral rights have suffered a formal attack at Bahia, aggravated in this instance by the premeditated violation of a promise which should be regarded as sacred.

The Constitutionnel afterwards sets forth the facts, and adds as follows:—

The most elementary principles of maritime law, therefore, interdicted any act of hostility on the part of the Wachusetts towards the Florida so long as the latter vessel remained within the limits of Brazilian jurisdiction. It was thus that the neutrality of the French waters was respected last summer on the occasion of the naval engagement which took place off Cherbourg.

Moreover, adds the Constitutionnel, the Brazilian Government had taken most praiseworthy precautions; it had appealed to the honour and the loyalty of the two belligerents, from which it had received the assurance that they would abstain from any hostile act within neutral limits:—

The American Consul at Bahia added his word of honour to that of the captain of the Wachusetts. Every possible precaution was then taken: to an obligation resulting from the prescriptions of international law was added the guarantee of the personal honour of a consular agent and of a naval officer.

M. Martin afterwards refutes certain errors of the Siècle, and shows that in the present case the leading feature is the violation of Brazilian neutrality. He thus concludes:—

It will be for the Washington Cabinet to consider whether it is disposed to accept the responsibility of such an act as this, or whether it should not rather disown the officer and the consul who have at one and the same time broken the law of nations and their word of honour.

THE 'PAYS.'

The Pays has not devoted a very long discussion to the case of the Florida, but its remarks are direct and to the purpose.

The capture of the Florida has given rise to the consideration of a question of law which the public conscience has already determined. It now remains to see if the Prize Court will sanction the decision at which public opinion has arrived.

Whether a ship of war or a privateer, the Florida should be given up to her Government and her crew again set at liberty. Indeed, the violation of a truce is not sanctioned by the laws of war. Now, a truce existed between the Florida and the Wachusetts—a truce doubly established by a pledge of honour and by the cartel addressed to Captain Morris. Even supposing the act to have been committed elsewhere than in a neutral port, the captain of the Wachusetts has clearly disregarded the elementary rules of the law of nations and the first laws of war. He has acted as a duellist who, after having arranged with his adversary the conditions on which they are to fight, should say to him, 'We will fight to-morrow morning,' and should assassinate him the same evening. There is another question between the Government of Washington and that of Rio Janeiro. On this we have but one remark to make:—The Kearsage would not have dared to attack the Alabama in the Cherbourg roadstead.

American justice has a grand example to give. If it validates the capture of the Florida, if the piratical act committed by the Wachusetts is ratified by a judicial decision in its favour, we shall then have before us the most lamentable spectacle for humanity, the most afflicting for civilisation, that of an iniquity committed with the paraphernalia of justice.

The Patrie has not yet published anything very remarkable upon the question with which we are now occupied, but I am told that either to-morrow or later it will treat it in detail.

The Siècle has endeavoured to show that Brazil alone had a right to complain, and that if that country would not take the part of the Florida, this vessel had no other resource.

The Opinion Nationale goes farther. It states that Brazil herself has no right to make any reclamation from the United States, since she has permitted Confederate pirates to commit acts of hostility throughout the whole extent of her waters, and that this tolerance has given to the Federals the right of reprisal. We may remark that in the course of this article its writer, M. Malespine, applies the term pirates indiscriminately to all the Confederate steamships; the Siècle contents itself with calling them privateers.

THE AMERICAN QUESTION AT ROCHDALE.

GREAT MEETING OF OPERATIVES.

FROM OUR SPECIAL REPORTER.

ROCHDALE: November 14, 1864.

A LARGE gathering of unemployed factory operatives in this locality took place this afternoon, in accordance with the terms of a placard of which the following is a copy:—

PEACE versus WAR!

The factory and other operatives of Rochdale and its vicinity are most respectfully informed that a public meeting will be held on the Show Ground, Newgate, near the Theatre Royal, on Monday next, November 14, at three o'clock, to take into consideration the present condition of the country, and also to propose some means whereby the distress may be alleviated.

The meeting will be addressed by speakers from various parts of the cotton districts.

The unemployed cotton operatives are earnestly invited to attend.

Mr. Kinder Smith, of one of the local (Oldham) Relief Committees, was called upon to preside. After reading the above placard, which elicited a general manifestation of approval, he went on to say there were few people, he believed, who would not take the affirmative side of the question at the head of the bill. In any and every country peace was surely preferable to war. No man and no woman, however much they might have been led to admire the American Constitution and the American people, could help deploring the devastation and destruction that had been going on in that unhappy country for the last four years; and he believed there were very few, whether men or women, especially in the manufacturing districts of this country, who had not bitter cause for desiring an early peace to be brought about between the contending parties. (Applause.) All they asked for was that instead of marching against one another in martial array, with sword and bayonet in the hands of the people, the two belligerents should be got together to talk over the causes and probable prospects of their fearful strife, and endeavour to arrange it in some amicable manner, instead of attempting the impossibility of ending it by cutting one another's throats. We ourselves were all well aware what war meant. We knew who it was in our own country that had to 'pay the piper' for our own fighting in past times; and it must be the result of the war in which the two American peoples were now engaged that they too some day or other would have to pay to a good tune for the madness of the present hour. Those who could remember 1819 and 1825 would well recollect the consequences of the Peninsular war. There was little but commercial failure throughout the land, and, as a consequence, the wages of the working classes began to come down, and a foretaste of their present grievous distress was bitterly experienced. It would be just the same—and worse—with America. Even though they sheathed the sword to-morrow, it would be a long while before they saw the same America that existed before the war began. The Chairman concluded, amid general applause, by bespeaking a patient hearing for all who might have to address the meeting.

Mr. John Matthews, an operative weaver, well known for many years as one of the leaders of his class, moved the first resolution. He said he came there to express his own honest convictions upon the war in America, and to say a few words upon the mode in which he thought it might be brought to an end. He was not addressing that large meeting at the dictation of any clique or party. He was acting on his own convictions, and, he believed, those of his fellow operatives—convictions which had been matured through bitter experience. They had known for themselves in the most feeling manner—he might say the only feeling manner—the distress that had been produced around them, and hunger combined with reason to assure them that something ought to be done whereby such a disgraceful and dangerous state of things should be put an end to. So far back as 1862 the Relief Committee were first instituted, and Parliament decided to vote a certain amount of money to remunerate so many of the unemployed as might be engaged under the Public Works Act; private efforts had also been most generously made; the public purse and the resources of private almoners had been freely drawn upon, and yet their misery and distress were greater that day than ever they had been known to be before. What was it that brought about that distress, and why should it be continued? What had paralysed their trade and commerce? Why were so many thousands of able-bodied men and more wretched women and children compelled to remain in a state of beggary? Why should the small tradesman go along byways to market lest he should meet creditors with whom he could not keep faith? The answer to all these questions was simply the continuance of the war in America. Some said they had no right to move in the matter. But he, as an Englishman, would say they had long ago bought, and dearly too, the right of freedom of speech and action; and he would demand to know what was the use of ambassadors and plenipotentiaries all over the world if Her Majesty's Government and the British House of Commons believed they were bound hand and foot, and even tongue-tied, whenever they were called upon to act to secure the welfare of their own country upon the basis of peace in any other. No right to act or even speak! A great calamity was upon them, and were they to be told that there was no earthly means of removing it? Had England lost her prestige, and was her Parliament as paralysed as her cotton trade? They had been taunted on some occasions of late years that they were a warlike people, and the Administration of those days was called a 'war Administration.' But who was it that declaimed at that time against that 'war Administration?' Who but the very Peace party who are now clamouring themselves hoarse in hounding on the war in America? The resolution he intended to propose was as follows:—

That, in consequence of the wide-spread distress that now prevails in the cotton districts through the continuance of the American war, this meeting is desirous that Her Majesty's Government should use their influence, together with France and other European Powers, to bring both belligerents together, in order to put a stop to the vast destruction of life and property in that unhappy country.

The war, continued the speaker, had been raging for four years. At the commencement, our Government was told, in bullying tones—'Hands off! we'll have no interference—we'll not be spoken to—we'll have fair play.' Fair play! Was it 'fair play' to the operatives of these northern counties that thousands and even hundreds of thousands of them should be turned into paupers? Was it 'fair play' not to listen to our merchants and manufacturers, whose business was ruined by the war? The least the British Government could do would be to address the Governments in America, and say to them—'Have you not yet had enough? because, for our part, we have had more than enough.' Let the factory operatives, 'in their thousands,' tell their own simple tale. They may not know much about international law, or what the comity of nations may mean: but they know the meaning of empty cupboards, and they know the meaning of empty bellies. Let the operatives make up their minds that every man, be he one of the 'friends of the people' or be he not, who says or writes one word in encouragement of that wicked war, is doing his very worst to keep their cupboards and bellies in the condition they are in now. Let peace prevail, and their backs would be clothed. The sacred Word told them that peace-makers were blessed, for they should inherit the kingdom of heaven. That was a gracious saying, but he for his own part wanted also to inherit the kingdom of earth. Without peace in America, there would be no peace worthy of the name in their own humble homes. The wives would have no real peace with their husbands, nor the children with their fathers, for there was a 'white war' going on in every household that was starving. Which of them, then, would second the resolution he had just read to them?

A number of operatives throughout the crowd seconded the resolution, which, upon being put by the chairman, was carried unanimously, and with a great clapping of hands in approval of the speech of the mover.

Mr. Mortimer Grimshaw, also an operative weaver, then came forward to move the next resolution, and was well received. He said he would read his motion forthwith, and let the people judge for themselves. It was as follows:—

This meeting is of opinion that this agitation for peace should be continued until the war in America is brought to a close.' (Applause.)

This war, he said, was now in its fourth year, ought never to have been begun, and therefore ought not to be continued. There were two peoples warring against each other, cutting each other's throats, neither to benefit themselves nor anybody else. Nobody, surely, ought to desire to assist either of them to carry on the war any longer, but rather do all they could to bring it to a termination. They had all heard a great talk about non-intervention and non-interference, but some people were everlastingly interfering one way or other. They had heard of letters sent to Horace Greeley, bidding him go on with the war. (Confusion.) In that case, why should not the Lancashire operatives go on too, and show by their votes that they meant to stop the war? Let Horace Greeley be told that the letter he had just received was not made up of the truth. (Uproar, and a voice, 'To h—with John Bright!') He thanked them for passing the previous resolution, which would have the effect of telling Horace Greeley that the 'party' who sent him that letter wrote what was not true. (Renewed uproar.) This war must be stopped. A general election was not far off, and let their electioneering cry be 'Peace.' It was his question as a 'factory chap,' and it was their question as 'factory chaps' too. Those who hounded on the war did not feel the consequences. They lacked neither meat, drink, nor clothing. But he was a Lancashire weaver and lacked all. He knew 'lots' who had spent their last shilling, and they would join their voices with his in showing that John Bright's representation to Horace Greeley was not correct. Let no candidate be returned who would not go in to stop the war. The men of Oldham had already spoken out. In a meeting of 6,000 in that town, only one hand was held up against the resolution the men of Rochdale had just passed. It was an operatives' question, and they alone must see to it. They wanted no interlopers to tell them what to do. It had been theirs to suffer, and it would be theirs to set themselves right. 'The time would come,' said Lord Palmerston, 'when England might interfere.' The time was now, and let the operatives act accordingly. The speaker said much besides to the same purpose, and concluded a vehement harangue amid loud applause.

Up to this period of the meeting, which until now was composed almost exclusively of factory operatives, entire unanimity appeared to prevail. During Mortimer Grimshaw's speech, however, a small band of local 'politicians' arrived on the scene, and endeavoured (with what success was shown above) to get up a counter demonstration in favour of 'John Bright.' The same party continued to receive slight accessions of strength until the close of the meeting, but the operatives appeared to resent their presence as an interference that might as well have been spared.

Mr. W. Cooper proposed the following amendment, amid a scene of indescribable uproar and disapprobation:—

It is the opinion of this meeting that America should be left to settle her own affairs, and it is the duty and interest of England to keep from meddling as heretofore in the struggle that has been brought about and continued by slavemongers up to this time in order to continue to hold negroes in slavery; and this meeting believes it would be 'base' and 'un-English' to recognise the slave power of the South, and thereby commit England to a war against our 'relations,' the freemen of the Northern States.

The amendment was seconded by Mr. C. Darrah, another well-known local politician, whom the meeting was exceedingly unwilling to hear. He contended, amid the greatest uproar, that the object of the present meeting was to further the Southern cause and embroil England in a war with that 'powerful Government,' the United States. (Confusion, and a voice, 'As lief have war as no food.') The North were fighting for a noble cause. (Hisses and laughter.)

The Chairman said the amendment was rather a distinct motion than an amendment upon the resolution. He would nevertheless put it to the meeting, as he wished to appear not partial to the side he sympathised with.

In the midst of the confusion that now prevailed, it was difficult to place the matter before the meeting in such a way as to insure an intelligible vote. Many of those who voted for the amendment endeavoured to correct their mistake by voting also for the motion, and atoned for their blunder by a liberal outpour of cheers for the Confederacy and groans for 'John Bright.'

During the whole of the proceedings the rain fell in copious showers. It was a conspicuous fact that the only opposition came from the outer portion of the crowd, composed of seemingly well-to-do people, who could, at all events, afford to discuss their grievances under the shelter of umbrellas.

At Preston, Stockport, and many other towns, the approach of winter is looked forward to with the greatest anxiety. There are nearly 11,000 factory operatives out of employ in Preston, and nearly 8,000 in Stockport. A new workhouse is about to be erected at the first-named town, at a cost of 32,000*l.*

The operatives engaged under the Public Works Act at Accrington are dissatisfied with their treatment by the local Board of Guardians, and apparently not without cause. The single men are paid at the rate of 5*d.* a day, and the married men are paid in proportion to the number of children they have. It is alleged that the 'skilled' workmen are paid 2*s.* 10*d.* a day, and yet many of the operatives are performing as much work of the same kind. The factory hands 'struck' altogether yesterday, but after consultation they decided to return to their employment, on the understanding that the guardians would take their case into consideration without delay. Many of the single men urged that they were strangers in the place, and were compelled to live in lodgings at 1*s.* per week, which left them only 1*s.* 6*d.* for food.

DEATH OF A DISTINGUISHED IRISH CLERGYMAN.—Rev. D. W. Cahill, the Catholic divine, died at the Carney Hospital, in Boston, on Thursday, at the age of seventy-one years. Dr. Cahill was a native of Ireland. He came to this country about five years since, and lectured in various cities of the Northern States and Canada. His correspondence with the Duke of Wellington, Earl Derby, Lord Palmerston, Lord John Russell and other prominent Englishmen, upon European politics gave him a great reputation in Ireland.—New York Daily News.

THE CAPTURE OF THE 'ROANOKE.'

To the Editor of THE INDEX.

St. George's, Bermuda: October 18, 1864.

SIR,—On September 29, ultimo, the United States mail steamship Roanoke, Francis A. Drew, master, left the port of Havana bound for New York, passing the Moro Castle at 5 P.M., with twenty-four cabin passengers and sixteen in the steerage; the officers and crew numbering fifty, making ninety persons on board. The noble steamer proceeded on her voyage at a speed of some twelve knots per hour, running within sight of, and a short distance from, the coast during some two or three hours, the time passing agreeably, and without anything unusual having occurred until 9.20 P.M., when, about twenty-five miles off the coast of Cuba, the passengers were not a little surprised at hearing a man dressed in the Confederate naval uniform, and who proved to be no less a personage than the capturer of the Chesapeake, viz. Lieutenant John C. Brain, proclaim in a loud voice, 'In the name of the Confederate States of America I demand the surrender of this vessel as a lawful prize,' and call upon Captain Drew to surrender as a prisoner of war. The announcement was immediately followed by the discharge of several pistols, with which the attacking party were armed. From that moment the work of capture commenced. Lieutenant Brain, taking the upper deck of the vessel, accompanied by officer Little, the purser, and a seaman, secured the captain and officers on that deck, placing them in irons; while officer Parr, the first and second engineers, and three seamen, proceeded with the capture of the officers and crew on the main deck, until Lieutenant Brain and officer Little, leaving the upper deck in charge of the purser and a seaman, went below to the assistance of officer Parr, when at fifteen minutes past ten o'clock, in the space of fifty-five minutes, the capture had been consummated, and the vessel was proceeding on her voyage as the Confederate States prize steamship Roanoke.

There was but little violent resistance made, except by the carpenter of the vessel, who, after surrendering, seized an axe and aimed a blow at the head of officer Parr, but the axe falling short of its mark, four balls pierced the body of the man, from the effect of which he fell and expired in a few minutes.

In a short time after the capture Captain Drew was released upon his parole.

Having been favoured with a perusal of the register of the Roanoke, I learn from it that she was built in New York, by the 'New York and Virginia Navigation Company,' who were her sole owners; her dimensions being, in length, 218 feet; breadth, 32 feet; depth, 10 feet 6 inches; and measuring 1,071 tons. Also, from a certificate attached to her register, it appears that the vessel was seized at the port of New York under the Confiscation Act of the United States, and released on bond.

Lieutenant Brain exhibited to me his orders and commission from the Secretary of the Navy of the Confederate States to make the capture of the Roanoke. Whether the fact of her having been owned by the Navigation Company aforesaid—some of the members being citizens of the Confederate States, and on whose account she was seized as above stated, thus dispossessing the said citizens of their property—caused the Government to order her capture, I am not advised. It would not, however, require any extraordinary stretch of the imagination to enable one to arrive at that conclusion.

Names and residences of the officers and crew who made the capture of the Roanoke:—John C. Brain, acting master, Holly Springs, Mississippi; H. A. Parr, master's mate, Nashville, Tennessee; Thomas R. Little, master's mate, Mobile, Alabama; Alexander Lathrop, purser, Kentucky; Robert Troth, first engineer, New Orleans; James Conlen, second engineer, Galveston, Texas; Robert Gage, seaman, Mobile, Alabama; Arthur Morehead, seaman, Louisiana; H. J. Braddock, seaman, Union Town, Kentucky; J. D. Van Amburg, seaman, Staunton, Virginia.

Lieutenant Brain informed me that, on his arrival off St. George's, it was his intention to provision and coal the vessel, parole and land the passengers, officers, and crew, and take the vessel to Wilmington. But it having been found impossible to take the vessel into said port, the only thing he could do was to burn the Roanoke, and, with his officers and crew, go ashore at St. George's; which he accordingly did (after transferring the passengers, officers, and crew to a brig five miles off the coast) at four o'clock on the morning of Sunday the 9th October inst.

A PASSENGER.

THE 'FLAMINGO.'—We are authorised to state that the report of the destruction of the blockade-runner the Flamingo off Morris Island by the Federal fleet is entirely false. The only vessel of that name in the blockade-running trade is now undergoing repairs at Glasgow.

THE FIGHT BEFORE RICHMOND.—From the Richmond Sentinel, October 28:—October 27, nine o'clock P.M. Five hundred prisoners have arrived, captured on the Darlington and Charles City Roads. A despatch from the operator at Chaffin's states that we also repulsed the enemy on the Williamsburg road, capturing two hundred prisoners and four stands of colours. Officers just from the front say that the enemy were several times repulsed with terrible loss in killed and wounded. Our loss on the north side, thanks to a merciful Providence, was not over twenty-five men in the whole day's operations. At eight o'clock yesterday morning the enemy made an attack on our extreme right, on the Boyd-town road, between the Weldon and Southside Railroad, about seven miles south-west of Petersburg. Passengers who came over on the evening train report the fighting as having been very severe, the enemy having assaulted our position seven times, and were seven times repulsed, suffering heavily on each occasion. The fighting had not ceased when the cars left. We regret to hear, from the same source, that the brave and dashing Brigadier-General James Dearing was among the killed. He was from Campbell county, Virginia, only twenty-two years old, and one of the most promising young officers in the cavalry service.

TELEGRAMS TO THE RICHMOND PAPERS.

Petersburg, October 27, 1864.

THE enemy, with a force of cavalry, artillery, and three corps of infantry—the 2nd, 5th, and 9th—moved this morning by a detour on our extreme right, driving in our cavalry, and occupying the Boydton plank road, near Burgess's Mill, seven miles below here. Our forces were disposed to meet them, and considerable fighting ensued between 4 o'clock and night. The enemy, at night, still held the plank road, and we have captured about sixty prisoners from the 2nd Corps.

This move places the enemy further from the Southside Road than they were before.

The fighting is not ended.

Petersburg, October 28, 1864.

Last night about dark the enemy charged our works on the Baxter Road, capturing a small portion of them, from which, however, they were quickly dislodged, with the loss of about a dozen prisoners.

Our loss was small.

Lieutenant-Colonel Harrison and Major Wise, of General Wise's brigade, were captured by the enemy.

About 10 o'clock last night the enemy charged our works on the Jerusalem plank road, capturing a part of our picket line, and driving in the rest of it. About 12 o'clock, however, the line was reestablished.

In the fight yesterday evening on the Boydton plank road, below here, three battle flags were captured from the enemy.

About 200 prisoners were taken yesterday.

Nothing has been heard from below this morning.

It is reported that the enemy's cavalry are on a raid towards the Southside Railroad.

Petersburg, October 28.

General Hampton attacked and fought the enemy in the rear yesterday evening, while General Mahone struck them in flank. Night supervening, and the enemy not being pressed sufficiently in front, alone prevented them from the greatest defeat of the war. As it was, the enemy was severely punished and greatly demoralised.

They abandoned the plank road last night, leaving over 300 in the hospitals, besides carrying off all their ambulances, laden with dead and wounded.

Over 500 prisoners have been captured thus far, and 1,500 stand of arms, besides limbers, caissons, and some wagons left on the field.

Our loss in killed and wounded is not over 150. In prisoners we lost probably 400. Mahone captured four pieces of artillery, but, owing to the density of the woods, could not bring them off, and the enemy repossessed them.

All quiet to-day, and the old situation resumed.

General Hampton lost one son killed and another wounded.

General Hampton and his cavalry on this occasion rendered a service which the country cannot too highly appreciate.

There is no truth in the rumour of a raid on the Southside Road.

AFFAIRS FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

WEDNESDAY EVENING.

MONEY AND DISCOUNT MARKET.

THE state of the money market is favourable. Indeed, the operators are already talking of a further reduction of the Bank rate. Having dropped to 8 per cent., it is said the position of the Bank accounts will enable the Court to go to 7 per cent. without any delay. If this should prove the case, the mercantile world will surmount their difficulties sooner than supposed. Still, it will be prudent not to go too fast. We are only just emerging from our apprehension, before a new Egyptian loan is announced, and plenty of other financial transactions will follow, if we are to have a comparatively easy official minimum. The loan contractors and the company promoters have had a little lull, and if they can but get a chance to revive speculation it will readily be supported by the public, if there is the least opportunity of making profit. Failures continue to take place in mercantile circles, some of them of magnitude; but the late panic symptoms have entirely disappeared, and there seems every prospect of tiding through the remainder of the year in a very satisfactory manner. We may see the rate of discount down to 7 per cent., but we do not expect, as some do, that it will gradually droop to 6 per cent. If it shall, then there will be immediate activity, to be once more succeeded by fresh disorder and reaction. Money at the Stock Exchange has been worth 6 per cent.; it is not higher now than 4 per cent., with ample supplies.

BULLION AND SPECIE MOVEMENTS.

The specie market does not present quite such a satisfactory appearance as for the last few weeks, but still the alteration in the position of the stock is not very material. The amount of gold sent into the Bank has been only 50,000*l.*, against which there has been a withdrawal of 80,000*l.* for transmission to Alexandria, but there is a good quantity of specie in the market, some of which, it is expected, will be sent into the Bank. The arrivals this week have been to a fair extent, comprising 211,854*l.* from the West Indies and the Pacific; 68,000*l.* from Australia; and 245,160*l.* from New York, making a total of 525,014*l.* The silver market has remained very quiet indeed, and the small quantity of bars on offer have been taken at 60$\frac{7}{8}$d., which shows no alteration whatever. Holders of dollars remain very firm, and the nominal price is 60$\frac{3}{4}$d. per oz. the same as last quoted. The advices from Australia state that the shipments of gold during the month of September amounted to 35,750 oz., valued at 143,000*l.*

HOME AND FOREIGN SECURITIES.

The reduction in the Bank rate of discount on Thursday last has had the effect of causing a considerable improvement in all the departments of the Stock Exchange. Business has not only increased, but prices have gradually but steadily advanced, and this evening business closed with even a firmer aspect. In the English stock market there has been nothing to cause any particular adverse movement, and nothing has occurred to prevent the improvement in prices continuing. The foreign market has also, with one or two exceptions, advanced, but business has been partially interfered with by the settlement of the account, but it was only temporarily. Since the arrangement was concluded, the general upward movement has continued. The closing prices this evening were, Consols, for money 90$\frac{1}{4}$ to 91, and for the account 89$\frac{3}{8}$ to 89$\frac{3}{4}$ ex div., which shows a rise, as compared with this day week, of about $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. Exchequer bills remain very steady at 5*s.* dis. to par, for both the March and June issues. Greek stock is at 22$\frac{3}{4}$ to 23$\frac{1}{4}$, showing a rise of $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. There is the same improvement in Mexican, which are at 28$\frac{3}{4}$ to 29. Spanish Passives are up to 30$\frac{5}{8}$ to 30$\frac{7}{8}$, or an improvement of $\frac{3}{8}$ per cent., and the Certificates at 13$\frac{3}{4}$ to 14, being $\frac{1}{8}$ per cent. better. Turkish Six per Cents. of 1854 have declined $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., and those of 1862 1 per cent., the respective quotations being 89$\frac{1}{2}$ to 90$\frac{1}{2}$, and 71$\frac{1}{4}$ to 71$\frac{3}{4}$.

A NEW EGYPTIAN LOAN.

Messrs. Frühling & Göschen have just issued the terms of the new Egyptian Loan, contracted for by the Viceroy of Egypt with Messrs. Oppenheim & Co., of Alexandria. It is for 5,704,200*l.* in bonds, bearing interest at 7 per cent. per annum from the 1st of October last, and is secured on the general revenues of Egypt. The amount is redeemable in fifteen years, by an accumulating sinking fund, the bonds to be drawn by lot half-yearly and paid off at 100. The price of issue is 93, including accrued interest from October 1, equal to about 1 per cent., of which 5 per cent. must be paid on application and the remaining 88 per cent. on allotment, or at the option of the allottee in instalments extending over to April 1. Arrangements, it is said, have been made for the regular transmission of the requisite funds for the half-yearly interest and sinking fund to Messrs. Frühling & Göschen in London. The scrip left off this evening at 1 to 1$\frac{1}{4}$ premium.

CONFEDERATE COTTON LOAN.

The market during the last week rallied considerably on the receipt of good accounts from the States, the price marking at one time 65 to 67; since, on the closing of the fortnightly account, there has been flatness, and we close 63 to 64.

AMERICAN SECURITIES.

The market for American Government and Railway Securities may generally be judged of according to the tenor of the news received from the States, whether favourable to the Federals or the reverse. This week, notwithstanding the easier state of the money market, the dealings have greatly diminished as compared with the last week or two; but still prices have not presented any remarkable changes. In fact, as regards values, the market may be regarded as steady. The dealings recorded in the official list are as under:—United States of 1881, at 41$\frac{1}{8}$, 41$\frac{3}{4}$, 41$\frac{1}{4}$, 41$\frac{3}{8}$, 40$\frac{3}{4}$, and 41$\frac{1}{4}$; ditto of 1882, at 40$\frac{7}{8}$, 41, 40$\frac{3}{4}$, 40$\frac{1}{2}$, and 41$\frac{1}{4}$; Virginia State Five per Cents., 46$\frac{1}{4}$; ditto Six per Cents., 27 and 26$\frac{3}{4}$; Atlantic and Great Western Railway, Pennsylvania Section, first mortgage, 70$\frac{1}{4}$; Erie $100 shares, all paid, at 40; and Illinois Central $100 shares, all paid, at 51$\frac{1}{2}$, 51, 51$\frac{1}{2}$, 52$\frac{1}{4}$, and 51$\frac{1}{4}$.

The following letter gives an account of the operations in American bonds on the Frankfort Bourse during the week ending November 13, 1864:—

To the Editor of THE INDEX.

Frankfort: November 13, 1864.

November 7.—The prices of North American funds were rather steady at the beginning of the Exchange, when 1882 Bonds were sold at 46$\frac{3}{16}$ to 46$\frac{1}{4}$. After the somewhat worse New York quotations of October 27 had been received, the price receded to 46 to 45$\frac{7}{8}$; but they recovered towards the close of Exchange to 46$\frac{1}{4}$. The whole transactions amounted to scarcely $40,000 or $50,000, and no first-rate banking-house did business as purchaser or seller. In the small Exchange in the evening transactions were trifling, and the price maintained at 46$\frac{1}{16}$ to 46$\frac{1}{8}$.

November 8.—The unfavourable New York accounts having spread further amongst the public, orders for sale seem to have reached from abroad. There were at least more sellers than yesterday, and quotations declined from 46¼ to 46 and 45⅞. The amount of transactions about $70,000 to $80,000. In the evening prices without variation; business limited to some thousand dollars.

November 9.—The New York quotations of October 29 were known at the opening of Exchange. Securities declined to 45⅜, but maintained firm at that price. Shortly after 1 o'clock, the latest New York reports of November 1 having been known, a sudden fall to the price of 43¾ took place, finally recovering to 44. The transactions were rather important that day, amounting to several hundred thousand dollars. First-rate firms were sellers only after the arrival of the second New York quotations. In the evening, owing to the firmness of Amsterdam, prices recovered to 44⅜.

November 10.—Exchange opened duller at 44 to 44⅛; some large sales led to a decline to 43⅞. The business was not animated. In the evening the price recovered to 44¼, but closed 44.

November 11.—New York despatches of the 2nd inst. quoting gold 248½ produced a panic in Exchange, when 1882 Bonds were first given at 42¾. Numerous purchasers having arrived, the price recovered to 43½. The truth of the above-mentioned quotation was doubted, the first banking-houses having only received quotations from November 1, with gold 240½. The price closed firm at 43⅜. The Exchange was one of the most animated for Americans. In the evening small transactions; price maintaining.

November 12.—An order for purchasing Americans pushed them to 43⅝, but they remained offered for that price. None of the first-rate dealers was perceived as meddling in the operations. The relative firmness is founded on the approaching counting-day (Tuesday, November 15), bonds seeming to be not very abundant. Whether that firmness can maintain itself depends upon the reports which may possibly reach from New York before Tuesday.

MERCANTILE SUSPENSIONS.

The following suspensions have taken place since our last number:—Messrs. Caspari & Co., liabilities about 100,000*l.*; Messrs. Rougemont, De Lowenberg, & Co.'s liabilities are 800,000*l.*, not 600,000*l.*; Mr. Charles Wilson, silk importer, of St. Paul's Churchyard, liabilities 22,000*l.*; Mr. E. Caralambi, fruit merchant, liabilities between 40,000*l.* and 50,000*l.*; Messrs. Butterworth & Sons, woollen cloth merchants, of Huddersfield; Messrs. Halliday, Fox, & Co., East India merchants, liabilities 1,900,000*l.*, against which there are securities in produce at existing prices to the extent of 1,400,000*l.*, leaving about 500,000*l.*, which their other assets are estimated to pay in full; Messrs. Evans & Lewis, fancy dress warehousemen, of St. Paul's Churchyard, liabilities 55,000*l.*, and assets about 45,000*l.*; Messrs. Henry Powell & Sons, of London and Galatz, liabilities about 150,000*l.*; Messrs. Temple & Co., iron ship builders, of Blackwall; Messrs. Elliot & Co., China trade, with heavy liabilities; Messrs. C. Robin & Co., bankers, Paris, liabilities comparatively small.

THE COURSE OF THE PRODUCE MARKETS.

The improvement recently noticed in the demand for produce has not been fully maintained, and some of the markets are again exhibiting a want of animation. The return of confidence which was encouraged by the reduction in the value of money appears to be in some degree checked by the recurrence of further commercial failures. Transactions are accordingly restricted, purchases being for the most part extended only so far as to provide for present requirements. In the grain trade there is no new feature to notice; the demand is dull, but holders show no disposition to make any reduction from the moderate prices now current, and for all kinds of grain quotations remain nearly stationary. In provisions only a moderate business is passing; but for American, and indeed for most foreign butters, prices are well maintained. The bacon market is very dull, but American middles with short rib in sell steadily at 44*s.* to 45*s.* There is much less doing in sugar, and quotations are 6*d.* per cwt. lower. For Brazil coffees floating, much lower prices have been taken, but Ceylon imports maintain their value and meet a quick sale. Purchases of tea are still confined chiefly to the public sales, in which easier prices are occasionally accepted. A good deal has been done in soft-grain rice at 8*s.* 3*d.* to 8*s.* 6*d.*, but holders asking stiffer rates, the market has become less active. Saltpetre remains at 31*s.* for fine. Spices continue in limited request, and nutmegs have again sold on slightly lower terms. Petroleum sells steadily at 1*s.* 11½*d.* to 2*s.* per gallon for American refined, and 16*l.* 10*s.* per tun for crude. Linseed oil has advanced to 38*s.* 3*d.* on the spot. Cocoa-nut oil has met some enquiry for American, and rates are firm at 37*s.* 6*d.* to 38*s.* for Ceylon, and 38*s.* 6*d.* to 39*s.* per cwt. for Cochin. Sperm oil is obtainable at 64*l.* to 65*l.* Turpentine has advanced to 63*s.* per cwt., but is not a ready sale at the price. Dye goods generally are steady, with a better demand for indigo at last quarterly sales' rates. The metal trade is not so active as it was a week or ten days back, and Scotch pig-iron has receded to 50*s.* 10½*d.* cash, but prices otherwise are firm; spelter, 21*l.* 15*s.*; Straits tin, 95*l.* cash; and English pig-lead, 20*l.* per ton.

Liverpool, Wednesday, November 16.—Within the past week our cotton market has exhibited more animation, and a large business has been transacted by the dealers as well as the speculators, and prices have been gradually advancing. The operators appear to have more confidence since the reduction was announced in the rate of discount, and a belief appears to be entertained that prices will still further advance. The sales this week have reached 78,000 bales, of which 27,000 were taken on speculation and for export. The total sales this year down to the present time have been 2,310,961 bales; and to the same period in 1863, 2,336,498 bales. There have been imported this year 1,939,561 bales, against 1,398,516 bales last year. The trade have taken this year 1,381,874 bales, whilst in 1863 the number was 1,182,449 bales. The exports this year have been 488,410 bales, whilst last year they were 424,072 bales. There have been taken on speculation this year 422,380 bales, and to the corresponding period in 1863, 688,912 bales. The estimated stocks at the present time are 357,119 bales, and at the same period last year they were 182,014 bales. To-day the market has been steady, and the better qualities were about ¼*d.* dearer. The closing quotations were:—American descriptiods, 21¼*d.* to 26¼*d.*; Pernambuco, 24*d.* to 26¼*d.*; Maranhams, 23¾*d.* to 24¼*d.*; Egyptian, 13½*d.* to 28¼*d.*; Surat, 11*d.* to 24½*d.*; Madras, 13¼*d.*; Bengal, 8¾*d.* to 11¼*d.*; Scinde, 8½*d.* to 11½*d.*; China, 14*d.* to 14½*d.*; Japan, 16¼*d.*; and Peruvian, 26*d.* to 26¼*d.*

The markets at Manchester have been looking up during nearly the whole of the week, but within the last day or two business has been materially checked by the high prices demanded both by manufacturers and spinners, which buyers have shown but little disposition to accede to. Still, the markets close all very firm at the recent improvement, and altogether there is a far more cheerful appearance. A good business has been done in shipping yarns, and would have been much larger but for the advance asked. The rise within the week in the above description of yarns has been fully 1*d.* per lb., whilst in home trade yarns the advance has been from 1½*d.* to 2*d.*, and in some instances as much as 2*d.* to 3*d.* per lb. Buyers appear disposed to operate very extensively, could they be met with regard to prices. For home trade yarns the market is equally strong, but, for the reasons above given, business has been greatly restricted. There has been a very active demand for cloths, with an increased disposition to give orders, in consequence of which some very heavy orders have been given, extending over periods which place the final time of delivery some months hence, and prices have been gradually hardening. The latest quotations were:—⅞ Grey Printers, 7*s.* to 14*s.* according to quality; ⅞ Grey Madapollams, 6*s.* 3*d.* to 9*s.* 3*d.*; ⅞ Grey Printers, 8*s.* 9*d.* to 16*s.* 3*d.*; ⅞ Grey Shirtings, 10*s.* 6*d.* to 23*s.*; Water Twist, No. 20, 1*s.* 7*d.* to 2*s.* 1*d.*; No. 30, 1*s.* 11½*d.* to 2*s.* 5½*d.*; No. 40, 2*s.* 6*d.* to 2*s.* 11½*d.*; Mule Twist, No. 20, 1*s.* 3½*d.* to 1*s.* 11*d.*; No. 30, 1*s.* 7*d.* to 2*s.* 2*d.*; No. 40, 1*s.* 10*d.* to 2*s.* 5*d.*; No. 50, 2*s.* 1*d.* to 2*s.* 8*d.*; No. 60, 2*s.* 4*d.* to 2*s.* 10*d.*; No. 70, 2*s.* 7*d.* to 3*s.* 1*d.*; No. 80, 2*s.* 9*d.* to 3*s.* 3*d.*; No. 90, 2*s.* 11*d.* to 3*s.* 5*d.*; and No. 100, 3*s.* 2*d.* to 3*s.* 9*d.*

THERE are at this time many thousands of Confederate prisoners of war confined in the various forts and camps of the Northern States. A large proportion of them are wounded or sick, and all are in a state of destitution, the accounts of which, as given in private letters and in the newspapers, present a picture of human suffering, which has scarcely a parallel in modern times. The merest necessaries of life are wanting, and frequently the wounded prisoner has no raiment save that which is stark and stiffened with his clotted blood. Horrible as war is in all its features, assuredly it has no greater horrors than the long agony of the poor captive who, when the feverish excitement of the contest is over, is left to the bitter charity of strangers and foes, without one friendly hand to soothe the pains of body or friendly voice to whisper hope and comfort to his despairing mind. These men, cut off from the assistance of their kindred or the protection of their Government, have peculiar claims on the patriotism of their countrymen in Europe, and upon Christian benevolence everywhere. They did not recklessly or from choice embrace the profession of arms, but in exchanging the comforts, and often the luxuries, of home for the toils and hardships of a soldier's life, they obeyed a stern sense of duty and the call of their country in its extremest need. An unusual proportion, also, of those that fill the ranks of the Confederate armies belong to the higher walks of life, upon whom privations, such as are endured by prisoners in the hands of the North, fall with increased severity.

The Southern Prisoners' Relief Fund is intended to mitigate some of these sufferings which cannot altogether be relieved. Within little more than a twelvemonth, nearly £3,000 have been collected and expended in relief. The managers of the Fund are assisted in their efforts by self-devoted ladies in the principal Northern cities, who visit the sufferers and give them such aid as the means at their disposal render possible. Of late the Federal Government has granted permission that this Samaritan work may be done openly. It is earnestly hoped that all Southerners residing in Europe will support the Fund to the extent of their ability, and its objects may recommend themselves to all, irrespective of country or political convictions, who sympathise with the sufferings of their fellow-men.

Contributions will be received by J. H. ASHBRIDGE, Treasurer, Walmer Buildings, Water Street, Liverpool; or in London, by HENRY HOYZE, Esq., 17 Savile Row, W.; in Paris, by H. O. BREWER, Esq., 6 Rue Circulaire; and DANIEL HUBBARD, Esq., 24 Rue Lord Byron.

AMERICA.

THE second session of the Second Congress of the Confederate States assembled at Richmond on the 7th inst. In a Supplement we give the Annual Message of President Davis, and the Report of the Confederate Secretary of the Treasury.

THE reelection of Mr. Lincoln was a foregone conclusion, and no one can be surprised or disappointed at the result of the contest. From the moment when General M'Clellan declared himself in favour of a war policy, it was certain that the Democratic party would be signally defeated. Under any circumstances it was not likely that Mr. Lincoln would permit himself to be placed in a minority. There are instances of the masters of legions laying down their power, but there is no instance in history of an Administration, supported by a vast army, being defeated at the ballot box. We believe that, if General M'Clellan had avowed himself in favour of peace, Mr. Lincoln would not have obtained so large a majority as he has done; but we do not believe that General M'Clellan would have been allowed to carry the election. At present it is not ascertained what are the numbers in favour of Mr. Lincoln, but unquestionably the majority is large, and without the votes of the bogus States, Mr. Lincoln has been chosen for President. It is worthy of remark that in New York City, where the opinion of the inhabitants is freer from military control than in any part of the Union, General M'Clellan obtained a majority. So far as the Confederate States are concerned, the result of the Presidential election will be a subject of congratulation. Since the people of the North are not yet convinced of the hopelessness of the attempt to subjugate the South, and therefore are determined to try the issue of another campaign, it is well for the good cause of Southern independence that the government of the North should be intrusted to an Administration which has proved an utter failure. The return of Mr. Lincoln will not save the Federal Treasury from bankruptcy; it will not replete the ranks of the army; it will not in the least improve the military position of the North. We do not see that the reelection of Mr. Lincoln can in any way postpone the advent of peace. Republican orators defy the Eternal Himself to prevent them exterminating the people of the South. But insolent and blasphemous bravado is of no avail. Every week adds to the oppressive load of the public debt. Every battle, every skirmish, every march, every day's encampment takes away from Mr. Lincoln soldiers that he finds it harder and harder to replace. Far be it from us to prophesy that the war will end in such and such a time. We hope, indeed, that the end is not so distant as some fear it to be; but whether the war terminates next year, or whether it goes on for another four years, we know from the history of the past that such a nation as the Confederate States cannot be subjugated or exterminated, and that at last the North will have to confess its inability to enslave the South. It ought to be ominous to the Federals that on the very day they were re-electing Mr. Lincoln there were rumours from all quarters of the failure of Mr. Lincoln's military plans. Grant was not marching on to Richmond, but anxiously defending himself from attack. Sheridan was vainly seeking forage for his horses, and could not break through the cordon of Confederate cavalry. Sherman, it was rumoured, had evacuated Atlanta, and though this may not be true, it is certain that Sherman is in a critical position. The reported successes which were vaunted by Mr. Lincoln to secure votes, collapsed on the very day of the election. We are not surprised at the return of Mr. Lincoln, but posterity will marvel at it. In vain will the historian of future times seek for a reason for the Federals granting Mr. Lincoln a renewed lease of power. What has he accomplished since March, 1861? He has crushed the liberty of the people. He has torn into shreds the constitution he was sworn to uphold. He has destroyed the credit of the country. He has piled up a debt which cannot be redeemed, and made repudiation inevitable. By his undignified demeanour, by his jesting, by his vacillation, by his jobbery, by his want of statesmanship, he has made the Government of the United States such an object of contempt, that no one found it strange that a hope should be expressed in the French Assembly that the United States might one day be restored to the rank of a first-rate power. Surely none of these things entitled Mr. Lincoln to a second term of office. Nor can it be pleaded in his favour that he has achieved military success. The Southern armies are unbroken, the Southern capital is not taken, and the Federals hold less ground in the South now than they did in 1863. The merchants of New York know full well that the Federal navy cannot protect their commerce on the seas. Farmers of the West know that the Mississippi is no longer open for trade. We cannot suggest any reason why Mr. Lincoln is reelected—that is, any public or patriotic reason. We need not suggest the secret reasons, for they are palpable to all those who choose to enquire into them. Enough for us to record Mr. Lincoln's success in the North; enough for us that the gallant people of the South are for ever separated and free from all connection with the most corrupt and demoralised Government on the face of the earth. Let Mr. Lincoln make merry and be glad that he has gained such a complete and easy triumph over the North, and let the friends of liberty everywhere rejoice that he cannot so triumph over the South. Mr. Lincoln is reported to have said that 'he thanked Almighty God for directing the mind of the country to a right conclusion.' Let us reverently hope that an All-wise and All-seeing Providence may bring good out of evil, and that in spite of their madness the people of the North may be saved from utter destruction by the return of peace.

THE military news of the week is not very clear. On the eve of the election Mr. Lincoln declined to allow the publication of any military reports, since none of them were particularly favourable to the Federal cause. Grant is inactive, or rather preparing as best he can for an expected Confederate assault. Sheridan is so hemmed in by what he is pleased to call the demoralised Confederate army, that his horses are dying for want of forage. Sherman, we are told, has given up the pursuit of Hood—a statement rather difficult to understand, seeing that Sherman has not been pursuing Hood. It is clear, however, that the position of Sherman is anything but pleasant and reassuring to his friends; and if he has not already evacuated Atlanta, there is a strong probability that he will have to do so. General Forrest has blockaded Tennessee between Paducah and Johnsonsville. At the latter place we are informed he 'captured and destroyed the Federal gunboats and transports, securing the officers, crews, and a considerable amount of stores and artillery.' The Federals claim to have defeated General Price, but as it is added that Price was retreating with large trains and a number of unarmed conscripts, we are warranted in discrediting the report. It is not usual to permit a defeated army to carry away large trains and unarmed recruits.

CONFEDERATE accounts confirm the reported blowing-up of the ram Albemarle and the occupation of Plymouth, North Carolina. Plymouth is a small place in Albemarle Sound, and when it was taken by the Confederates was full of Federal stores. There was not a soldier in it, or a single gun, when recently reoccupied by the Federals.

THE Richmond Examiner publishes an account of the condition of General Hood's army, and says that it is in excellent spirits and amply supplied with provisions. The railroads destroyed in Sherman's rear have been so completely cut up as not to be easily repaired. The rails have been bent, the ties burnt, and the excavations filled up.

THE telegrams from New York state that General Ewell has superseded General Early. As the former is the ranking officer, he would of course take the chief command, but it does not follow that the latter has been displaced from the immediate command of the troops.

THE New York papers publish numerous accounts of the successful operations of the Confederate cruisers. The New York Herald says that the Chicamauga has burnt the schooner Otter and a vessel name unknown, and that she also boarded the barque Speedwell, and bonded her for $18,000.

IT appears that Mr. Lincoln's chosen officers, and Mr. Lincoln's special organs, are as ignorant of the law of nations, and as devoid of all principles of honour, as South Sea savages. On the 7th the Kearsage arrived at the port of Boston. Captain Winslow forwarded to the Federal Secretary of the Navy an official report of the capture of the Florida, but did not give the least hint at the proceeding being illegal. From the official report of Captain Collins, it really appears that that person thinks his atrocious piracy merits a reward instead of the gallows. The Boston Post publishes a triumphant account of the capture, as though it redounded to the credit, instead of being an ineffable disgrace to the naval service of the United States. It is evidently in the North esteemed noble and brave for an officer to violate the law of nations, to break his word of honour, to grossly insult a friendly and neutral Power, and to attack a ship unprepared for defence because lying in a neutral port. Butler might as well say he is a brave soldier because he is not afraid to steal the trinkets of defenceless women. What the action of the United States Government will be is not yet known. Minister Webb has undertaken to repudiate all participation in the act on behalf of his Government, and to promise full reparation. Mr. Webb embraced the opportunity to bully England, in a style which even the Star calls unhandsome.

ON November 5, Benjamin F. Butler assumed military command in the State of New York, and issued his first general order. This document sets forth that troops have been detailed in that State to insure 'calm quiet,' and much more of such stuff. The concluding paragraph about fraudulent voting is really a curious composition. It is impossible to believe that the man who composed it was both sane and sober:—

> Every man knows whether he is a duly qualified voter, and he who votes, not being duly qualified, does a grievous wrong against light and knowledge. Specially is fraudulent voting a deadly sin and heinous crime, deserving condign punishment, in those who, having rebelliously seceded from and repudiated their allegiance to this Government when at their homes in the South, now having fled here for asylum, abuse the hospitality of the State and clemency of the Government by interfering in the election of our rulers. Such men can pile rebellion upon treason, breach of faith upon perjury, and forfeit the amnesty awarded them. It will not be well for them so to do.—By command of Major-General BENJ. F. BUTLER.

The appointment of Butler is significant of Mr. Lincoln's policy and of his power. To set over the citizens of the principal State in the Union, with head-quarters in the Empire City, a man whose crimes have made him notorious and infamous, indicates an intention of putting the foot down firmly on 'disloyalty' to Lincolnism, and that Mr. Lincoln feels confident he is strong enough to defy the New Yorkers to do their worst against his absolute authority. Nor does it seem that Butler is going to be more courteous in New York than he was in New Orleans or in Norfolk. We read in a New York paper of the 7th instant:—'Major-General Benjamin F. Butler, on Saturday morning, so far overstepped the limits of propriety as to send one of his military family to the residence of Judge Dean, summoning the latter to report at the general's head-quarters in this city. This, on the part of General Butler, was an intimation that in his intercourse with our citizens he proposed to ignore the conventionalities of etiquette, and to assume, in this city, the domineering attitude that marked his conduct within his military lines.' It remains to be seen if the people of New York will submit to the shameful yoke. If so, they will display unexampled docility. Never before did any community tamely submit to such a flagrant insult. Never before, indeed, was a community so insulted. Never before was a community placed under the command of a 'general' who is a skulking coward in war, and who only dares to insult defenceless women, maltreat unarmed citizens, and plunder private houses.

THE Rev. Henry Ward Beecher has been preaching a series of 'campaign sermons' advocating the reelection of Mr. Lincoln. The idea of turning the pulpit into a political rostrum is sufficiently repugnant, but Mr. Beecher has made the proceeding peculiarly disgusting and sacrilegious. The New York News of November 7 contains a report of the 'campaign service' held in Plymouth Church on the evening of Sunday, November 6. We are told that 'the proceedings were commenced by the organist with "Star-spangled Banner," after which a polka was played, when Mr. Beecher made his appearance. After the usual preliminary service, Mr. Beecher announced his text from the book of Esther iv. 14.' In respect to the right of secession, Mr. Beecher said, 'he did not believe in the right of the Government to coerce the people, but the territory belonged to the United States.' Upon this dogma is founded the Lincolnite doctrine of extermination. The territory of the South belongs to the United States —that is, to New Englanders—and therefore, if the Southerners will not submit to be despoiled by the Lincolnites, they must emigrate or be slaughtered. A curious doctrine to be held by professing Republicans and by men who owe their political independence to a rebellion. During the first war of independence the colonists contended that a country belonged to its inhabitants, and Mr. Lincoln, in former times, held the same view when he declared that a people had a right to rise up and cast off their government. Mr. Beecher did not conceal from his audience that Mr. Lincoln was to be an absolute ruler. He did not deny that in great emergencies a strong central government was necessary, and added: 'But what if the people should say to Abraham Lincoln, "Be secret, take all the power, be arbitrary as you please; and when you have done, return us the power again?" What advantage, then, had a European Government over a democracy in making war?' The people of the United States cannot complain that they have been deceived as well as enslaved. Mr. Beecher maintained that it was a war for the negro, and said: 'He took the negro apart from all issues, and was ready to confess that he was fighting for him. He would fight for the most ignorant German under the same circumstances.' No words can express the contempt with which the New Englanders regard the Germans and Irish who fight their battles. The last part of the sermon almost rivalled the vulgar blasphemy of Parson Brownlow:—'In conclusion, the reverend gentleman appealed to all to give their votes to Mr. Lincoln. That man who dared to beg votes for the sham Democracy, especially of the soldiers, would stand in need of no day of judgment. He would get to hell without judge or jury.' All this was done and said on Sunday evening in a building solely dedicated to the worship of God.

THE conduct of the Federal troops at Natchez, Mississippi, seems to have reached the climax of brutal lawlessness. To rob barn-yards and hencoops, to steal mules, horses, and poultry, formed the amusement, not of the private soldiers only, but even of commissioned officers. The Federal General Dana had issued an order strongly condemning the disgraceful acts of the officers and men. On the occasion of a raid into Louisiana, the force not only plundered the white inhabitants, but let loose about 2,000 negroes, bidding them to do as they pleased, among the women and children. Ladies had the earrings stripped from their ears and the rings from their fingers, while it is even affirmed that three young ladies were carried off into the woods, and that of the three but one returned alive. Indignation had been loudly expressed in the Northern army at the disgrace heaped on the Federal uniform by such deeds.

MR. SEWARD has made a speech at Auburn, in which with unexampled frankness he admitted that the Confederates had gained some victories in the course of the war. He declared he never would surrender, even though the Confederates should be backed up by a foreign power. He said if ever he had been inclined to negotiate, 'I would have gone, under the pressure of national affliction, and made every defeat a claim to rebel sympathy and clemency. After the first Bull Run battle—after the second Bull Run battle—after Gaines Mill—after Fredericksburg—after Chancellorsville—after the defeat of Banks on the Red River.' We believe that this is the first time that Mr. Seward has confessed to a Federal defeat. He also made another true observation; he said, 'As for the arts of statesmanship, I know of none applicable in this case.' We are not aware that any one has supposed that Mr. Seward was acquainted with the 'arts of statesmanship.' A Northern politician is not necessarily a statesman; and though Mr. Seward could gracefully head the deputation which presented a silver currycomb for the use of President Taylor's horse 'Old Whitey,' it does not follow that he can play the part of a statesman. Wire-pulling may be profitable, but it is not statesmanship. We ought to add that, true to the instincts and traditions of his party, Mr. Seward introduced into his speech an irreverent parody on a passage in the Bible.

IN selecting 'Andy Johnson' as Vice-President, the supporters of Mr. Lincoln have manifested much consideration for the latter. If Mr. Lincoln were much worse than he is, he would, compared to his colleague, be almost a virtuous ruler and a gentleman. A speech Andy Johnson lately made to some negroes in Tennessee fully justifies this assertion. He said: 'But if, through an iniquitous system, a vast amount of wealth has been accumulated in the hands of one man, or of a few men, then that result is wrong, and the sooner we can right it the better for all concerned. It is wrong that Mark Cockrill and W. D. Harding, by means of force and unpaid labour, should have monopolised so large a share of the lands and wealth of Tennessee, and I say if their immense plantations were divided up and parcelled out among a number of free, industrious, and honest farmers, it would give more good citizens to the commonwealth, increase the wages of our mechanics, enrich the markets of the city,' &c. We commend this speech to the careful study of Mr. Bright.

IMMEDIATELY after the Presidential election General M'Clellan resigned his commission in the army. This, we presume, is a protest against the Administration. It is not unlikely that the reelection of Mr. Lincoln will thoroughly reunite the Democratic party.

THE Confederate newspapers report an important fall in the price of provisions. The Montgomery Appeal says, 'A very material decline in the price of many articles of daily consumption has taken place.'

ON the 12th inst., gold was quoted in New York at 242¼. The fluctuation in price had been violent, advancing on the 9th to 260. It is said that General Butler has warned some leading brokers that they must not speculate in gold to the detriment of the Government. Butler will find gold a very obstinate rebel indeed, and, in spite of arbitrary decrees, the precious metal will go up and greenbacks will go down. It will be some consolation to the saints of New England that a considerable amount of United States bonds have been sold at Frankfort. It will be esteemed as preeminently smart to have made the Germans fight the battles of New England, and also pay in hard cash for the privilege of being maimed or slaughtered.

ENGLAND.

LORD DUFFERIN has been appointed Under-Secretary for India in succession to Lord Wodehouse. Lord Dufferin, it will be remembered, acted as Commissioner to Syria at the time of the troubles of the Druses and Maronites. He is also known as the author of 'High Latitudes.'

THE affair of the ship Great Western, which, as was stated last week, has been stopped at Liverpool by the authorities, has created considerable excitement in that town. The vessel was bound for New York, being consigned to Messrs. Baring Brothers, who employ emigrant agents, and was stopped on suspicion of having on board a large number of men kidnapped for the Federal army. The case has not yet undergone judicial investigation, but some facts have been ascertained. It seems that two individuals of the name of Shaw had been enticing young men from London, Ashton-under-Lyne, Bolton, and other towns, under promises of employment in certain glass works at New York, to emigrate to the Federal States. The walls of Ashton had been placarded with offers of money, food, clothing, and other advantages for all able men who would avail themselves of the invitation. In London, one Starten had got together a band of thirty men with an artillery volunteer at their head, and had succeeded in conveying them to Liverpool. Several Germans were also induced to go on board the vessel. Since the seizure of the vessel many women and old men have visited her to implore their husbands and sons to return with them, and some sixty men at once left the vessel. They complained bitterly of their fare and quarters. They have been provided with shelter at the Liverpool workhouse. It is stated that more than 400 men were on board the Great Western ready to start. Many rumours are afloat as to the evidence of enlistment by the agents, but inasmuch as the whole matter will form a subject of judicial enquiry, we think it best to await the revelations of the police-court. The Solicitor to the Treasury has placed the matter in the hands of Messrs. Bateson, Robinson, & Morris.

MR. TEMPLE, Q.C., moved last week, pursuant to leave reserved, in arrest of judgment in the case of 'the Queen v. Jones and another,' on points of law with reference to the evidence and the validity of the indictment. The defendants had been tried at Liverpool before the Lord Chief Justice, and found guilty, for being concerned in enlisting men in the service of the Confederate States. The Lord Chief Justice considered that the points should be argued when the prisoners were brought up for judgment. Yesterday the defendants, through their counsel, submitted to a fine of 50*l.* each, to save the expenses of a discussion on the points of law. The Attorney-General assented to the proposition.

THE ship Peterhoff, which was taken by a Federal cruiser, and subsequently condemned in one of the prize courts of the Federal States for having goods contraband of war on board, has found her way into the Court of Common Pleas at Westminster. The underwriters had refused to pay the insurance on the vessel, setting up, in their pleas to the action of the owners, that the American prize court had found that the ship's papers were false and simulated, and that the ship was not going to Matamoras, but to some other port with goods contraband of war on board, in aid of a belligerent power with whom the Federal States were at war. Counsel now appeared to argue the demurrer to the pleas. For the defendant it was contended that, if a neutral ship carried contraband of war to a belligerent State, such conduct gave a right to the other belligerent to seize the ship and confiscate it and the cargo, as it was a violation of the law of nations; that this was a risk not insured against, and which, not having been communicated to the insurers, avoided the policy. It was also argued that the voyage insured against was a voyage to Matamoras, but that the Peterhoff never sailed for Matamoras, and therefore the policy did not attach, or the vessel had deviated in her voyage, which avoided the policy. The facts had been found by a competent court, and the finding was conclusive. For the plaintiff it was contended that, though the goods were liable to seizure by a belligerent, yet no municipal law was contravened by supplying a belligerent with contraband of war, and therefore the liability of the underwriters was not destroyed by the shipping of goods contraband of war. The shipper of course knew that the market at Matamoras was frequented by Confederate buyers, but he sent them to be sold at Matamoras, and not with the intention of their being sent to the Confederate States. The finding of the American court might be true, but did not exonerate the underwriters. The ship might have intended to carry her cargo to Nassau, and thence to carry her innocent cargo to Matamoras. There was nothing to justify the adjudication of forfeiture of an innocent cargo sent from a neutral State to a neutral State, and nothing to avoid the policy on that cargo. The simulation of the ship's papers had nothing to do with the cargo of the plaintiff. The Court took time to consider their judgment.

MESSRS. POTHONIER & Co., of Liverpool, have chartered for the Mexican Government three steamers, each of 2,000 tons burden and 600 horse-power, for the conveyance of the Austrian and Belgian troops raised for the service of the Emperor Maximilian. The steamers are the Bolivian, the Peruvian, and the Brazilian, and each is fitted to carry 1,000 men.

THE following is an extract from Mr. Purdy's weekly report of the distress in the cotton districts:—

The maximum amount of pauperism in these unions during the distress was attained in the first week of December 1862, when the total number relieved by the guardians was 274,860.

The minimum was touched in the fourth week of August last, when the number of paupers was returned as	78,730
Add the net increase during the months of September and October 1864	28,270
Total at the end of October	107,000
Add the net increase during the first week of November 1864	3,540
Add the net increase during the second week of November 1864	970
Total in receipt of relief from the poor-rates	111,510

Able-bodied Paupers.—The total number of adults on the relief lists of the twenty-eight unions last week was 30,780, which is 362 more than shown by the previous statement.

Outdoor Relief.—The total sum expended in these unions last week was 6,814*l.* This amount is 1,266*l.* less than the sum disbursed in the corresponding period of 1863, and 1*l.* less than that of the week immediately preceding the last.

AN example illustrative of the rights conceded to the ancient University of Oxford has been given by an application made a few days since to the Court of Queen's Bench. One Parsons, a tradesman in that city, had brought actions against certain undergraduates for goods supplied, and, neglecting his remedies in the Chancellor's Court at Oxford, had sued in one of the superior courts at Westminster. The Earl of Derby, as Chancellor of the University of Oxford, thereupon claimed cognisance of the causes, and Mr. Mellish, Q.C., moved for a rule calling on the plaintiff to show cause why the claim of cognisance should not be allowed. The learned counsel explained that the University of Oxford claimed jurisdiction over all personal actions brought against resident members of the University. The claim of cognisance had been entered on the record. The right was founded on the charter of Henry VIII., confirmed by statute 13th of Elizabeth, which gave power to the Chancellor of the University and his deputies to hear and determine all trespasses and contracts, pleas and complaints, personal and other causes whatsoever (pleas of freehold excepted), arising within the city of Oxford, or elsewhere in England where the scholars, or any person who ought to have the privilege of the University, shall challenge, or shall be one of the parties. The claim of the Earl of Derby was as follows:—

The Right Hon. Edward Geoffrey Smith, Earl of Derby, Chancellor of the University of Oxford, to the Right Hon. Sir Alexander James Edward Cockburn, Baronet, Lord Chief Justice of Her Majesty's Court of Queen's Bench at Westminster, and to the rest of the Justices of the said Court, sendeth greeting. Whereas the Lord Henry VIII., late King of England, by letters patent, sealed under his great seal of England,' &c. [Then the charter was recited, and the statute of Elizabeth ratifying it, and then the actions and the matters of fact set forth in the affidavits of the defendants were recited, and then the claim proceeded.] Therefore we pray you that, by virtue of the privileges to us in this behalf granted and confirmed, as soon as you shall have inspected these our letters significatory and claim, you will be pleased to suspend or supersede all further process or proceedings against the said Charles Bagnall, and that you will be pleased to remit the cognisance and final decision of the said action or suit to us, according to the privileges aforesaid, by virtue of which he is a person privileged and of the jurisdiction of the University, and the cognisance and final determination of the action or suit aforesaid we challenge and claim by these presents. Given under the seal of the office of Chancellor of the University of Oxford.

All the proceedings were framed in accordance with the precedent set in the time of Sir William Blackstone, when Sir William himself made the claim of cognisance, reported in Sir William's 'Reports.' The Lord Chief Justice granted a rule.

MEN who, by lives of intelligent industry and just frugality, accumulate happiness on themselves, their families, and those of their fellow-men with whom they are brought in contact, deserve notice. When the products of their perseverance are visible in improvements wrought in the mechanical arts, tending to increase the fertility of the soil, to facilitate locomotion, to economise labour, and to promote wealth, eulogy becomes a task of pleasure. All Europe, and some portions of the American continent, have acknowledged the fame of the firm of Messrs.

Ransome & Sims, the agricultural engineers of Ipswich; and many men in many countries have had personal or other knowledge of Robert Ransome, the chief of the firm. The son of the first founder of the firm, he elevated, by his ability and perseverance, a business of moderate pretensions into a manufactory of world-wide reputation. His qualities, however, as a private individual outshone his commercial abilities. He combined in a high degree the attributes of a Christian gentleman and the benevolent disposition of a true lover of humanity. Societies having what he conscientiously believed to be noble ends received his liberal support. He was a member of the Society of Friends, and retained the insignia of the order. We certainly should not admit the excellence of many objects to which he lent support, but not the less is the simplicity of his aims worthy of admiration. He died on November 6 at St. Goar, on the Rhine, and his corpse was brought home to Ipswich for interment. His funeral was attended by 1,000 workmen employed by the firm, by a large concourse of friends, the Mayor and Corporation of Ipswich, and many hundred residents of the town. The burgesses had not forgotten that with the prosperity of the firm the wealth, population, and importance of Ipswich had equally increased.

A MEETING of Southern gentlemen and friends of the Southern States was held on November 17 at the rooms of the Southern Club in Liverpool. Mr. Victor Poutz presided. After an able speech from the chairman on the success of the Liverpool Bazaar, and an expression of the gratification which the benevolence of the English people had caused to every citizen of the Confederate States, resolutions were passed tendering the best thanks of the meeting to the ladies and gentlemen who assisted at the Bazaar, and to the contributors and subscribers, with a special vote of thanks to Mr. James Spence for his untiring exertions in promoting the success of the undertaking.

AUSTRALIA.

The colonies of Victoria and New South Wales are at open war on the subject of the customs levied on the River Murray by the Government of the latter colony. Just as Victoria had opened up by her new railway communications a trade with the western or riverine section of New South Wales, the latter State determined on erecting custom-houses on the Murray River. Moreover, the river is claimed as part of the territory of New South Wales, while the Victorians have already by force resisted the customs' collectors. The question will now come before the courts, the final appeal being to the Privy Council.

The plan of sending home expirees is being carried out. At a meeting it was resolved to collect all the greatest scoundrels in the colony of Victoria and ship them to England, while secrecy should be preserved as to the times and vessels at and in which the expirees should leave the colony.

NEW ZEALAND.

A campaign on the west coast in the district of Taranaki, must be undertaken before the Maoris can be finally reduced. Two hundred Maori prisoners had escaped from Auckland, and had probably joined Thompson.

INDIA.

The cyclone at Calcutta was more awful in its effects than had been imagined. In Diamond Harbour 5,000 persons were drowned, and much suffering existed among the surviving population. In the town of Calcutta the number of houses wrecked by the hurricane reached to about 100,000. In many parts of the country villages have wholly disappeared.

THE Viceroy of India held a magnificent durbar at Lahore on October 18. On the previous day he had invested with the Star of India Rajah Rundheer Sing, Rajah of Kuppoortulla, in return for the distinguished services rendered by the Rajah in the campaigns of Delhi and Lucknow. The durbar on the 18th surpassed anything of the kind ever before seen in India. Not only the powerful chiefs and nobles of the Punjaub were present, but warriors and Princes from beyond the borders came to do homage to the Viceroy. The Maharajah of Cashmere and his son were the most conspicuous personages, being honoured with seats on the right of the Governor-General. As Sir John Lawrence entered the tent, wearing the Star of India and all the other honours borne by him, the assembly of warriors, Princes, and Rajahs rose to salute him, and the artillery thundered a salute. Having taken his seat on the throne, with the Maharajah on his right and the English officers on his left, the Viceroy addressed the assembly in Hindostanee. His speech was of great force and eloquence, and couched in language at once dignified and friendly. He reminded them that he had returned to visit them after six years' absence, and he named the most distinguished men whom he recognised as old friends. He spoke of the deep interest which the Queen of England took in the welfare of India, and of the duty which she had enjoined on him of caring for their interests. He reminded them how he and his brother Sir Henry Lawrence had laboured for many years to learn their language and usages, and to rule them with justice. He spoke of canals and roads constructed, of taxation lightened, of learning diffused. He called to mind how the Punjaubee soldiers, in the revolt of 1857, had shared the glories of the British arms. He finally invoked the great God of all the races of the world to guard them and teach them to love justice and hate oppression. On the 19th, His Excellency opened the Mooltan section of the Punjaub railway.

SIRDAR MAHOMED AMEER KHAN, of Kandahar, is resolved to fight the Ameer of Cabul. The King of Bokhara is also about to attack the Ameer, in consequence of the treachery and cruelty of the latter towards Afzul Khan.

THE CONTINENT.

FRANCE.

Some excitement has been created by the assertion of M. de Laguerronière in La France that there are three important State papers relating to the Italian question which are reserved for publication at some future time. The first of these is said to be a despatch from M. Drouyn de Lhuys to the French Minister at Turin, prior to that of October 30, which finally resolved all doubt as to the French acceptation of the treaty; the second is a circular addressed to all French diplomatic agents in foreign parts, denouncing the Convention. (We give the exact words of the French journals, but must decline the responsibility of putting a construction upon them. The meaning may be that this circular repudiated the sense attached to the Convention by the Italian nation.) The third is a despatch, dated the 7th inst., from M. Drouyn de Lhuys in answer to that of General della Marmora of the same date. This despatch treats particularly of the doctrine of non-intervention with respect to Rome, and makes some observations on the meaning of those much-discussed words, 'national aspirations.' A great controversy has arisen whether these documents exist at all, or are only the offspring of some fertile brain. The Constitutionnel has semi-officially denied their existence; yet the world is only half convinced. As far as regards the last of the three, we need only refer to our Italian news, to see that when questioned on that subject General della Marmora declined to give any answer. The tone of French policy has just now got a very Catholic strain in it. The collection of the Peter's pence, which has hitherto been merely tolerated, will henceforth be recognised by the French Government, organised and conducted with regularity; recruiting for the Pontifical army will be carried on publicly in France, without any hindrance from the Government, and those officers of the French army who may wish to enter the Papal service will be allowed to do so. Moreover, if the Spanish Government offer to occupy Rome on the departure of the French, it is not likely that the Emperor Napoleon would offer any serious objection.

The final examination of the scheme for constituting a 'Caisse des Travaux Publics,' or Public Works Fund, has been adjourned. The proposal to create a fund of this nature has excited much uneasiness in France; the French are by nature very much inclined to hoard their savings against either some unforeseen emergency or for some scheme of undoubted character; and it was felt that the completion of the many public works now wanted in France and Algiers was scarcely to be brought under either of these two heads. It is certainly advisable to leave something for posterity to do: and it is scarcely worth while to absorb the savings of this generation for purposes which may fairly be left for the next to carry out. There is a report that a new Ministry is to be formed in which one at least of the present Opposition will be offered a seat. M. Emile Ollivier is the person named for this honour; and, though it is uncertain whether he would accept it, the offer of it would stamp a new Administration with a perfectly novel character.

M. Mirès, the great financier of two years back, the great bankrupt of a later date, has for some time promised to start a new scheme by means of which he should be able to indemnify the shareholders in his former company (the Caisse Générale) for the losses which they have incurred through him. The scheme has at length appeared; it is unmistakably a very vast one; it is no less than the creation of a society, to be called La Banque des Etats, to be formed of all the great capitalists of Europe; its function will be to take up the loans which may from time to time be wanted by any Government, and to advance the capital required out of its own resources. The French are charmed with the notion, which is highly flattering to their amour propre as a nation. If successfully carried out, it would make France the general banker, the central Power of the financial interests of all great States. The scheme is certainly deserving of the most attentive consideration. The only fear for M. Mirès is that, as great capitalists are the most independent men in the world, they might adopt the idea as one of great value, but choose some other commercial centre besides Paris for its realisation.

The south of France has been the victim of several unavoidable misfortunes during the past few months; it suffered severely from the great drought, and was shortly afterwards inundated with rain, which swelled the streams, and caused a lamentable devastation. Since that time that part of the country has been visited by terrible snowstorms, particularly along the line of the Alps. In one breadth of eight miles the snow is reported to lie twenty inches thick.

A fashion is springing up in France of so remarkable a nature as imperatively to demand the attention of those who think that little things are often as well worthy of record as of great ones. At any rate, when we see with what avidity every little morsel of classical literature is gathered up which enlightens us at all on the social habits of the ancients, we may be allowed to mention some modern customs which are at least as curious. Every lady in Paris, whatever may be her position or her reputation, keeps her lap-dog. It is an article of furniture nearly as indispensable as a parasol. The fashion has arisen, if we may believe a journal u · lly well informed on these points, of dyeing these wretched quadrupeds a particular colour, which may, of course, be varied so as to contrast properly with the colour of the dress. We do not know how far this has been carried out; but evidently it may go to great lengths. A lively Frenchman suggests that the dog may thus be made a convenient vehicle for exchanging signals between an ardent lover and a timid maiden; but, without launching out into the realms of poetry, we can see many ways in which this fashion might be put to a very droll use. We should see dogs in widows' weeds, and dogs in half-mourning; dogs in genteel sorrow, and dogs in light affliction. The fair votaries of the turf would have their dogs dyed in Mr. Merry's colours, or in Lord Stamford's; politicians would lead about with them a blue King Charles or a buff pug, according to the creed which they might at the time possess; others would delight in a Union Jack terrier, or a tricolour Italian greyhound. There might be no end to the combinations; and, to perfect the whole scheme, the daily variation in each fair lady's temper might be denoted by a shade more or a shade less of colour on the hide of her hapless favourite.

The General Direction of Customs has published a statistical report of the commercial operations of France during the past year. From this it appears that the total receipts of the Customs amounted to 195,494,200 francs, being 8,773,000 francs more than in 1863. The total value of the imports was 3,236 millions, being 337 millions in excess of last year. These figures embrace all goods imported, both those meant for the use of the country and those in transit, or intended for reexportation. The value of the special imports—those, namely, which supply France itself—is 2,426 millions; the special exports amounted to 2,643 millions. (The figures here given represent the real value of the goods; besides this, there is also an official value, calculated on a scale of prices determined in 1826 with a view to reducing the whole commercial statistics of France to a common unity. The official value of imports is about two-thirds of their real value; the official value of the exports is only a trifle less than their real value.) It must be remembered, in examining these figures, that a rise in the total value of exports or imports does not always show that commerce has really increased; a general rise in prices would increase the value without increasing the amount of either imports or exports. If, however, we allow a certain amount for a rise in the price of cotton and cotton goods, there still remains a large figure exhibiting the development which French trade is making every year. The foreign countries with which France deals most extensively are England, Switzerland, Belgium, Italy, the Zollverein, Spain, Turkey, Brazil, British India, and Russia.

ITALY.

The debate on the transfer of the capital has at length ended; the dryness of the discussion was slightly relieved on the 15th inst. by a scene, brought on by one of the numerous explanatory speeches of General della Marmora. The general had allowed a sort of right to the Catholic world to interfere in any matter in which the existence of the Papacy was concerned, but refused to concede to any Power so intervening any privilege beyond that of obtaining certain guarantees for the independence of the Papal throne; a pacific intervention in short would be allowed, but an armed intervention was inadmissible. This statement appeared to be inconsistent with another made a day or two before by Signor Lauza; General Bixio pointed out the discrepancy, and demanded an explanation. The President declined to hear anything further from him; thereupon General Bixio sat down in a huff, promising to vote against the Convention. Some disorder ensued, and at last Signor Lauza was obliged to rise, and make a sort of explanation. Signor Mellona then asked whether the Government had seen the new map used in the public schools of France, on which a 'highly rectified' frontier was traced between France and Italy. The Minister replied that he did not trouble himself about such matters. Signor Mellona gave notice that he should repeat the question. The next incident was the disclosure of a great split in the Progressist party. Signor Mordini, one of its leaders, speaking in favour of a change of capital; Signor Crispi, another chief, speaking against that measure. On the 6th inst. there was another scene, consequent on a motion made to close the general discussion. For some unexplained reason a tumult arose in the House, clamours and protestations were heard on every side, and the President rung his bell in vain. The motion was withdrawn, and the discussion was allowed to continue. Signor Ratazzi, the late Premier, supported the treaty, observing that the transfer of the capital from Turin would for ever silence the calumnies of those who assert that the Kingdom of Italy has been formed by the annexation of provinces to Piedmont, not by the national will. On the 17th inst. Signor Moxa, the reporter of the Committee of the House which brought the bill before them, made his general reply, and closed the general discussion, and Signor Crispi brought forward the amendment of the party of action, which is to the effect that the House should refuse to transfer the capital to Florence, believing that measure to be intended as a guarantee of the independence of the Pope, and therefore a violation of the Constitution. On the 18th inst., during the discussion of the details of the Convention, General della Marmora was twice called upon to speak—once to combat the suggestions of General Pinelli, who would have the Italian Government challenge Austria forthwith for the possession of Venetia; and again to decline to answer Signor La Porta's question whether he had received any answer to his last note addressed to the French Government. On the 19th instant the House divided on the question of the Convention; the Government measure was carried by 317 votes to 70; the minority was almost entirely composed of the 'party of action.' In a matter which is declared to be 'urgent,' the Italian Chambers seem to have the habit of continuing the discussions on Sunday. Certainly a great part of the financial scheme brought forward by Signor Sella was discussed and passed on that day; the entire bill was carried by 137 votes to 77. Thus the various measures for the taxation of the necessaries of life, and for the anticipation of next year's land-tax, have become law. A debate was commenced on the 21st inst. upon the question of a reduction to be made in the salaries of public functionaries. Many of the great towns have come forward in the most liberal manner to help Signor Sella. Milan, Florence, Capua, Leghorn, and Ancona, besides others, have followed the example of Brescia, and offered to pay in advance the land-tax of 1865. A meeting of the principal commercial men in Naples has been held to concert measures for assisting the State in its present difficulties. The townships in the province of Caserta are also anxious to aid in the same charitable work. The King is setting a magnificent example of economy and liberality; he has already given up 120,000*l.* of his annual civil list, and he now announces his intention of presenting five of the royal palaces to the public treasury: one in Lombardy, two in Naples, one in Piedmont, and one in Tuscany.

The Garibaldian incursion into Venetia still continues to occupy the serious attention of the Austrian and Italian Governments. On the 14th inst. martial law was proclaimed in eighteen districts of the provinces of Friuli and Trevisa; the troops are ordered to fire upon assemblages on their refusal to disperse after one summons. Insurgents will be, of course, condemned to death, but the capital penalty will be remitted to those who voluntarily surrender, or are given up by the population. A band of rebels have gone northwards towards the mountains of the Tyrol; troops have been sent to meet them, and to guard the mountain passes. The Italian Government has honourably fulfilled its duty by sending troops to check as far as possible the lawless conduct of the invaders. On the morning of the 16th inst. a severe engagement took took place between the Italian troops and the Garibaldians at Bagolino, in Northern Lombardy. Both sides lost many men in killed and wounded. The conflict terminated in the capture of a part and the dispersion of the rest of the Garibaldian band.

DENMARK.

The ratifications of the treaty of peace between the German Powers and Denmark were exchanged at Vienna on the 16th instant. M. de Bille is to remain in that capital as chargé d'affaires for Denmark. It has been thought worthy of remark that Denmark keeps a mere chargé d'affaires, and not, as of yore, a minister plenipotentiary, at the Austrian court. Three royal proclamations were issued at Copenhagen on the 17th instant. The first released the inhabitants of the ceded Duchies from their oath of allegiance; the second is a farewell address to the people of Slesvig, Holstein, and Lauenburg, thanking them, especially the Lauenburgers, for their fidelity; the third is addressed to the Danes, and says:—'The separation from the kingdom of those inhabitants of Slesvig who were bound to Denmark both by sentiment and language is the most painful sacrifice of all. We have lost much, but have not lost hope. The future belongs to those who are in earnest.' The King and Queen of Denmark intend to make a tour in Jutland as soon as ever that province is evacuated by the German troops. This evacuation was, if reports were correct, to have been completed on the 17th instant.

GERMANY.

The German Diet has taken the very decided step of declaring that the Federal army of occupation in Holstein shall not be withdrawn from that country, in spite of the conclusion of peace, until the succession question shall have been finally settled. This spirited opposition to the demands of Prussia is supposed to be the consequence of the Emperor's speech in opening his Reichsrath. The Prussians complain of this speech as being favourable to the interests of the minor German States, and therefore adverse to those of Prussia. Herr von Bismarck, however, is determined to Prussianise the Duchies as far as possible, and to that end has issued a circular, ordering all Prussian Consuls to give to the shipping of the countries now under the protection of the two great German Powers the same assistance that they give to Prussian vessels, and to see that they are allowed all the remission of duties accorded to Prussian shipping. A proclamation has been issued by the Slesvig-Holstein Central Committee of Thirty-six to the German people, complaining of the treatment which their country has received. They call attention to the fact that in the Treaty of Peace no sort of allusion is made to Austria and Prussia in their capacity of members of the German Confederation, nor to the claims of the Duke of Augustenburg; the right of the inhabitants of the Duchies to choose their own government has been equally ignored. Thus the Duchies are disposed of like subjugated provinces. Moreover, they have been condemned to pay the expenses of the war, without being asked to sanction the treaty, or even reserving the possibility of an appeal to their vote. They contrast with this the honourable conduct of Denmark in immediately summoning the national representatives to sanction the settlement. The proceedings of the two great Powers, who appear to have removed Danish arbitrariness and violence merely in order to establish German despotism in their place, cannot be passed over in silence by honourable men. The Slesvig-Holsteiners are in truth intensely disgusted at the discovery that their freedom has burdened them with a national debt amounting to 80 thalers per head on the whole population. They are at length aware that the object of the clause in the treaty saddling them with this debt was to force them to allow themselves to be annexed by Prussia; the Prussian organs are now busy proving to them that if they would allow themselves to become Prussian property, their debt would be spread over the whole Prussian nation, and the whole charge upon them would only amount to 16 thalers per head.

On the 17th inst., Herr von Plener brought forward the budget for 1865. The total revenue is estimated at 518,000,000 florins, the total expenditure at 548,000,000; 18,000,000 of the deficit will be covered by the indemnity to be paid by the Duchies for the Austrian portion of the Danish war expenses, and the remainder will be provided for by a loan.

Some striking remarks are made by the Mémorial Diplomatique, a journal usually well-informed on the politics of Austria, upon the attitude which the Cabinet of Vienna intends to take towards Italy. It says: 'The idea of attacking Italy is at present perfectly strange to Austrian policy. The present Ministry will continue the process of disarmament on a vast scale, in spite of the continuous challenges thrown out to them by the revolutionary committees which sit at Turin, and which are ceaselessly working to create a war in Venetia. As a proof of the sincerity of its intentions with regard to Italy, the Cabinet of Vienna declares itself ready to regulate and even to enlarge the commercial relations between the two countries. Much will depend upon the manner in which the Italian Government carries out the Franco-Italian Convention. The conduct of Italy towards the Pope will be the test by which Austria will know how far Italy means to fulfil her international duties to her neighbours. The Austrian Government, according to the same organ, is far from refusing à priori to recognise the kingdom of Italy, and it only awaits the initiative from the Cabinet of Turin to open negotiations for a reestablishment of diplomatic intercourse. It is observed that, for the first time since the kingdom of Italy has been formed, an Austrian diplomat has appeared on its soil; Baron von Bach has been making some stay in Milan on his way to Rome.

Affairs in Electoral Hesse are in a very queer state; the Elector maintains an absolute and complete state of inaction; thus, the whole machine of the constitution is paralysed, and serious difficulties are arising. The Elector, as it will be remembered, has had more than one contest with his Chamber, in the last of which he was only brought to reason by a very sharp message from Prussia. He is now simply indulging in a fit of the sulks. His Chamber is not inclined to humour their Sovereign very far, and has appointed a medical commission to pronounce upon the state of his health.

POLAND.

The Russian Government has declared its intention of raising the state of siege under which Poland is now suffering on the 1st of January next. At the same time, all the subjects of Austria who were found in Poland and detained there for participation in the insurrection, will probably be allowed to return to their homes. The King of Prussia has also recognised that order and tranquillity are reestablished in Polish Prussia, and has consequently ordered that the military occupation of the Polish frontier should be discontinued, and the troops redistributed among the garrison towns. Count Berg, the Viceroy of Poland, opened the session of the State Council for that kingdom on the 10th inst. He addressed them in the French language, and said that their task was to rebuild the shattered edifice and repair the damages which Poland had inflicted upon herself. He invited them to begin with the examination of the budget for 1865, and took occasion to observe with satisfaction that Poland is one of the European countries which are least in financial difficulties, notwithstanding the losses and expenses of the last two years.

GREECE.

The National Assembly have finished the Constitution, and have received the thanks of the King for doing so. At the same time the King suggested a revision of the law relative to the Catholic bishops. The message was read to the Assembly. When it appeared upon enquiry that it had not been properly submitted to the King before being brought into the House, the Opposition proposed a vote of censure on the Ministry for their conduct, which was lost after an animated debate by 177 votes to 118. The Chamber will be dissolved as soon as ever the whole of the Constitution has been voted, and the budget for 1865 passed. The military and naval force of Greece has been fixed at 12,000 men by a proposal of the Ministry. If we may believe the accounts from the Ionian Islands, the inhabitants of those islands are by no means so well satisfied with Greek liberty as they expected to be. Commerce of course languishes now that so large an amount of annual expenditure has been withdrawn. Great irritation is felt against the Archbishop of Corfu, at whose instigation, aided by Russian influence, the populace was induced to clamour for union with Greece. A curious instance of retrogression is the readoption of the 'old style,' or unreformed calendar, in the islands; this had been superseded under English rule by the new system for all but Church festivals; the old style is now restored, and the present month will have forty-three days.

SPAIN.

Most piteous accounts are received of the details of the inundations in Valencia. The floods have been caused by a rainfall such as has never before been known in the Peninsula. The district in which they have wrought so much destruction, is one of the most populous in Spain, being watered by the river Jucar and its tributaries, and excessively fertile. The staple productions of the country are oranges, rice, Indian corn, and silk. The streams rose unexpectedly in the night. Several of the towns were, so to speak, completely submerged between sunset and midnight on the 4th instant. In Alcira 200 houses were fairly swept away, and many others were hourly falling. By the morning the water had risen to six or eight feet in the highest parts of the town. The waters were everywhere crowded with the dead carcases of horses and cattle. A hundred human corpses have already been found, but how many more remain to be discovered, and how many have been carried away by the flood, it is impossible to estimate. As the waters began to rise, the image of San Bernardo, the patron saint of the town, was carried through the streets; but the aid of the saint was insufficient to avert the terrible catastrophe. The territory inundated amounts to about 100 square miles of the best part of Spain.

TUNIS.

An awful calamity has befallen Her Majesty's naval service. Eight officers and five men belonging to H.M.S. Orlando, stationed at Tunis, left their ships in a cutter on a picnic party, and while returning under sail, a sudden squall struck the boat about 1,000 yards from shore and upset it. Of the whole party one seaman only was able to save himself; he was found the next morning in an Arab hut completely prostrate. All the men-of-war in the port immediately displayed their flags half-mast high and waited upon the English Consul-General to express their condolence and respect for the memory of so many brave officers and men. Every search has been made for the missing bodies, but as yet without success. The names of the officers lost are—Lieutenant Still, Surgeon Wood, Captain Pritchard, Royal Marines, Midshipmen De Gama, Fielding, and Kemble, Master's-Assistant Hadrill, and Assistant-Paymaster Stratford.

MEXICO.

This country has had its share in the disasters of the last few weeks. A very severe shock of earthquake occurred at Puebla on the 2nd instant, which threw down part of the palace, a church, a convent, and a large number of houses. Seventeen French soldiers were killed or injured. The number of victims among the natives has not yet been ascertained. The earthquake was felt also at Orizaba and Vera Cruz. At Tehuacan it did much mischief.

The Emperor of Mexico has continued his journey through his dominions amid the enthusiasm of the inhabitants. Great satisfaction has been felt at his refusal to ratify the concession of the railway to Vera Cruz which was made to M. Escanden by the Regency before the Emperor's arrival. Not that he is not most anxious to open every possible railway communication with the interior; but it is expected that the railway can be worked on much better terms by Mexican capitalists. Juarez is either on the frontier of Texas or at Chihuahua with 100 cavalry; which may be his real gite 'nobody knows, and nobody cares' much. A conspiracy has been detected against the Empire, and forty of the members of it have been arrested.

SOUTH AMERICA.

A violent hurricane burst over the city and bar of Rio de Janeiro at six o'clock on the evening of the 10th inst. Rain fell in torrents, accompanied by very large hailstones, flooding nearly all the houses in the city. The damage is estimated at several millions of francs.

Eleven merchant vessels were wrecked, and several persons perished.

Captain Abeille, of the French ship Reine Marguerite, received on board his vessel Admiral Elliot and his wife, who were in a sinking boat.

JAPAN.

The consequences of the decided conduct of the Western Powers have been that Prince Nagato has agreed to open the Straits of Simono Saki, not to rebuild the demolished forts, and to pay the expenses of the allied expedition.

The British merchants have addressed Sir Rutherford Alcock, calling attention to the violation of the treaty in the stoppage of the silk trade by the Japanese authorities.

THE RE-ELECTION OF MR. LINCOLN.

We can regard the reappointment of Mr. Lincoln as little less than an abdication by the American people of the right of self-government, as an avowed step towards the foundation of a military despotism, towards the subversion of a popular Government, which may still exist in form, but which in substance is gone. We would not be supposed to insinuate that it is the destiny of Mr. Lincoln to be the real founder of the dynasty to which he has taken so long a step; whatever be his merits, his warmest admirers themselves can scarcely contend that he is made of Imperial stuff. His hand has shaken the tree, but we yet await the man who is to gather the fruit. Future historians will probably date from the second Presidency of Mr. Lincoln the period when the American Constitution was thoroughly abrogated, and had entered on that transition stage, so well known to the students of history, through which Republics pass on their way from democracy to tyranny.—The Times.

Such was once the American Constitution; what it has now become the events of the past four years, and especially those of the past month, too amply demonstrate—a President an autocrat, political liberty a myth, universal suffrage a delusion, the responsibility of Government a farce. But this is not the worst. The vices, the crimes, and the follies of an Administration may die with it; but when a nation becomes blind to the degradation to which it is brought, and seems absolutely to glory in its decadence, a change has been wrought which must excite the commiseration and the regret of all to whom constitutional government and liberal institutions continue dear.—The Morning Post.

History gives us grand examples of the mighty dead; but the most potent statesman of the past would have confessed the work now set before the President of the United States enough to strain powers of the highest order. It is a task to which Cromwell might have addressed himself with diffidence; it would try the 'deep-revolving' brain of Richelieu; it would test to the utmost the hearty courage of Cavour. Loaded with a tremendous debt, the nation of the North, after four years of war, has to face the future with the failures of the past clinging about its neck. It has to confront a foe made bold by four years' resistance, embittered by wrongs enough to drive men mad, and taking courage from the general despair of peace. It has to solve that stupendous problem, the future of the negro race, which squats across the Continent like a black Sphinx, mouthing the horrible riddle, 'What is to be done with me?' and, as it gets no answer from North or South, preparing to destroy both. The nation has also to solve the future of a grand territory, as fair and wide as ever invited human enterprise or rewarded human toil. For this enormous task we might expect a wise and thoughtful people to choose from amongst their statesmen one of supreme dignity and wisdom—some grave, good patriot, of calm heart, of noble nature, and clear intellect. But, the people of the North, coerced or duped, honestly misled or wantonly corrupted, have chosen for their ruler Mr. Abraham Lincoln—a man whose moral and mental unfitness is known, and has been avowed even by his political friends; a man who could and did make jokes grimly indecent among the dying and the dead on the blood-stained slopes of Gettysburg, and whose political dishonesty in conducting this election has been openly proclaimed by himself; a man who cannot write a state paper that is not a burlesque—whose one idea of rule is to trim his sails to catch mob breezes—and whose sole idea of war is 'to keep pegging away' so long as he shall have human lives to stake against the foe.—The Daily Telegraph.

LETTER FROM WASHINGTON.

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Washington: November 4, 1864.

From the appearance of things to-day, Mr. Lincoln will go into the Presidential election without a single victory to redeem the gloomy condition of military affairs. Everywhere the Confederates are successful. There is not a single Federal army now in the field which is not acting on the strict defensive. The only place to which the Republicans look for a glimmer of light is Wilmington, North Carolina; and yet the uniform want of success which, since the capture of New Orleans, has attended every naval attack upon Confederate cities, gives but poor encouragement.

The Scotia, which left New York two days ago, carried you the full account of Grant's last failure. The newspapers here try to cover it up by calling it merely a 'reconnaissance,' and that very probably was the tenor of the news carried by the Scotia. It was a defeat—as bloody and complete a one as any he has yet suffered. He committed, for the tenth time at least, the folly of dividing his army. Two attacks were made. Butler, on the north side of the James, with two corps advanced across White Oak Swamp, and stretching his lines off to the north-east, reached the old 'Fair Oaks' battle-field, five miles east of Richmond. But his troops found everywhere the enemy strongly intrenched. Some attacks were made, but they were repulsed; and finally the Confederates, coming out of their works, attacked the Federal troops, broke up their organisation, and drove them into White Oak Swamp. Many were killed and wounded, and about 600 captured. The morass became their protection. Butler hastily retreated to his old works, and began fixing up his shattered regiments. The Confederate loss is said to have been but thirty. On the Weldon railroad Meade had three corps. He intended to capture the Southside railroad. His troops marched with several days' rations; their trains were sent to City Point. Everything was done to secure a victory, and every available man was given to Meade. He advanced, surprised the Confederates, captured 400 prisoners and one line of works. Confederate reinforcements came up. During the night of October 27 Lee managed to get a column between two Federal corps. Both were broken up. Letter-writers say the 2nd Corps (Hancock's) was a demoralised mob. Meade was driven back. He suffered heavily and lost 950 prisoners. He hastily retreated, and on the 28th the Confederate cavalry pursued, and by a gallant movement cut out 400 of the rear-guard and captured them. The victory was complete. The battle-field was taken, with a large number of arms and many wagons. The total Federal losses on both sides of the James were 2,500 killed and wounded, and 2,000 prisoners. Lee lost about 300 killed and wounded, and 400 prisoners. The general belief is that this contest ends Grant's campaign for the year 1864. Three years of toil, with all their sacrifices of life and money, find Richmond at the end of the last year still held by a defiant and victorious enemy. Grant can do no more, and may now prepare his winter quarters. Many think he will not remain in front of Petersburg, but that after the election he will transfer his army to Culpepper, and resume the old line of attack from the North.

In the South-west military affairs are still mysterious. The indications are strong, however, that at least a part of Hood's force will invade Tennessee, though the main body is no doubt manœuvred so as to keep Sherman from reinforcing Atlanta. Hood is now supposed to be north of the Tennessee River, near the line dividing Alabama from Mississippi. He has established a base of supplies at Corinth in Northern Mississippi, and has a railroad in order, running south from Corinth, and connecting with Montgomery, Alabama. Sherman is halfway across the State of Alabama, and is thought now to be just south of Decatur. Hood abandoned the siege of that town without making any impression upon it. We can get no news from Sherman, and the impression is that he has only a desultory communication with Chattanooga, and that the guerillas, who are known to be in great numbers between Decatur and Chattanooga, intercept nearly all his couriers. Sherman is now at least 150 miles north-west of Atlanta. Being so far off, he cannot reinforce the isolated garrison; nor can he march back to it, for that would leave Hood free to invade Tennessee; nor can he reinforce Atlanta with a part of his force, for his weakness would tempt Hood to an attack. Sherman is evidently led about as his adversary wishes. His day of glory is ended.

We still hear nothing from Atlanta. The news-writers reiterate that the telegraph and railroad are in order, but they send us no news. When the public are so anxious, and the election so near, one would think that, if Atlanta were safe and the telegraph in order, we would at least be told it officially. But the continuous silence of Stanton and the other news-writers, and the fact that no one has yet received a despatch direct from Atlanta, show that either it is not known what has become of Slocum and the beleaguered garrison, or they do not like to tell. The Confederates are known to be collecting an army for the capture of Atlanta; they make constant raids into the suburbs, and we have rumours every day that it has been evacuated, and that the Southern army have entered it, so that its situation is very precarious. Beauregard and Hood evidently have the game in their own hands. Roddy and Forrest, with a large force, are now far north of the Tennessee, and hold possession of Western Tennessee and Kentucky, all the way to the Ohio River. Detached parties of Confederates are met in that section at every step. It is stated that nearly every man who was drafted by the recent Federal conscription in Kentucky has joined them. Batteries have been erected on the Mississippi below the mouth of the Ohio, and not a steamer passes up or down that is not saluted, and some one on board killed. Fifty Federal gunboats of various dimensions are required to keep the river open from Cairo down to New Orleans. You may well imagine the prospects of Federal success in the South-west, when it is known that, along the Mississippi, a few square miles of territory are held only at Memphis, Vicksburg, Natchez, and Port Hudson; that at none of these places do the soldiers dare venture outside the works; that from Louisville down past Nashville and Chattanooga a narrow strip of Federal territory, barren and desolate, runs along the railroad to Dalton; that another strip, equally uninviting, runs up from Chattanooga to Knoxville, over 30,000 soldiers being unable to keep the Confederates away from these railroads and protect the supply trains; that Atlanta and Decatur are isolated, helpless garrisoned towns; and all else is possessed by the Confederates, never invaded now by the Northern soldiers, and as thoroughly Southern as the city of Richmond.

The late Federal victory in the Shenandoah Valley has been of no avail. The Confederates have again taken the offensive, and Sheridan is in daily dread of an attack. There is very little doubt that he is retreating. His camp is now at Cedar Creek, four miles north of Strasburg. All the Federal outposts have been drawn in, and there is scarcely a corporal's guard south of Strasburg. A week ago, a large Confederate cavalry force appeared in the Luray Valley, a smaller valley east of and parallel with the Shenandoah. A sudden dash was made upon a Federal camp at Milford, a village a few miles south-east of Fisher's Hill, and some prisoners and three cannon captured. Sheridan's troops abandoned Milford, and withdrew up the valley to Front Royal, east of Strasburg. The Confederates followed, and, being thus in the rear of the Federal outposts in the Shenandoah Valley, these had to be withdrawn, and Fisher's Hill was given up. Although Front Royal was held (though it is now believed to be abandoned), the Confederates were far enough north to control the Manassas Gap railroad, and the men who were repairing it were driven off. This road cannot now be used to carry Federal supplies, and Sheridan, despairing of getting wagon trains through from Harper's Ferry and Martinsburg—for half of them are destroyed by Mosby—has begun the construction of a railroad from Harper's Ferry to Winchester. He hopes to have it completed by December 1. Thus, Early steadily advances up the Valley, and pushes Sheridan before him. We may soon have news of another contest there.

We are still without any news of the Federal naval attack upon Wilmington, North Carolina. Admiral Porter is now with his fleet, and four days ago it was concentrating at Beaufort and Newbern. One hundred and seven vessels, all told, will take part in the attack; ten at least are ironclads. On October 29, our last intelligence from Wilmington, the people were preparing for the battle. General Bragg was in command. The non-combatants were leaving the city. Some vessels had then arrived and strengthened the Federal blockading fleet, but there were no indications of an attack.

There are indications that the Confederates are preparing a gigantic expedition to invade Western Virginia and attack Wheeling. Some partisans have already attacked the Baltimore and Ohio railroad west of Grafton, burned some stores, and inflicted some slight damage on the road.

There is a rumour that General Rosecrans is to come from St. Louis, and have a command in Grant's army.

LETTER FROM RICHMOND.

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Richmond: October 9, 1864.

The greatest activity continues to characterise the military operations of the belligerent powers on this continent. At no time since the commencement of the war has greater vigour been displayed by either the invading North or the invaded South. The immense forces marshalled in the early spring for what was then promised to be the certain and speedy overthrow of the 'rebellion,' have been exhausted in their fruitless efforts to overrun the country, and fresh levies have been called for. The considerable army that attempted in March and April to crush all resistance in the Trans-Mississippi country, was badly beaten and dispersed; while the victorious Confederates, having cleared Texas, West Louisiana, and Arkansas of the enemy, have marched into the heart of Missouri, where their presence now produces the wildest consternation among the friends of the broken Union. In Virginia, Grant's grand army of 175,000 veteran troops has been shattered, and in a measure destroyed, and he now calls in the most frantic manner from behind his formidable earthworks for further help—'only 100,000 men to finish up the rebellion,' which he vainly imagines he has seized by the throat. In Georgia Sherman has succeeded in penetrating as far south as Atlanta, though, if the last advices we have from that quarter be true, it now seems quite doubtful whether he will ever be able to escape thence with his army. His line of communication has been cut and occupied in force, and, like Napoleon at Moscow, he now finds himself in a hostile country, already stripped of supplies, far removed from his base, with an active foe swarming around him, and his communications destroyed. In the meantime, Sheridan is retreating down the Shenandoah towards the Potomac, if not as rapidly as he advanced, still fast enough to keep out of Early's way.

Under these circumstances, it is not strange that Mr. Lincoln should seek to increase his armies; nor is it singular, since his call, unlike Glendower's call for spirits from the vasty deep, is meeting with a partial if not a hearty response, that the Confederate authorities should endeavour to strengthen their forces also. The latter have issued an order requiring all detailed men who can be spared from their present employments to report forthwith for duty in the field. Thus the contending parties present the strange anomaly of each one attempting to bring fresh levies into the field upon the heel of one of the most furious and bloody campaigns of which history furnishes any record, and at a period of the year too when it is not unusual for military commanders to be preparing to go into winter quarters.

The people of the South not being a mechanical, manufacturing, or commercial people, the authorities have found it necessary to detail a large number of men of military age, to prepare arms and ordnance stores, manufacture wagons, harness, shoes, and clothing, establish foundries, open mines, conduct agricultural operations, gather up supplies for the quartermaster's and subsistence departments, and to perform other duties usually discharged in other countries by men already skilled in these various vocations. Many of these detailed men will be left where they are, but others of them can be spared from their present occupations, and will be sent to the field. It may not be amiss to state, in this connection, that the want of skilled labour, and the difficulty encountered in procuring necessary supplies from other countries, have been the source of great embarrassment to the Confederacy. Before the war, the people were engaged almost entirely in agriculture. The clothing, shoes, and hats they wore, the furniture in their houses, the carriages in which they rode, the guns with which they hunted, the clocks and watches that kept time for them, the iron and locomotives upon their railways, the churns in which they made such of their butter as they did not buy, and even the implements with which they conducted their agricultural operations, were all obtained from the North or through the North. They possessed neither manufactures, shipping, nor mechanics, neither an army nor a navy. Their antagonists possessed all those things, and in addition thereto had full command of the sea. And yet there are military critics in Europe who overlook these circumstances when they come to pronounce judgment upon the conduct of Southern campaigns, and great Powers that even seek so to shape their foreign policy as to add to the embarrassments under which the South has had to labour.

But let us look to the field, and see what has been done there since the date of my last letter.

With the exception of the north side of the James, affairs remain unchanged on the Richmond and Petersburg lines. On Friday, the 7th, Lieutenant-General Anderson drove the enemy's extreme right back two miles to a very strong line of intrenchments below Chapin's Bluff. The Federals still hold Battery Harrison, though they must find it a hot place under the fire of the Confederate gunboats by night and the land batteries by day. Anderson's loss was slight in the affair of the 7th, though, unfortunately, it includes Brigadier-General Gregg of Texas, who was killed at the head of his heroic brigade.

In the Valley of the Shenandoah the tide seems to have turned. On the night of the 5th, Sheridan broke up at Harrisonburg and retreated back towards Winchester. At the date of our last advices, Early had arrived at Newmarket, and was following on in pursuit. Rosser, at the head of his cavalry brigade, had had an engagement with the Federal cavalry, and beaten them badly; and Mosby had isolated two trains on the Manassas Gap railway, loaded with tools, timber, &c., for the repair of that road. He had torn up the track behind them to such an extent as to render escape impossible, and the Federal escort and working party were intrenching themselves and their trains with the hope that they would be able to defend their position until assistance could arrive. It is probable that Sheridan found it impossible to subsist his army in the Valley, owing to the activity of the mountain guerillas, and decided to retire further down the Shenandoah Valley until he could repair the Manassas Gap railroad and open up communications with Washington City by that line. Be this as it may, it is very certain that he has withdrawn under cover of night from his advanced position at Harrisonburg, and that his part of the programme, which looked to the occupation of Lynchburg, has proved a failure.

Another part of the combined movement against this city has ended in disaster. I allude to the advance of Burbridge's column from Eastern Kentucky across to the salt-works in South-western Virginia, and his probable intention either to unite with Sheridan at Lynchburg or move upon Danville. He was very badly beaten by the reserves and a small regular force near the salt-works, which he did not reach, and when last heard from he was in headlong flight and the Confederates in hot pursuit. He left over 300 dead, including about 175 negroes, and many of his wounded, in the hands of the victors. Among the prisoners who fell into the hands of the Southerners was Brigadier-General Hanson.

In Georgia a most important move has been made by General Hood. About ten days ago he broke up his camp on the Atlanta and Montgomery railway, crossed the Chattahoochie, and advanced upon the Atlanta and Chattanooga railroad at Kenesaw Mountain. His headquarters were at the village of Dallas three days ago. He had torn up the railway from Ackworth down to Big Shanty, a distance of ten miles. An unofficial telegram just received by the Richmond press states that the Confederates were in possession of Dalton, that Forrest was in Middle Tennessee, and that Rousseau, the Federal commander in that quarter, was hemmed in at Nashville. Hood keeps up his communications with the Atlanta and Montgomery railway at Palmetto Station, and will wagon his supplies from that point and the rich valley of the Coosa in Alabama. His cavalry holds East Point, six miles south-west from Atlanta, and the point where the Montgomery road unites with the Macon and Western.

It is not known what amount of supplies Sherman has with him in Atlanta, though it is not believed that he has enough, especially of forage, to enable him to remain there longer than a few weeks. In that event, he has but two alternatives left him—either to make a bold push for the coast, in the vain hope that he will be able to subsist his army upon the country as he advances; or to leave a garrison in Atlanta, and with the bulk of his army to move out and drive Hood away from the railroad, and reopen his communications. Should he attempt the former, the Confederates could well afford to let him go in peace, since his advance to the coast with Hood's army in his rear would deliver nearly the whole of Georgia, and all Tennessee and Kentucky, from the presence of the enemy, and open up the States beyond the Ohio to invasion. It is more probable, therefore, that he will turn back upon his track, and endeavour to clear it of the active and vigilant enemy that now swarms along its entire length from Atlanta to Nashville. Even Kentucky is not free from the presence of these enterprising Confederates. The western part of that State, as well as of Tennessee, is now wholly in their possession, except just along the Mississippi River, while a considerable body of Confederate cavalry is now moving into the eastern and middle portions of the State. Sherman will find it exceedingly difficult, under these circumstances, even if he should drive Hood away from Kenesaw Mountain, to defend and keep open his communications from Atlanta back to Nashville and Louisville, and still maintain his hold upon Atlanta.

This move of Hood's is not unlike the bold manœuvre of Marlborough just before the battle of Oudenarde in 1708. By that manœuvre the great English general completely disconcerted the well-arranged plan of Vendôme, threw himself between the French army and their own frontier, rendered himself master of their communications, and, instead of merely seeking to cover his own fortresses, threatened to compel the enemy to fall back in order to regain the connection with their own country, and to abandon the whole enterprise which they had commenced with such prospects of success. Should Hood be able to subsist his army where it is, it is not impossible that Sherman will find it necessary to imitate the tactics of the French general, abandon his recent conquests, and withdraw with the remnant of his army to the mountain fastness at Chattanooga. He seems to have forgotten that the disastrous issue of the Blenheim campaign to the French, even when supported by the friendly arms and all the fortresses of Bavaria, and the still more calamitous issue of the Moscow campaign to the army of Napoleon, had already demonstrated that even the greatest military talents, and most enormous accumulation of military force, afford no security against the incalculable danger of an undue advance beyond the base of military operations.

The transfer of Admiral Farragut from the Gulf squadron to the command of the North Atlantic squadron, and his visit last week to General Grant's headquarters, would seem to indicate that he is about to lend his assistance in the further operations against Richmond. If this is not the duty which he is expected to perform, then he will probably take charge of the squadron operating against Wilmington, and endeavour to create a diversion in favour of Grant, at the same time that he attempts to close that port as he did the harbour of Mobile.

The President has returned to Richmond from his visit to Georgia. The rumour that Lieutenant-General Hardee had, at his own request, been transferred to the command at Charleston, and that General Beauregard had been placed in command of the department of the South which includes the States of Mississippi, Alabama, Georgia, Tennessee, and Kentucky, proves to have been well founded. Lieutenant-General Longstreet has come on to Virginia, but has not yet reported for duty, owing to the painful neuralgic effects of his wound.

The remains of the brave General Gregg, after lying in state at the Capitol for two days, have just been removed to Hollywood Cemetery for interment. The President, General Bragg, General Ewell, General Kemper, the Secretary of War, and the heads of the other departments of Government were present during the ceremony.

LETTER FROM NEW YORK.

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

NEW YORK: November 8.

THE Presidential election is going on to-day. By the steamer from Boston to-morrow you may, by the aid of the telegraph, hear enough to indicate the general result. There are two or three prominent points you will do well to observe. It is indispensable to the success of General M'Clellan that he should carry New York. If you hear that he has lost New York he is certainly defeated. It is scarcely within the range of possibility that he can be elected without the vote of New York and Pennsylvania, contestable States, in addition to Illinois and New Jersey, which are thought sure to vote for him. If he lose either his prospects are bad—he may win both and be defeated.

The contest in New York is very close and very violent. It is largely more important that New York should vote for M'Clellan than that he should get any equal number of other votes. The State is so powerful a member of the Union that the possession of the executive power of the State which will follow the Presidential vote is of immense importance in the organisation of a new Administration if General M'Clellan should succeed, or in consolidating and directing an opposition to Mr. Lincoln and his policy if the attempt to overthrow him in the elections fails. If Mr. Lincoln be re-elected, and New York lost, the cause of the Opposition will be desperate, and their only means for relief will be desperate and revolutionary. The State has, therefore, been made the theatre of unexampled political excitement during the canvass, and the election comes on under a sudden pressure of military interference, put on by the Administration under the most frivolous pretences. A sudden and simulated alarm has been propagated by sensation despatches from various points along the Canada frontier, and by official endorsement of the absurdities by the Secretary of State, that concocted inroads were to be made, on election day, by rebels and sympathisers from Canada, to stuff the ballot boxes with M'Clellan votes, and then burn down all the principal cities. The pretext sufficed to excuse the gathering of Lincoln partisans all along the frontier, to have a real influence over the polling, and to enable the Administration to assign a cause for pouring troops into New York city, and placing the notorious Butler in command here. He commenced by issuing orders containing covert threats, and by assuming an authority, and announcing doctrines respecting the paramount authority of the United States over the citizens of the State in regard to these elections, which created great dissatisfaction, and have spread apprehensions of the real purport of thus assembling at New York, on the eve of the election, an army which ought to be down in Virginia or Georgia, where Grant and Sherman are both calling loudly for more troops.

A discreet and honest Government would have avoided giving needless provocation to a people already greatly irritated, and suspicious of arbitrary designs against them. There was no need of such demonstrations here, for the State and city authorities have made the most ample precautions for keeping the peace; and the largeness of the Democratic vote, which needs entire quiet to enable it to be cast in full, was the assurance that no riots would be permitted to interfere with it. There was no possible danger, until the presence of such a force under the command of so odious an officer created the peril against which it was the pretext for interference. The opinion got out that it was the work of the Republican party to provoke disorder, that the Democratic vote of the city may be lessened, or the whole election suppressed. However deeply exasperated, the determination of all having influence with the party has been, to repress all feeling, discountenance all attempts at disturbances, and avoid all provocations to excitement, and to be patient and forbearing, at least till the whole vote is cast, which is expected to determine the vote of this State, and may decide the Presidential question for the whole Union.

I have a very decided opinion about the result of to-day's election; but I shall not venture a prediction which the event may overtake and pass before it reaches you. But there are some contingencies arising out of the conditions under which the election is held, which may make it useful to you, in understanding what may follow, to have them restated. The number of States which may lawfully cast their votes at this election is a contested question between the two parties. Very probable results may make it of great importance.

The States which the Democrats concede as entitled to vote are as follows:—

	Votes
California	5
Connecticut	6
Delaware	3
Illinois	16
Iowa	8
Kansas	3
Kentucky	11
Maine	7
Maryland	7
Massachusetts	12
Missouri	11
Carried forward	102

	Votes
Brought forward	102
Michigan	8
Minnesota	4
New Hampshire	5
New York	33
New Jersey	7
Ohio	21
Oregon	3
Pennsylvania	26
Rhode Island	4
Vermont	5
Wisconsin	8
Total	226

There are two other States, included in the roll of 'loyal' States, from which votes are expected, both for Mr. Lincoln, viz. West Virginia, 5 votes; and Nevada, 3 votes. The Democrats object to both; to Nevada on a point of form, that the State is not yet regularly within the Union, in compliance with the law of the last Congress; and to West Virginia that it is not constitutionally a State at all, having been forcibly taken from the old State of Virginia, and erected into a State without the consent of the Legislature, which the Constitution requires as the indispensable condition for the division of a State.

The vote of Nevada may be received without much contest, the point being one of formality to be carried by legislation or waived as immaterial; but that of Western Virginia will be strenuously opposed to the last, if it should be essential to any result.

With Nevada the number of States will be 24, and of electoral votes 229, and the majority required to elect will be 115.

The full roll of States of an undivided union would now be 36 (including Western Virginia), and the number of electoral votes would be 317, as apportioned under the law of 1861-2, which includes the seceded States in the distribution as follows:—

Alabama	8	North Carolina	9
Arkansas	5	South Carolina	6
Florida	3	Tennessee	10
Georgia	9	Texas	6
Louisiana	7	Virginia	13
Mississippi	7

Eleven States—83 votes.

Two States, Missouri and Kentucky are represented in both Confederacies. The Southern Confederacy claims thirteen States, which have all voted for and elected a President for themselves.

The United States claim thirty-six States, which have by law 317 votes, making the number requisite for a majority of the whole, 159. But how many of these may vote and may be permitted to vote, and what number shall constitute a valid election, are points in controversy which divide the Northern States into portions of very conflicting opinions, that may in possible contingencies produce a conflict in fact for the possession of the executive power.

There has been a common consent to waive a question, which is, nevertheless, not an unimportant one, whether in a union of thirty-six States assumed to be undivided and indivisible, in an election held by two-thirds of them with the resolute refusal of the other third to take any part or be bound by the result—a result by which a portion, which is but little greater than one-third, may be a decisive majority for the Government of the whole or even of the diminished portion, do not make such a change in the Constitutional relations of the voting States among themselves, as to impair the fundamental conditions of Union and affect the obligation to acquiesce.

The Democrats object to Nevada, but insist that West Virginia is not constitutionally a State, and they are violent in denouncing the attempts made to bring in votes from Tennessee (11) and Louisiana (7)—these elections will be held to-day—in portions of 'insurrectionary' States, under forms having their source only in the military authority of the President.

Without Nevada, the electoral votes they concede to be receivable as undisputed are those of 23 States, with 226 votes, of which a majority is 114.

With Nevada, the number will be 24, with 229 votes, and the majority will be 115.

If General M'Clellan shall get 114 votes, they may contend for the exclusion of Nevada, and hold that he is constitutionally elected, on the ground that the votes in excess of 226 are unlawfully and unconstitutionally cast, the first object being to exclude West Virginia.

If Nevada be counted—as I think it must be, for it would be a weak point on which to contest an election otherwise regular—the number of votes will be 229, and the majority 115. With that, the Democrats will oppose the counting of West Virginia stubbornly.

But the Administrative party have a further reserve votes in the 19 votes of Tennessee and Louisiana, to be called in to secure the election of Mr. Lincoln, if they shall be needed to overcome the majority M'Clellan may receive of the regular and undisputed votes. These several votes—of Nevada, 3, West Virginia, 5, Tennessee, 12, and Louisiana, 6, all strongly Administrative, and the latter two made so by exceptional and arbitrary measures of the President himself—may be successively brought in as wanted, to make the success of Mr. Lincoln certain. They may not be used, for they may not be needed, but they will be used if they shall be needed. Hence, while the Democrats maintain that 226 votes are all that can be lawfully counted, and that 114 of them are sufficient to elect, the Republicans have a range from 226 to 253, within which to bring forward as many of those disputed votes as will be sufficient to exceed any number of votes which General M'Clellan may receive.

The results of the election to-day may be popularly known in a few days, so far as the actual voting in the States for their several colleges of electors is concerned.

NORTH OF THE JAMES RIVER.

WE have been favoured with the following extract from the letter of a young officer in the Confederate army before Richmond:—

Headquarters, Field's division, Petersburg.

As I told you in my letter from our head-quarters near Chapin's Bluff, we fully expected to pitch into the Yankees immediately on arriving at the north side of the river; but when our division had got into position, the enemy had disappeared from our front. As far as fighting was concerned, we had a little respite, but the staff did not profit by it much, for General Field having been placed ad interim in command of that department of the Richmond defences, our duties became very onerous; but we were, to a certain extent, compensated by the importance which it gave us, for we literally became monarchs of all we surveyed. This comparative repose, however, was of short duration. Our scouts a few days after brought us the intelligence that the enemy had thrown a pontoon across the river, and that a large force was moving over it. We had but few troops with us, but preparations were made for a resolute defence of the line committed to our care. On Sunday they drove our skirmishers in, and in the afternoon they attempted to carry a portion of our intrenchments. For that purpose they hurled against us two divisions of their crack 2nd corps, which rushed towards our position with yells, banners flying, and bands playing. When they advanced within about 700 yards of our lines, two 12-pounders, loaded with canister, blazed away at them. Our artillery is not considered by any means the most efficient branch of our service, and of late has been rather sneered at in this army; but on that occasion it did terrible execution. The Yankees advanced in four lines of battle, and a magnificent spectacle it was to witness that mighty host bearing down upon our thinly-manned breastworks. Notwithstanding my emotion, I could not refrain from admiring the sight. Our fire made wide breaches in their ranks, and, after the third discharge, the whole line wavered and fluttered like a flag in the wind. Another shell exploding in their midst, they broke and fled in every direction, without retaining a shadow of their former organisation. In their frantic haste to get out of range of our murderous shots, they threw away guns, equipments, and all their warlike paraphernalia. Deserters told us that they lost very heavily in that abortive charge. They again renewed the attack, but with less vigour, on our left, and were driven back with great loss by our dismounted cavalry. This was the last of that day's fighting; with the shades of night there came a cessation of hostilities. The next day passed off quietly enough. There was a little picket firing, but no general engagement. The enemy was evidently preparing for another desperate onslaught. We ascertained later that no less than three corps, numbering about 35,000 men, had come over. We, on the other hand, had received a few reinforcements, and girded our loins for the coming encounter. In the morning of Tuesday, the Yankees attacked us in heavy force; but we repulsed them very handsomely. Finding that these repeated assaults on that part of the line did not pay, General Hancock felt for a more vulnerable point, which he discovered on our left. After riding about ever since dawn, the General and his staff halted in a field in the rear of Wright's brigade of A. P. Hill's corps. The day was a sultry one, and the heat, superadded to our other exertions, made us so weary that we got off our horses and lay down for a few moments on the grass. We had not been there many seconds when we were aroused by a terrific cannonade, followed by heavy volleys of musketry. We mounted our horses in a trice. Presently squads of frightened men came from the front in anything but a leisurely manner. They informed us that the whole Yankee army had charged them, and that they had been obliged to give way. The firing increased, the air was alive with Minié balls, the ground was torn up by shells and cannon-balls, and in a few minutes the whole of Wright's brigade was stampeding towards us. We strove to rally them by entreaties and by menaces, and, with pistols drawn, we threatened to shoot them if they did not go back; but it was of no avail. You might as well try to argue with a flock of affrighted sheep as with a crowd of panic-stricken soldiers. Up to the present hour we cannot account for this stampede. The attack, it is true, was sudden and unexpected, and the force of the enemy enormous; but the men who were now flying before the Yankees had always beaten them, and had universally borne themselves in every battle-field with distinguished bravery. We are, therefore, much puzzled to find out what caused them to disgrace the name of their brigade in that manner. My poor comrade, Captain Mason, was shot through the body during our fruitless efforts to rally the men. He fell into the hands of the enemy. We have since heard that he is not likely to live, although General Hancock, who was an old friend and classmate of General Field at West Point, promises to have him well attended to. The General, finding that nothing could be got out of these men, decided to fall back, for the Federals were sweeping down upon us in overwhelming numbers. It seemed as though 40,000 men would be an under-estimate of the force. I was sent by him for reinforcements. I had orders to bring up without delay two brigades of our own division, viz. Law's Alabama brigade and Benning's Georgians. They came up at double-quick, and amid a very galling artillery fire. They were formed right under the eyes of the enemy, and then they rushed in with a deafening war-whoop. It was really splendid to witness the élan of these gallant fellows. I was so carried away with enthusiasm that I cantered alongside them, but, alas! I did not accompany them during the whole of their triumphant advance, for my faithful charger, poor Palmetto, fell under me pierced in the left hip by a Minié ball. I was a little stunned by the fall, and when I managed to extricate myself from under him, our brave boys had beaten back the foe and recaptured the position which they had taken from us. I am happy to say that our loss was relatively small, whilst that of the enemy must have been very heavy. The battle-field was literally blue with their dead and wounded. We, moreover, captured 700 prisoners. This fight was not a long one, not having lasted over an hour and a half; but the veterans tell me that for the time it lasted the battle of Darbytown was one of the hottest affairs they had ever been in. The shelling was positively infernal. All the woods at the rear of the battle-field were torn and chopped to pieces by the enemy's artillery. It is a wonder that any one should have survived such a tempest of shot and shells, but our brave soldiers did not mind it any more than if it had been a summer shower. I cannot say that I like these Yankee shells, but I have got used to them, for, since I have joined the army, I have been plentifully regaled with them; but what I strongly object to are the Minié balls. Some buzz like hornets, others mew like cats, when they pass you. All these sounds indicate great proximity to your knowledge-box, and, if I was not afraid of being afraid, I think I would skedaddle like Wright's men. All the wounded prisoners that we took concur in reporting the brutality and incompetency of their officers as flagrant. One of them, a Frenchman, who was badly struck in the thigh with a bayonet, told me that all the officers of his regiment were drunk, so much so that some of them could not stand when the fight commenced. On this occasion I was able to convince myself that the native element in the Northern army was conspicuous by its absence alone, for of ten prisoners that I questioned but one was a 'full-blooded' Yankee. Among them there were a Frenchman, three Irishmen, three Germans, a Belgian, and an Italian. With the exception of the Irishry, none of them understood English. Among other curiosities, I saw some wounded gentlemen of African descent. They professed to be very penitent, and, seeing that I was rather disposed to protect them than to ill-treat them, I got a good deal out of them. They addressed me in a much more humble manner, or, if I may use the expression, in a more slavish manner, than any darkies I have hitherto come across in the sunny South. All said that they had been forced into the army, and, as at Petersburg, they had been put in front, and had been literally driven to the assault at the point of the bayonet. The part of the line which they attacked was not broken, and, stepping outside the breastworks, a horrid spectacle met my gaze. Hundreds of these wretched soldats d'Afrique had been mowed down, and were lying thick in front of our works. On the whole, notwithstanding the misbehaviour of that brigade of Hill's corps, our achievement was a very brilliant one; for with a handful of men, say 7,000 at the outside, we drove back three of the enemy's largest corps, and, as usual, our division won for itself and its commander golden opinions. General Lee, towards the close of the fight, rode up and congratulated the General on the able manner in which he had handled the troops. At one time it was touch and go, and it required great coolness and skill on the part of our General to parry the attempts of the Yankees to turn our flanks. Had they succeeded in accomplishing that, the consequences might have been very serious. The reverse was a very heavy one to the enemy. By sending over their best troops, they evidently counted upon 'a success.' We had several small artillery and picket engagements during the rest of the week, but finally they sloped off, sans tambour ni trompette, and on Sunday morning Hancock and Co. had 'vamosed.'

Desertions from the Yankee army have been so frequent during the campaign that General Lee has decided to encourage them by circulating throughout Grant's army a paper in which kind treatment and protection are promised to those soldiers who come over to us voluntarily. This has produced the desired effect, for deserters flock into our lines at a monstrous rate, and 'the cry is still they come.'

Last week has been a very fatiguing one to us all. For ten days we have not had time to pull off our boots, and as to sleep, we have had to 'nap it' à la grâce de Dieu; at one time sleeping in a slushy rifle-pit, at another in a shaky morass. This is very rough work, it is true, and well calculated to try the mettle of a Parisian flaneur. Well! mirabile dictu, I have never felt stronger or more healthy. At one time I was a little annoyed by the scorbutic effects of our salt meat diet, but now I am all right again, owing to the splendid Maryland beef, for which we are indebted to old Jubal Early, our efficient commissary. As a pis aller for their failures on the north side, the Yankees attacked and captured a portion on the Weldon Railroad. A small force of our infantry was sent to dislodge them. It succeeded in driving them for the distance of three miles, taking over 2,000 prisoners with the Yankee General Hays, the enemy acknowledging in that affair a loss of no less than 3,000 killed and wounded. Our people being exhausted with their exertions had to stop. On Thursday a rear and flank attack was made by A. P. Hill, which was eminently successful. We drove them from the part of the track which was of importance to us. They still retain a couple of miles of it, but they are welcome to it, for we can do without it. Three thousand more were captured; I can vouch for the accuracy of that statement, as I saw them marching down the main street of this city, and a more cowed, grimy, and forlorn set of fellows I have never laid eyes on. We had arrived here the night before to act as a corps of reserve in case the attacking column had required any support. We were under arms for several hours, ready to start at a moment's notice, but A. P. Hill's men did their work so well as to need no reinforcement from Longstreet's corps. Now, for the first time since last Saturday week, I have been able to indulge in a complete course of ablutions, and smoke a quiet pipe of fragrant Virginia tobacco, two most inestimable luxuries.

THE SEIZURE OF THE FLORIDA.

THE United States Minister at Rio has addressed the following despatch to the Foreign Minister of Brazil:—

Rio de Janeiro, October 14.

The undersigned, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary from the United States, has the honour to acknowledge the receipt of a note of this date, from his Excellency Senhor Joao Pedro Dias Vieira, Councillor to his Imperial Majesty the Emperor, Minister and Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, calling his attention to an alleged violation of the neutral rights of Brazil and an indignity offered to her sovereignty by the commander of the United States corvette Wachusetts, in capturing in the harbour of Bahia an armed vessel calling herself a vessel of war, by name the Florida, belonging to certain States of the Federal Union, which are now, and for three years past have been, in rebellion against the Government of the United States; but which vessel the Government of the United States declares to have no nationality whatever, and insists that she was, to all intents and purposes, a pirate.

The undersigned has no official information in relation to the alleged capture and violation of the neutrality and sovereignty of Brazil, other than is contained in the note of his Excellency the Minister of Foreign Affairs; and he, therefore, assumes the statement made by his Excellency to be accurate in all its details; reserving to himself, however, the right to correct any errors which may have crept into that statement in consequence of its being merely an ex parte report from those in authority at Bahia.

The undersigned, before proceeding to consider the very grave international question to which his attention has been called, feels it incumbent upon him, as an act of justice to his Government and country, to make a few passing remarks in regard to the claim that the people in rebellion against our Government are, in fact, a 'belligerent' power, at war with the Government of the United States, instead of a band of traitors in rebellion against the Government to which they owe allegiance, of which they have always constituted a part, and from which, neither for the purposes of war nor peace, have they ever been separated.

The facts of the case in regard to their claim to be a 'belligerent' power at war with the United States, are briefly as follows:—

The great rebellion against the Government of the United States, by a portion of its Southern people, broke out on April 12, 1861; and the knowledge of that rebellion reached England about May 1 in the same year. Six days after Lord John Russell, the English Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, intimated in the House of Commons that the British Government would probably recognise our rebels as a 'belligerent' power; and in fifteen days after the English Government had received intelligence of a rebellion having broke out within our borders—a misfortune to which all nations are liable, and from which England and Brazil have not been exempt—the Queen of Great Britain by her proclamation recognised those in rebellion against the Government of Washington to be a 'belligerent' power, and entitled within her ports to all the privilege of belligerents, and in all respects the equal of those against whom they were in rebellion. In one word, England degraded the Government of the United States to the level of those in open rebellion against its authority; and elevated our rebels to a position of equality with a powerful nation, with which it had, and professed a desire to maintain, the most amicable relations and the closest commercial and political intercourse. That act of the Government of Great Britain was as much a casus belli as would have been the recognition of the independence and sovereignty of the so-called 'Confederate States;' and it would unquestionably have been so treated if France and other European powers had not immediately endorsed the gross injustice of England, to which Brazil at the earliest moment possible gave her sanction and approval.

It is not assumed by the undersigned that this action on the part of Brazil arose from any feeling of hostility to a neighbouring and always friendly power, which has ever recognised the duty of the governments on the American continent to stand by each other in defence of an American, in contradistinction of a European, policy. It was most probably resorted to because it was convenient and usual for Brazil to act in concert with the recognised powers of Europe; but it was, nevertheless, a most hasty and ill-advised proceeding, and grossly and manifestly an act of injustice to a neighbouring and ever friendly power. It is only necessary for your Excellency to ask yourself, what would have been the feelings of Brazil, if in past years, immediately upon hearing of disturbances and rebellion within the Imperial empire, the Government of the United States, without enquiry into the character of such rebellion and in ignorance of its cause, or justification if any, had made hot haste to unite with the European powers in recognising as 'belligerents' the province in rebellion, and thereby elevating her rebels to an equality with the Imperial Government, by giving them similar rights in her ports as 'belligerents,' and making them the equals in all respects of the Government against which they were in rebellion? Beyond all manner of doubt, to have done so would have been considered a flagrant outrage perpetrated by a great naval power against a weaker but friendly nation, and an admitted casus belli. Brazil would unquestionably have so considered it: but if not convenient to go to war with the United States for the perpetration of such an outrage, she would have contented herself with remonstrating against the proceeding as equally unfriendly and unjust; and then calmly have submitted to the indignity, outrage, and injustice which she could not repel.

And this is perhaps what the United States has been compelled to do. She could not go to war with all the world, and at the same time put down a gigantic rebellion within her borders. To have done so would have secured to her rebels the triumph of their rebellion, and gratified her enemies by a disruption of that great American power, so important for the development of constitutional and representative government, and so necessary for the protection of all the governments of the continent of America against European interference with their inalienable right to govern themselves.

Beyond all peradventure, the object of Great Britain, in recognising as belligerents those in rebellion against the Government of the United States was—if we take her leading press and the speeches of many of her statesmen in and out of Parliament as exponents of her purpose—to accomplish by indirect means what she did not deem it prudent to attempt by a more manly course. She had just as much right to declare our Government destroyed and the Union broken up by a recognition of the sovereignty and independence of our rebels, within two weeks after hearing of the rebellion, as she had to give them by proclamation the rights of belligerents. But she wanted the manhood to do this in the face of Europe and the just indignation which she would thereby have brought upon herself; and she, therefore, in the exercise of her discretion, resorted to a measure which she well knew was a casus belli, but which she foresaw we were not in a position to treat as such; and the consequences of which she had a right to suppose, as did our rebels, would eventually be a disruption of the great American Republic.

Great Britain is the first naval and commercial power of the world; and the other nations of Europe, followed by Brazil on this continent, very naturally were led into the adoption of her proclamation, without perceiving its tendency to throw the better part of our commerce into the hands of our only commercial rival, without any intention to do the United States injustice, and without intending thereby to give aid and succour to our rebels, and protract, and if possible render triumphant, their rebellion. And yet such has been the effect of the unjust policy inaugurated by Great Britain, and thoughtlessly adopted by all the Powers friendly to the United States in Europe, and by her steadfast friend, Brazil, on the American continent. But for that most unjust proceeding, the rebellion in the United States would have terminated by a single campaign. Had other nations practised towards us a very small portion only of the comity and forbearance which we have always extended towards others, and exhibited that respect for the international right of governments to deal with rebellion and civil war as to them seems expedient, for a reasonable time at least, without interference from abroad, our rebellion would have been put down more than two years ago, without a tithe of the sacrifices demanded of us; and there would then have been no occasion for the undersigned to express his deep regret at the untoward event which has called forth your Excellency's note and demanded this response.

The Government of the United States, through the undersigned, has protested against the right of Brazil to constitute her rebels 'belligerents,' and to concede to them at the time she did 'belligerent' rights and privileges. She has made similar protests to every government which was seduced into following the example of England, in ignorance of its tendency. But she has at the same time said to Brazil and other friendly powers. 'Although humbled and humiliated by your proceeding, I do not accuse you of intentional wrong; and your act, grievous and unjust as it is, I am compelled to recognise; and I indulge the hope that the day will shortly arrive when we can look back upon the past without one solitary remembrance of wrong to overshadow the future.' And to Brazil in particular she has instructed the undersigned to pledge most earnestly her confidence and friendship, as imperatively demanded by the similarity of their respective constitutions, by the general sentiments of their respective people, and by their political duties to each other and to their neighbours arising from their being the two principal governments on the continent of America.

Entertaining these sentiments and feelings towards Brazil, it will be a source of unfeigned grief and of very sincere regret to the Government of the United States to learn that a commander in her navy, without instructions or authority of any kind, should have taken upon himself the responsibility of capturing one of the piratical cruisers of our rebels while lying in the harbour of Bahia; and the undersigned feels authorised to assure your Excellency that every reparation which honour and justice demand will be most frankly tendered—more frankly and more promptly than if the same act had been committed by an American cruiser in the waters of the most powerful maritime nations of the world. But in so doing, the Government of the United States will undoubtedly make the amende honorable under protest. She will tell Brazil that she denies in toto the right of any nation or nations, immediately upon the breaking out of a rebellion in the dominions of a friendly power, without enquiry or investigation of any kind, and without knowledge of or even pretending to know the merits of the quarrel, to declare such rebels a belligerent power, and by proclamation make them in the ports of the world the equals of the nation against which they are in rebellion. She will insist that until their nationality is recognised they cannot invest their armed vessels with the nationality necessary 'to set forth a vessel of war,' and she will insist that all such vessels are no more and no less than pirates.

She will proclaim, as heretofore, that a vessel built in an English port by English artisans, and with English funds, armed and equipped by Englishmen, with Englishmen to man, sail, and fight her, and sailing from an English port under English colours, with the avowed purpose of preying upon and destroying the commerce of a friendly power which happens to be her naval and commercial rival, and which does so prey upon and destroy the commerce of the friendly power under the ridiculous plea that she is a vessel of war belonging to the rebels—without ever having visited a rebel port—is nothing more or less than a pirate, which the nation whose commerce she molests has a right, according to every principle of equity and justice which obtains among civilised and Christian communities, to pursue and destroy in every port and every harbour of the world.

But she will at the same time say to Brazil, that the powers of the world having, unintentionally no doubt, been combined against her, and her international rights being denied her through that combination, she has been compelled for the time being to submit to what she cannot resist, as has heretofore been the case with every nation (including Brazil) of whose injustice she complains. Submitting, therefore, as she does, simply because she is compelled so to do, and recognising the right of these pirates to protection in the ports of England and France, simply because she cannot resist it, the Government of the United States will not withhold from Brazil one iota of the reparation which, under similar circumstances, in her present embarrassed position, she would be compelled to make to England. While she submits to the great injustice done her, she most scrupulously observes the strictest neutrality to all; and as she is compelled to recognise towards European powers the new doctrine, which in the twinkling of an eye and by the dash of a pen converts a rebel of yesterday into the belligerent of to-day, with all the rights and immunities and entitled to all the honours and privileges of the power against which he is in rebellion—so will she most cheerfully recognise (under protest) that new doctrine towards Brazil, and hasten to make her every reparation for the alleged breach of neutrality which has occurred in the waters of the empire. Neither the Government of the United States nor the undersigned are directly or indirectly responsible for that event as one dependent upon their volition. It was neither ordered nor authorised by the Government of the United States or the undersigned; and it will be to his Government, as it is to the undersigned, a source of very sincere regret that, if such an event must of necessity have occurred, it did not take place in the waters of the power which, fifteen days after hearing of the rebellion in the United States, joyfully and hopefully proclaimed our rebels a 'belligerent' power—an act which her press and people and our rebellious States looked upon as certain to bring on our country all and more than all the evils actually inflicted, by adding to them the dissolution of the American Union.

In reply to the note of your Excellency, and assuming as facts statements in regard to which the undersigned knows nothing, he frankly, and very sincerely, for himself and in behalf of his Government, under the circumstances herein stated, repudiates most emphatically the capture of the pirate Florida in the waters of Brazil; and he desires to reiterate, as the burden of all his despatches and instructions from Washington, his determination to draw nearer and closer together in bonds of reciprocal friendship the two leading nations upon the American continent. Such being, as he is assured, the wishes and intentions of both Brazil and the United States, the undersigned entertains no apprehensions that those purposes and intentions can be thwarted by the commander of one of our vessels of war, or by the hasty acts of an excited populace, based upon what they considered a national indignity.

In the full conviction that the Government of the United States will promptly do all that becomes its own dignity and the dignity and honour of Brazil, the undersigned begs leave to renew to your Excellency, with apologies for this hastily written note, the expression of his most distinguished consideration.

J. WATSON WEBB.

P.S.—This despatch will be placed in the hands of the courier from the Foreign Office, instructed to wait for it, at 7.20 P.M.

To His Excellency Senhor Joao Pedro Dias Vieira, Councillor to his Imperial Majesty the Emperor, Minister and Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, &c. &c.

THE TALLAHASSEE AT HALIFAX.

Richmond, Virginia, September 6, 1864.

Hon. S. R. Mallory, Secretary of the Navy.

Sir,—I found in the port of Halifax on my arrival there Her Majesty's steamship Duncan (84) bearing the flag of Rear-Admiral Sir James Hope. I called promptly upon him, though he took no notice of our presence by the customary boarding and offering the courtesies of the port. Neither on arriving nor leaving were the honours of the side extended. On being shown into his cabin, he did not rise from his seat, nor shake hands, nor offer me a seat—his manner and tone were offensive. I mention this to show his animus.

I stated that I had come to report my arrival—that I wanted coal, and as soon as it could be procured the ship would go to sea.

He replied by saying that of course I knew the regulations which governed my stay in port; that he, however, had nothing to do with it; that the Governor must settle that with me.

He asked me what my orders were in regard to neutrals.

I replied that my orders were particular and explicit upon this point—to respect sedulously all their rights.

What were my instructions in the case of vessels which had recently changed flags or were 'whitewashed'?

Unless the papers were clearly fraudulent, I would let the vessel go.

Had I seen his letter to Captain Morris, of the Florida, on this subject, called forth by Captain Semmes burning the ship Martiban under English colours?

I had read it.

His Government, he continued, required that in all such cases the vessel should be brought into an English port to have the case decided on, or adjudicated (I am not certain of the words).

I told him what had been my course, a few days before, with a vessel with fraudulent papers—that on examination of a ship's papers I must determine my action.

He repeated the above in substance again, and remarked there were a great many vessels now being whitewashed, and it was a subject which required delicate handling, and on which they were greatly interested.

The above is the substance of our interview on the subject. With the Governor I did not speak on the question.

Respectfully, &c.,

Your obedient servant,

J. TAYLOR WOOD, C.S.N.

TO OUR FRIENDS AND SUBSCRIBERS.

THE INDEX was established in May 1862, in the darkest hour of Confederate fortunes, by earnest friends of Southern Independence, with the distinctly expressed object of being the representative, in English journalism, of a gallant and struggling people appealing to the world not only for political, but still more for moral recognition. Since accepting this great trust, THE INDEX has unceasingly laboured, by the combined aid of English and of Southern writers, to enlarge and extend the common ground upon which two nations may cordially meet, which need only to understand each other in order to cherish the warmest mutual appreciation and lasting friendship. The chief and almost the sole difficulty has been, and is still, the callous indifference of the British Government on the one hand, and, on the other, the perplexity, to the European mind, of the unsolved and unprecedented problems involved in the management and education of four millions of the African race, intermingled with a population of the highest Caucasian type. This difficulty could be met only by a liberal fairness to every shade of honest opinion, by an inflexible adherence to truth under all circumstances, and by a bold avowal of convictions, even though ill received. THE INDEX does not claim to be neutral, but it claims to be independent in the highest sense of that word. It is because it must reflect and appeal to, at one and the same time, the public opinion of two countries as yet only imperfectly acquainted, that this somewhat unusual self-description is called for.

Thanks to arrangements now in successful operation, by which the Letters of regular Correspondents and Newspapers from all parts of the Confederate States are received within from twenty-five to thirty days from their date, THE INDEX is always enabled to present the very Latest Direct News from the South, as well as a faithful reflex of the tone and spirit of the Southern Press.

All communications intended for publication should invariably be addressed to 'the Editor of THE INDEX, 291 Strand, W.C.,' and unless authenticated by a responsible name, can receive no attention.

The War.

THE bloody struggle in America differs from all the great wars of which modern history takes cognisance, in the fact that the cold of winter puts no stop to the operations of the armies in the field. Here and there the temporary rising of a river, and the sudden conversion of solid soil into impervious mud, may suspend the movements of the belligerents; but hitherto, as a rule, it has been the fatigue of the men, the prostration and weakness incident to the sufferings of a long campaign, rather than the stress of weather, which has compelled the generals on either side to go into winter cantonments, and spend a month or two in reorganisation. At the close of this, the fourth year of the war, there seems to be even less probability than usual of a cessation of hostilities; and so far as we can judge from recent intelligence, the winter campaign has already commenced with armies very little inferior in numbers to those which fought in the spring months. Nor can there be the least doubt that the prospect of having to keep two great armies in the field during the ensuing three months has seriously alarmed the Washington Administration. It would have been a work of considerable expense, in life and money, to maintain GRANT's large army before the works of Petersburg; but this was regarded as a comparatively slight demand. The general expectation in the North was that with the fall of Atlanta the Confederate army of the South-west would break up, and that SHERMAN at least would hold his ground without trouble, and would be able to dispose of half his army in cantonments. But to the utter dismay of Mr. STANTON, and to the evident astonishment of SHERMAN himself, HOOD's beaten army has assumed the offensive most vigorously, and the Federal general who announced two months ago that the object of the campaign was achieved, and that his soldiers might 'rest and be thankful,' finds himself compelled to take his army into the field and prepare for a totally unexpected campaign, inaugurated, not for the further invasion of the Cotton States by Federal soldiers, but for the expulsion of the Federals from Georgia and Tennessee. That SHERMAN has been utterly deceived, and that his army is now paying fatally for his rash confidence in his own achievements, is now beyond a doubt. He ridiculously underrated HOOD's means of offence, and he seems to have believed that, by fortifying Atlanta against a direct attack, he could afford to send away two of his corps to swell Mr. LINCOLN's chances of reelection and to strengthen GRANT's position before Petersburg. The result is, not only that he is compelled to confront the Confederate leaders with greatly reduced numbers, but that HOOD, having lulled him into complete inactivity, has succeeded in marching his whole army upon his lines of communication, and endangering at once Atlanta and Nashville. In fact, while SHERMAN was busying himself with strengthening the defences of the former city, and driving the unfortunate citizens out of their own homes, HOOD had transferred his army to the north of the Coosa River, and thrown himself upon the Chattanooga and Atlanta Railroad. At the same time, FORREST, with some 10,000 or 12,000 men, was capturing Federal supplies and outlying garrisons in Northern Alabama and Western Tennessee. The object of the Confederate general was gained. He succeeded in drawing the bulk of SHERMAN's army out of its intrenchments, and then fell back slowly before it into Northern Alabama, where his depot of supplies had been already established. It was impossible for SHERMAN to follow him far into Northern Alabama, or to leave the line of railway. Nevertheless, the Federal general appears to have pushed forward as far as Gaylesville. Once there, he was brought up by want of forage and supplies. But now HOOD further developed his plan of campaign. He moved suddenly northward for the Tennessee river with his whole army, announcing his intention of carrying the war into the very heart of that State. SHERMAN could not follow him. His means of transport and his supplies were quite inadequate to such a movement. There was nothing left for him but to 'track back' upon his old line of railroad, move upon Bridgeport, and then march along the north bank of the Tennessee river, in order to place himself once more in HOOD's front. His chances, however, of preventing HOOD's passage of the Tennessee river were very small, as the latter had several days' start, and it is probable that whatever opposition HOOD encountered was opposed by SCOFIELD's or THOMAS's corps, and not by SHERMAN's main army. In the meantime, FORREST who may be described as heading the advance of HOOD's army, was in full possession of the whole of Western Tennessee, had taken some gunboats and transports on the Tennessee River, and had succeeded in driving the Federal garrison under SCOFIELD himself out of Johnsonville. This city, a most important depot for the Federal army in Middle Tennessee, and within a hundred miles of Nashville, he succeeded in capturing, together with an immense amount of supplies. Where HOOD's army really was at the date of the despatch of the last mail is not clear. The information is evidently withheld both in North and South. But practically it may be considered as forming line, with FORREST's horse on its left, and WHEELER's cavalry on its right flank. The news of another week will probably put an end to the uncertainty. Not less mysterious are SHERMAN's own accounts. We have given the only clue that we can suggest to this marching and countermarching; and we still think that the bulk of his army is employed in the defence of Tennessee. To suppose that SHERMAN really has five corps at Atlanta with which he intends to march near 350 miles, through a bitterly hostile country, upon Charleston, although it is perfectly well known that his cavalry and trains could not last out the march from Dalton to Gaylesville, and that the Confederates have been living for weeks upon the rations destined by Yankee contractors for his army, is to accuse him of an absurd temerity which we are not justified in imputing to him. The last reliable accounts from Georgia described Atlanta as held by SLOCUM with one corps, with Confederate cavalry camped close up to the town, and Georgian militia rapidly coming up. It is difficult to see how SHERMAN's position would be improved by a further advance, when he cannot even at Atlanta sufficiently provision his troops. And, therefore, notwithstanding the prophecy of so daring an enterprise as a march into South Carolina, we believe the bulk of his army has removed northward.

From Virginia there is nothing new; but we know the campaign is far from a close. The two main armies were confronting one another behind their formidable intrenchments. But LEE is said to have been greatly strengthened, and to be on the point of taking the initiative. SHERIDAN is retreating, and EARLY or EWELL is hoping for another attack, of which every mail may bring us the result, and which will be fought, not for Lynchburg, but for the Potomac. On the whole, military affairs promise most favourably for the South; and the day of President LINCOLN's reelection finds the Northern dream of conquest more than ever impracticable.

Re-election of Mr. Lincoln.

THE latest advices from America bring us intelligence of a fact which had been anticipated by the public mind of Europe, that ABRAHAM LINCOLN has been reelected President of the United States, to serve four years from and after the 4th day of March next. The reelection was accomplished without disturbance at the polls, and by a majority of voters and States of the North that the most sanguine of LINCOLN's adherents had not looked for. The PRESIDENT himself was more than content with a result which showed to his fervent spirit and pious perceptions that the Almighty had 'directed the mind of the country to a right conclusion;' and there remains to the supporters of M'CLELLAN, Peace Democrats and War Democrats, only the bitter humiliation of defeat, hopeless and overwhelming.

The Democracy has, indeed, only itself to blame for the melancholy finale of the last struggle for constitutional government in the United States. As we ventured to suggest, when they deserted the policy marked out in the resolutions of the Chicago Convention and came before the country committed to the continuance of the war, they virtually gave up the contest, for they surrendered the sole ground of effective opposition. The men who desired to secure an honourable peace found the only plank in the platform on which they could stand, knocked suddenly from under their feet, and between two contending parties, both pledged to the prosecution of the wasting strife, there was little to choose. It was easy to see, however, which of the contestants would prevail. An organisation, made up of discordant materials, supporting a candidate whose professions were at variance with the party creed, was feeble against an Administration wielding the vast patronage and power of the Federal authority. Had the issue of peace or interminable war been fairly and honestly presented to the people—had the Democrats possessed the moral courage to stand up to the policy they had adopted in council, the result might, perhaps, have been different. As it was, there was no hope for General M'CLELLAN from the very moment he wrote his letter accepting the nomination, and the election thenceforward ceased to inspire any real interest. To the people of the Confederate States, the choice of a President by the people living beyond the Potomac was a matter of quite as little concern, except so far as that choice might bear upon the great work in which they were engaged, as the selection of a Prime Minister in a German Principality; and we can imagine that, to an intelligent, dispassionate citizen of the United States, the preference he might entertain for M'CLELLAN over LINCOLN would be merely the instinctive sentiment that prefers the gentleman to the buffoon.

The consequences to the people of the North of the election of LINCOLN extend farther into the future than any class of that demented and unhappy people care to look. The Government at Washington has long since assumed the worst features of an absolute despotism, but henceforth it will dominate with a disregard of constitutional forms that no tyranny on earth has ever exceeded. The popular sanction has been affixed to all the lawless acts of four years of misrule; the people have stupidly bowed their necks to the yoke; they have declared by their suffrage that they value not the Habeas Corpus, nor the trial by jury, nor the liberty of the press; they have voluntarily given up, in the madness of the hour, all those muniments of liberty established by law, which the English nation were centuries in securing. Not for them did RUSSELL die, not for them did MILTON write—never let statesmen of the United States quote again the Areopagitica; the rich inheritance of Anglo-Saxon freedom they have basely flung aside. They would be dupes and victims, and they are, and the worst of their folly is that they saw their vile Mokannah in all his hideous deformity before they gave themselves to his embraces. That LINCOLN will be a severer tyrant hereafter than he has been heretofore is already sufficiently apparent. The tone of SEWARD's speech delivered when the election was no longer doubtful, as contrasted with the tone of the speech he delivered several weeks before, is enough to manifest the temper of the Government as affected by that event. New York city was the locale of the strongest vote aginst LINCOLN, and BUTLER has been placed as Military Governor over New York city. Journals odious to the Administration have hitherto been suppressed in many places, by BUTLER himself in New Orleans and Norfolk; it remains to be seen how long the Opposition press of New York, in its hopeless struggle for liberty of speech, will be permitted to criticise freely the acts of the PRESIDENT or his lieutenants, emperor or satrap. The bastiles of the Republic will be speedily filled with new inmates; Mr. SEWARD's little bell will be constantly vibrant with its tintinnabulations; and HORATIO SEYMOUR, who has just been ejected from the seat of Governor of the State of New York, where his want of nerve has been so lamentably conspicuous—nay, General M'CLELLAN himself, who has resigned his commission in the army of the United States, may soon be fugitives from the wrath of the Government whose wisdom they dared call in question.

What then remains? Four years more of a desolating war, waged for no other purpose than to gratify the malice and cupidity of a reckless and misguided faction; four years more of sacrifice and endurance on the part of a brave and united people whose sufferings and heroism have called forth the admiration of the world. We say four years, for the only hope that appears to us of an earlier termination of the war lies in the possible inability of the North to conduct it so long. The capacity of the South for resistance would outlast the reign of Lincoln and his successors for many decades to come. No one now pretends that the North can ever reduce the South into subjection. The Republican leaders themselves declare that their purpose is no longer to bring back the Southern people to their loyalty, but utterly to exterminate them from the face of the earth. And is this a purpose that can command the approval of European cabinets? We would make no appeal to foreign Governments for intervention in the unhappy quarrel. The Confederate States themselves proudly disdain asking armed interference in their behalf. Defiant of the insolent oppressor that seeks their enslavement or annihilation, trusting under God in their own strong arms and the eternal justice of their cause, they stand today, as they have always stood, at the threshold of their homes, ready to lay down their lives in defence of altar and fireside. But, in the view of the fact that the Confederate States have maintained their independent Government during four years of war, carried on with colossal means of offence against them; bearing in mind the utter hopelessness of the work of their destruction, and the stupendous wickedness of such a work were it possible of accomplishment; considering yet further that the people of the North have shown themselves utterly incapable of their own redemption from the headlong career to ruin, the question comes up to every thoughtful observer—how long will the enlightened nations of the earth allow this war to go on? The responsibility of Europe for the waste of human life and all the incalculable sorrow involved in the needless continuance of the struggle cannot be shaken off; and those who permit blood to be shed wantonly are not guiltless of that blood, if, indeed, they are not to be regarded as sharers in all the infamy of the crime.

The Apology of the 'Wachusetts.'

The United States Minister at the Court of Brazil, the notorious Mr. J. Watson Webb, has tendered on behalf of his Government what purports to be an apology for the seizure of the Confederate sloop-of-war Florida in a Brazilian harbour. His Excellency reserves the right of picking holes in the Brazilian statement of facts hereafter, when he shall have learned by what falsehood the Consul and Captain who were concerned in that outrage intend to palliate their crime, if indeed they conceive it to need any palliation at all, and do not rather magnify the illegality and insolence of their act, in order to gain credit with their countrymen for an audacity and contempt of neutral rights surpassing that which gained for Captain Wilkes so general a popularity, and so many public dinners and laudatory speeches. But, pending any explanation which those persons may have to offer, Mr. Webb considers the case sufficiently clear to warrant him in promising reparation, and in tendering at once an expression of his regret that such an act should have been committed in the harbours of a Power so friendly as Brazil. So far all is well; and the admirers of Federal promptness and vigour who found matter for satisfaction in the energy displayed by the Wachusetts, and the patriotic zeal with which Mr. Wilson sacrificed his personal character to the interests of his country, have fresh matter of exultation in the ready and generous frankness with which the representative of the United States tenders an apology which Brazil is hardly strong enough to have extorted. There are, however, one or two points which we feel called upon to notice, which do not redound so much to the credit either of the envoy or of his Government.

And first of the omissions of this notable despatch. It will be remembered by our readers that both Mr. Wilson and Captain Collins, of the Wachusetts, pledged their honour that the Federal ship would commit no breach of the peace while in Brazilian waters. Indeed, this promise was necessary to the success of the scheme. Had it not been given, both the Brazilians and the Confederates would have been on their guard, and the attack could not have been undertaken but at imminent hazard and with great likelihood of failure. It was this solemn assurance which disarmed the suspicions of both, and left the Brazilian guns unloaded and the Florida half-manned. In Europe this would be considered by far the worst part of the transaction. The act itself, so scandalous in its shameless disregard of every principle of public law, would have made any European nation blush for its officers; but the deliberate forfeiture of their plighted word would have been felt to inflict not only on themselves, but on their country, a disgrace which no atonement could effectually wipe out.

Another remarkable omission is that of any description of the reparation which Brazil may expect. On this point, perhaps, Mr. Webb did well to be silent. It may be as well to keep Brazil as long as possible in the expectation of real and honourable satisfaction. What she will really get, if she gets anything at all, it is not difficult to foresee. A formal apology will be made for the offence, and the offenders will receive a reprimand; perhaps, if the matter should be taken up very earnestly by the greater Powers, a Court of Inquiry may be assembled, and directed to prolong its sittings until the indignation of Europe has cooled. In the meantime the Florida will be retained; and in due course Mr. Wilson will receive some comfortable appointment, and Captain Collins will receive his commission as Admiral. This was the process in the case of the Trent. We obtained an apology, veiled and jumbled up in a long defensive and recriminatory despatch; Messrs. Mason and Slidell were given up; and Captain Wilkes was sent as Admiral to command the squadron cruising among our West Indian islands, where he certainly avenged in unnumbered insults to our flag any mortification which the disavowal of his act may have given him. This will not do. If the neutral Powers wish to put a stop to acts of outrage, they must insist on two things: first, the rendition of the spoil, and secondly the effective punishment of the offenders. By the law of nations they have a right to both. When Lord Russell conceived that our uniform had been insulted by a Brazilian guard, he did not hesitate to demand the dismissal of its officer; and though he was wrong, and condemned by the arbitrator on the original ground of complaint, there was no question as to his right to demand that kind of satisfaction. So, when a vessel has been illegally seized, the Prize Court awards damages, not against the Government but against the captor, avowedly for the purpose of protecting neutral vessels against 'excess of zeal' on the part of cruisers. As to the rendition, of that there can be no question. No one can take advantage of his own wrong. True, it has been the common practice to be satisfied with restoration and apology, and to leave the punishment of the guilty to their own Government. But why? Because it is conceived that the disagreeable necessity of apologising is sufficient to ensure due care on the part of the belligerent Government to prevent a repetition of the offence. But this does not apply to the United States. A Seward, a Webb, a Lincoln, or a Butler cares nothing for the humiliation of an apology, if it be salved with substantial profit. They are quite willing to go on sinning and apologising, if they may keep the fruit of their sin. Thus, though they have sometimes had to release a ship, they have taken care not to damp the zeal of their cruisers by letting them pay damages; and when their officers commit an outrage profitable to the country, though forced to reprimand them, they take care to reward. The only way of dealing with such a Government is through substantial penalties. Force it to restore its prey, and to punish the captors, and you will hear no more of such doings; let him retain the spoils, and no apology you can extort will prove an effectual lesson either to the Government or to its officers. Nothing but the restoration of the Florida and the dismissal of Captain Collins from the service ought to be accepted by the neutral Powers.

Mr. Webb's despatch is not wholly apologetic. It is occupied in part, like Mr. Seward's despatch about the Trent, with an elaborate justification, and partly with a violent attack upon England. 'Until the rebels are a recognised nationality, they cannot bestow a national character on their vessels, and these are consequently pirates, which may be seized anywhere and by any one.' Mr. Webb's ignorance of history and law is not surprising, but it is very complete. The history of Greece, or the life of Lord Dundonald, would at once have occurred to his mind, and taught him that long before Greece or Brazil were recognised by any foreign State, their flag enjoyed all belligerent privileges, and was nowhere more welcome than in the ports of the United States. Ignorance of this kind in a diplomatist is a little inconvenient, but it is inseparable from the system on which a democracy like that of the North confers its favours.

Then, again, according to the notions of Mr. Webb, foreign Powers have no right to recognise American 'rebels' as belligerents, and to do so is a casus belli of precisely the same character as the recognition of their independence. Mr. Webb either imagines that there is one law for the United States and another for Europe, or he forgets the recognition so promptly accorded to the belligerent flags of Chili, Mexico, Peru, Buenos Ayres, Brazil, especially by his own country. He is quite unaware that neutrality absolutely demands such recognition, inasmuch as Powers refusing it, if they were brought into contact with the belligerents at all, would be forced to treat the unrecognised party as pirates, and assist in the war against them; and equally unaware that no 'rebellion' possessed of an organised government, a large territory, an army, and ships, was ever treated otherwise than as a belligerent He accuses England as the sole cause of the general determination of the world to treat the South as a belligerent, because England was the first to proclaim that purpose; ignorant it would seem, not only that there was no other course open, but that the course to be taken was preconcerted; a preconcert of which Mr. Seward angrily complained. He complains that she took her determination within fifteen days after she received the news of the outbreak of the rebellion; forgetful that the Confederate States had already been in existence as a de facto Power for some months. He attributes her action to a malignant desire to break up the Union; unaware that if she had not recognised the belligerency of the South she must have broken up the blockade; and, finally, he ignores altogether the fact that the Supreme Court of the United States, as soon as the question came before it, decided that Mr. Lincoln himself, by proclaiming the blockade, had placed the South, so far as foreign States were concerned, on the footing of a belligerent Power. All this series of errors and absurdities are accumulated to prove that Brazil did very wrong to follow the example of England; that the recognition of 'rebels' as belligerents by foreign Powers does not affect the right of their enemy to treat them as pirates—in foreign ports! and that, therefore, the Wachusetts had a perfect right to seize the Florida. We rather think that even Mr. Seward will feel that for once his disciple and subordinate has gone a little too far in his 'sincere flattery' of imitation, and caricatured his style a little too energetically—the more so that all this argument is thrown away. Mr. Webb admits that, as the Wachusetts dared not have seized the Florida in a French or English port, she ought not to have seized her in Bahia, and promises suitable reparation.

In expressing his regret, and that of his Government, for the untoward occurrence, Mr. Webb gives utterance to a wish in which we sympathise more warmly than, we suspect, his superiors will do. 'It will be to his Government, as it is to the undersigned, a source of very sincere regret that, if such an event must of necessity have occurred, it did not take place in the waters of the Power which, fifteen days after hearing of the rebellion in the United States, joyfully and hopefully proclaimed our rebels a belligerent Power.' It is unfortunate. How delightful it would have been for Captain Collins to have found the Florida at Southampton, under the guns of a British battery, and to have cut her out thence! How loud would have been the cheers of New York; how the pulpits of Boston would have rung with the hero's praise; how Mr. Seward would have thanked Heaven that the act did not occur in the waters of a feeble and inoffensive Power like Brazil! What honours would have been lavished on the victor; what dinners he would have eaten; what fair hands would have worked for him slippers and smoking-caps entwined with laurel! What reward would have been too great for the man who had brought to the shores of America, not the Florida only, but the whole ironclad fleet of England; who had not only captured a rebel cruiser, but defied to battle the 'first naval Power in the world'? Certainly there is reason to regret that 'this event did not take place in the waters of the Power' which could have by force avenged the insult.

Resignation of Lord Lyons.—We have reason to believe that Lord Lyons, Her Majesty's Minister at Washington, has sent over his resignation. Ill health, occasioned by unwearied exertion in the performance of his onerous duties, has led, as we are informed, to this determination on the part of his Lordship, whose services, under peculiarly difficult circumstances, can scarcely be appreciated in their full extent. We think we are justified in saying that the pacific relations still existing between Great Britain and the so-called United States of America are due, in the first degree, to the tact and temper displayed by Lord Lyons in his intercourse with the Government of Washington.—The Morning Post.

THE BIGLOW PAPERS.*

THE Abolitionist party in the Northern States has from the very outbreak of the war expressed extreme disappointment and indignation at the total want of sympathy for the Federal cause manifested by a country where Abolitionist traditions were so popular and so cherished as in England. 'You have for the last thirty years been taunting us with our connection with slavery. You have pointed to it as a stain on our national escutcheon. You have ridiculed its utter inconsistency with the declaration so frequently and boastfully repeated among us, that all men are born free and equal. Yet now, when we have finally broken with slavery—when we are waging a desperate war in order to purge our land from its pollution—when we are fighting to establish throughout the Union the freedom and equality of all men, irrespective of race and colour—you turn your backs upon us, and give all your sympathies to the slaveholders who are fighting against us.' The inference was that the English hatred of slavery was purely hypocritical, and assumed only to excuse her real and earnest hatred to America. It is needless, with historical facts fresh in the memory of the generation which witnessed them, to reason upon such a charge as this. England proved her sincerity by abundant and extravagant sacrifices. Fanatically convinced that slavery was a crime and an injustice, an abomination to God and an outrage on humanity, she spared no price to cleanse her hands of it. She paid down 30,000,000*l.* sterling to her own slaveholders. She ruined her most flourishing colonies. She quarrelled with some of her best customers—she took endless trouble and offered innumerable bribes to foreign Powers—she sacrificed every year much money and many valuable lives—in order to stop the slave-trade. The alienation of Spain, Portugal, and Brazil—the desolation of the West Indies—the African squadron—these are the monuments of British sincerity. Our abolitionism was devout and earnest in exact proportion to the ignorance out of which it sprang. Men who could be deluded by Olmsted, women who cried over the impossible woes of Uncle Tom, dissenting preachers who dilated on the prurient abominations of Hildreth's 'White Slave,' knew too little of Southern slavery as it was, too little of negro character as it is and always must be, not to be thoroughly earnest in their hatred of the first and their admiration of the second. The Abolitionists of New England had, therefore, some reason to expect that Englishmen would accept their version of the Secession question—would recognise the Federal cause as that of Abolition, and regard a war for empire as a crusade against slavery. How came it that that hope was so speedily disappointed?

This was due partly to the circumstances which occurred between the secession of South Carolina and the outrage on the Trent—the events of 1861—which made it clear beyond all question that the North was not fighting against slavery, but for empire. But it was due also, in no small measure, to the conduct of the Abolitionists themselves. The strange course of policy which that intemperate and ill-advised sect pursued is nowhere to be more clearly traced than in the volumes of verse which we have placed at the head of this article. Mr. J. Russell Lowell is certainly the second of American poets; and he is much more of a man of action and of the world than the gentle and dreamy author of 'Evangeline.' A citizen of Massachusetts, a fanatical admirer of the founders of that Republic, with their savage intolerance, their impatience of authority, and their habit of attributing to the voice of God the promptings of their own depraved and cruel passions, Mr. Lowell was just the man to become a ready disciple of the Abolition preachers. Those men have in them a good deal of the old Puritan leaven. They inherit the Puritan habit of taking the holiest name in vain as a sanction for their own questionable acts and an authority for their peculiar opinions. They inherit the Puritan contempt for the obligations of civil law and the authority of the State; the Puritan impatience of opposition; the Puritan proneness to rebellion; the Puritan penchant for tyranny; the Puritan lust of blood. Above all, they imitate the Puritans in their utter unscrupulousness in regard to the means by which their ends are to be achieved. They differ from their example chiefly in seeking the opinions which they impute to Divine inspiration, not in revelation, but in their own minds. Of these preachers Mr. Lowell quickly became the disciple and the coadjutor; even his earlier and more serious poems betray their inspiration, and these 'Biglow Papers' were written mainly under their influence. In the contrast between the first and second set we see the change which, in the first six months of 1861, came over the policy of the Abolitionists. Up to 1860, they had been disunionists. The Constitution placed them in an awkward dilemma. They could hold no office, however inferior, without swearing obedience to it; and that oath involved the recognition of slavery and rendition of fugitive slaves. They had thus to choose between perjury and exclusion from public life. Again, they could not but see that the recognition of slavery was a condition of the Union, and that, if New England would not recognise slavery and act up to her Federal engagements, she had no right to claim the advantages of the bond. Accordingly, the more honest of them went to the length of denouncing the Union altogether, violently calling it 'a covenant with hell;' while the less sincere, perjuring themselves from time to time, and not caring to affront public feeling by declaring against the Union, yet looked upon the idea of separation with favour and approval. In this they had the sympathy of Englishmen.

English Abolitionists had learned from their American friends to look upon separation as a thing desirable in the interest of the North; as one of the main purposes of the Wendell Phillipses, Beechers, and Garrisons; as the only remedy for an intolerable state of things; as liberating Massachusetts and her sister States from a connection they felt to be degrading, and from obligations they could not fulfil without dishonour. In this light nearly all Englishmen except the worshippers of the Northern democracy—who did not become Abolitionists in earnest till after the election of Lincoln and the secession of the South—regarded the disruption of the Union. And they were utterly unable to change their view on a sudden, as did the Abolitionists of New England, and clamour for the restoration of that bond between the slave States and the free which they had been taught to regard as necessary to slavery and dishonouring to freedom. Hence it was that, even among avowed and earnest Abolitionists, the secession of the South was regarded with no disfavour in England, and the efforts of the North to reconstruct the Union looked upon with coldness and disapproval.

But the Abolitionists of America were not so consistent. Their feelings were different, if their views had been the same. They hated the South as much as they loved the negro, and their desire of secession had arisen chiefly from the idea that within the Union the South would always retain a moral ascendency. They could not submit to be ruled by slaveowners, but they had no strong objection to ruling over them. Hence, by degrees, they changed their tone. At first some of them stood firm, accepted secession with pleasure, denied the right of the Federal Government to coerce a seceding State, and were ready to 'let the Union slide.' But with the prospect of war came a different view. Hatred of their old enemies prevailed over old principles, old doctrines, old theories of legal right and constitutional privilege. They began to talk as loudly of rebellion as if they had not for the last ten or twenty years been rebels themselves—sometimes by force, sometimes by fraud, resisting the law of the Union; denounced treason as if they had never preached and practised it; and extolled the 'best government on earth,' the 'great and glorious Union,' as if they had never called it a covenant with hell.

As the most brilliant, witty, and cultivated, though by no means one of the most influential among them, Mr. Lowell may without injustice be treated as the best and most favourable representative of his party. The marvellous change which has come over them is manifested in these satiric papers of his with that incisiveness and distinctness of contradiction which prose writings rarely afford; and certainly no two men were ever more unlike than the Peace-at-any-price Abolitionist and Disunionist of 1846 and the Unionist War-Christian of 1864.

Mr. Hosea Biglow, Mr. Lowell's alter ego, is supposed to be a farmer of Massachusetts, who shrewdly speculates on political events, and sends smart verses thereupon to his pastor, Parson Wilbur, by whom they are sent, accompanied with letters of pedantic and most amusing comment, to a local newspaper. Biglow has a correspondent, Mr. Sawin, who in 1846 was a soldier in Mexico, and who has since settled down, minus a few limbs, as a Southern planter. Sawin's letters are among the cleverest things in the collection, as a caricature of an adversary's views is generally more telling than the most sarcastic comment upon them. The Mexican war was as abhorrent to Mr. Biglow as the Crimean to Mr. Bright—the one being 'a Southern war,' the other 'a war of the aristocracy;' and, accordingly, Mr. Biglow wished his beloved Bay State to resist it by an indignant protest, and ultimately, if necessary, by separation:—

> Ef I'd my way, I hed ruther
> We should go to work an' part;
> They take one way, we take t' other—
> Guess it wouldn't break my heart.
> Men hed ough' to put asunder
> Them that God hez nowise jined;
> And I shouldn't greatly wonder
> Ef there's thousands of my mind.

Recruiting sergeants, Fourth of July orators, military shows, and everything that reminded him of the quarrel in which his country was engaged, were utterly abhorrent to him, and provoked sharp sarcasm and energetic rebuke, which derived additional effect from the satirist's perfect confidence that the Almighty and himself were of one mind:—

> Ez for war, I call it murder;
> There you hev it plain and flat.
> I don't want to go no further > Than my Testyment for that.
> God hez sed so plump an' fairly;
> It's ez long ez it is broad;
> And you've gut to git up airly
> Ef you want to take in God.

The present collection of papers breathes the spirit of war and extermination in every line; not a word of peace, not a shudder at the worst atrocities of war; 'pison-mad, pig-headed fighting' is all the counsel Hosea Biglow has to give. The American man of peace, like him of Birmingham, is suddenly transformed into the fiercest advocate of the bloodiest war on record. Severely as he once lashed those who thought

> That peace, to make it stick at all,
> Must be druv in with bagnets, he now endorses that view to its utmost extent, and refuses to hear of any compromise until the South shall > on her knees

> And own one flag, one road to glory—

a road paved with the bodies of emancipated slaves. But, changed as are the man's views, principles, and politics, he is as certain as ever that Heaven is on his side. Whether he has 'gut up airly,' or whether he thinks that Providence has changed its mind, we know not; but he has no fear now lest the judgment of murder, which hung over the slayers of Mexican freebooters and partisans, should await the soldiers of Milroy, M'Neil, and Butler, the bombarders of Charleston or the devastators of Virginia. To shoot a ranchero was murder, denounced as such in positive terms by the New Testament. But to hang a Maryland or Kentuckian Democrat is an act of faith highly pleasing to Heaven; while the slaughter of Confederate citizens, whether soldiers or non-combatants, is the highest exercise of brotherly love and Christian charity, and the bounden duty of every pious New-Englander. Such, in sober truth, is the doctrine of the 'Biglow Papers.' According to the first set all war is a crime, and every soldier is a murderer; secession is a duty and a right. According to the second set secession is treason and rebellion; and this war is, on the part of the North, a duty to God, by failing in which it would forfeit His favour for ever. To such things can serious and religious men be brought, when once they allow themselves to attribute their own passions and prejudices, their political and ethical judgments, their interpretations of Scripture and of nature, to the Deity. Mr. Lowell's offence may serve as a warning to some English writers. There is but a step between Puritan piety and that worst and most offensive sort of blasphemy which consists in attributing human mutability, inconsistency, wickedness, and folly to the Divine Being.

Except for this fault, it is impossible to be angry with the 'Biglow Papers.' They are, of course, full of offences against truth and decency; as caricatures, utterly unlike the original, often reversing its real features; as satires, abusive and unfair; as poetry, deformed by a painful mixture of the great and the ludicrous. But they contain so much that is laughable, and it is so easy to turn the laugh against the author, that the most vindictive Southerner can hardly bear malice against Mr. Lowell. If that gentleman have any enemies, however, a ready vengeance is within their reach. Let certain lines of his be printed and pasted up in every haunt of Irishmen, in every lager-bier saloon and recruiting office, and the author will speedily be sent to prison as a traitor and 'copperhead' for discouraging enlistments, and so assisting the rebels. Do not the following seem as if written for that very purpose?—

> 'Taint your eppylets and feathers
> Make the thing a grain more right:
> 'Taint a follerin your bell wethers
> Will excuse ye in His sight.
> Ef you take a sword and dror it,
> And go stick a feller thru,
> Guvment aint to answer for it;
> God 'll send the bill to you.

A more emphatic warning to intending recruits for Grant or Sherman it would be difficult to write.

So far Mr. Hosea Biglow is simply the puppet and mouthpiece of the Abolitionist faction. He vented their secessionist and peace-at-any-price rant in 1846, he utters their Unionist and War-Christian nonsense in 1864. It is from the party at large that he derives his ignorance of and hatred to the South, his antipathy to England, his impiety and his self-conceit. But in his wit, his vivacity, his telling sarcasms, and his fearless attacks on friends and foes alike, he speaks from the heart and with the voice of Mr. Lowell. We willingly forgive the malice, in acknowledgment of the spice of truth, in the following:—

> Of all the sarse that I can call to mind,
> England doos make the most onpleasant kind.
> 'Tis you're the sinner ollers, she's the saint,
> Wut's good's all English, all thet isn't aint.
> Wut profit's her is ollers right and just,
> And ef you don't read Scriptur so, you must;
> She's praised herself until she fairly thinks
> There aint no light in Natur when she winks.
> Haint she the Ten Commandments in her pus?
> Could the world stir 'thout she went, tu, ez nus?
> She aint like other mortals, thet's a fact;
> She never stopped the Habeas Corpus Act
> Nor specie payments, nor she never yet
> Cut down the int'rest on her public debt.
> She don't put down rebellions, lets 'em breed,
> And's ollers willin' Ireland should secede.
> She's all thet's honest, honerable, and fair,
> And when the vartoos died, they made her heir.

And we can be grateful, if his countrymen can forgive him, for so good a description of Northern men and Northern politics as is contained in our last extract:—

> Long'z ye give out commissions to a lot o' peddlin' drones
> Thet trade in whiskey with their men and skin them to their bones;
> Long'z ye sift out safe canderdates that no one aint afeard on,
> 'Cos they're so thund'rin' eminent for bein' never heard on,
> And haint no record, ez it's called, for folks to pick a hole in,
> Ez if it hurt a man to hev a body with a soul in,
> And it wuz ostentashun to be showin' it about
> Whun half his feller-citizens contrive to do without,
> Long'z ye suppose your votes can turn boiled kebbage into brain,
> And any man thet's poplar's fit to drive a lightnin' train;
> Long'z you believe democracy means I'm ez good ez you be,
> And thet a feller from the ranks can't be a knave or booby;

> Long'z these things last—and I don't see no gret signs of improvin'—
> I shan't up stakes, not hardly yet, nor twouldn' pay for movin';
> For, 'fore you lick us, it 'll be the long'st day ever you see.

So writes Mr. Sawin to his friend Biglow, confident in the prospects of the South, less from any liking for his neighbours—of whom he speaks much as Mrs. Stowe would do—than from utter contempt for the Yankees. For once, we think, Sawin was right. We do not, even now, see 'no gret signs of improvin';' and the 'day' lengthens out indefinitely without bringing the North any nearer to her purpose, or inducing the South to show any symptoms of being, or intending to be, 'licked.'

A DISTINGUISHED FEDERAL.—Among the recent arrivals from Lincolndom is General Tom Thumb. The General has been giving a series of private receptions, and last night he was received at Marlborough House by the Prince and Princess of Wales. The General was accompanied by his wife and other relations, and the Duke of Cambridge and the Prince Arthur were invited to see them. Their Royal Highnesses gave the little people a genuine reception.

THE 'BRITISH ARMY AND NAVY REVIEW.'*

THE November number of this excellent magazine presents us with the fifth and last chapter of the historical sketch of 'Lee's Second Year of Campaigns in Defence of Richmond,' by Captain C. C. Chesney, R.E. All who have read the former work of this author on the American war will receive with interest and satisfaction the military criticisms embodied in these later chapters. The text is full, clear, and impartial, and, to render certain passages of the narrative the more intelligible, it is accompanied by maps and diagrams of the field of operations. Descriptions of battles and sieges, as given even in popular histories, are too often difficult of comprehension, and when written out professionally, as illustrations of the art of war, they can be understood only by students or amateurs. Captain Chesney so writes, however, of the movements of armies, of attack and defence, of strategy, and other matters military, that his accounts are not at all like official reports or scientific essays, and will meet with a large and eager acceptance outside of the artillery mess and the Staff College. In the five chapters embraced in the numbers of the British Army and Navy Review now on our table, he describes some of the most important and exciting events of the war in the Southern States, including the battle of Gettysburg and the great fight at Chickamauga, and nowhere else can be found so connected and accurate a presentation of the plans and incidents of these two momentous conflicts.

CONFEDERATE OFFICIAL MANIFESTO.

THE following is the joint note addressed to the French Minister of Foreign Affairs by the diplomatic representatives of the Confederate Government abroad, transmitting an official copy of the manifesto of the Congress of the Confederate States. We understand that an identical note has been addressedto the principal Governments of Western Europe. The manifesto referred to was printed in THE INDEX of July 14, 1864.

Paris, November 11, 1864.

To His Excellency M. Drouyn de Lhuys, Minister of Foreign Affairs.

SIR,—The undersigned Commissioners of the Confederate States of America, in pursuance of the instructions of their Government, have the honour to present to your Excellency a copy of a manifesto issued by the Congress of said States with the approval of the President, and of which the President was requested to cause copies to be transmitted to their Commissioners abroad, to the end that the same might be by them laid before foreign Governments; they at the same time communicate a copy of the preamble and resolutions of Congress accompanying said manifesto.

The dispositions, principles, and purposes by which the Confederate States have been and are still animated, are set forth in this paper with all the authority due to the solemn declarations of the legislative and executive branches of their Government, and with a clearness which leaves no room for comment or explanation. In a few sentences it is pointed out that 'all they ask is immunity from interference with their internal peace and prosperity, and to be left in the undisturbed enjoyment of their inalienable rights of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, which their common ancestry declared to be the equal heritage of all parties to the social compact. Let them forbear aggressions upon us, and the war is at an end. If there be questions which require adjustment by negotiation, they have ever been willing, and are still willing, to enter into communication with their adversaries in a spirit of equity and manly frankness, and commit their cause to the enlightened judgment of the world, to the sober reflection of their adversaries themselves, and to the solemn and righteous arbitrament of Heaven.'

The undersigned beg leave most respectfully to invite the attention of the Government of his Imperial Majesty to this frank and full explanation of the attitude and purposes of the Confederate States, and will merely remark in addition, that since the issuing of that manifesto the war has continued to be waged by our enemies with even increased ferocity, a more signal disregard of all the rules of civilised warfare, and more wanton violation of the obligations of international law.

The undersigned, having thus complied with the instructions of their Government, beg to assure your Excellency of the distinguished consideration with which they have the honour to be,

Your Excellency's most obedient servants,

(Signed) JOHN SLIDELL.
J. M. MASON.
A. DUDLEY MANN.

A similar document, with the necessary changes, has been presented to all the Cabinets of Europe (Constantinople excepted). Mr. Slidell has handed in person to M. Drouyn de Lhuys the above. Bishop Lynch will hand to the Pope the copy intended for him.

PROPOSED ENLISTMENT OF THE SOUTHERN NEGROES.—The productive industry of the Confederates will but be crippled by the withdrawal of even all their able-bodied negroes. The light work of field labour, in the rich soils of the South, is very generally performed by negro women and boys and girls over thirteen or fourteen years old. The surpluses of their usual production no longer necessary, the Southern people can very well afford to withdraw from their culture of breadstuffs the enormous number of men proposed, seeing that more than one-half of all the residue of their servants is usually available for the labour of the farm. Neither the sufficiency of their production nor the safety of their labour-system forbids their enlistment of every able-bodied man in their negro-reserves.—New York Daily News.

THE CONFEDERATE CAUSE IN FRANCE.

FROM A CONFEDERATE CORRESPONDENT.

PARIS: November 23.

THE question to which the capture of the Florida has given rise has not yet ceased to occupy the attention of the Paris press. The Siècle and the Opinion Nationale, resuming the arguments which they have already put forth, persist in asserting reasons for excusing the aggression of the commander of the Wachusetts. These attempts to justify such a proceeding have, however, resulted in the confusion of those by whom they have been made. The France and the Pays have severely criticised, one the Opinion, and the other the Siècle; and the Mémorial Diplomatique, in an article specially directed to the consideration of this question from an international point of view, has shown that the theory propounded by these two Liberal journals is utterly groundless.

The France does not stay to discuss this theory; it is too indignant to do that.

The Florida, it exclaims, has been attacked and captured in defiance of all the principles of the law of nations, in defiance of the neutral and sovereign rights of the Brazilian Government, whose authorities were powerless to prevent this act of piracy, this insult to the honour of their country.

In France, in England, in Europe, among all civilised nations, but one sentiment has been expressed—that of the sternest censure of an act which recalls, with still more gravity and audacity, the offence committed by the United States navy on board the Trent. Doubtless Brazil will demand and obtain redress in this affair, as the British Government did in the one just alluded to.

The present question is one of far graver import than the mere approval or disapproval of the outrageous policy of the North or of the heroic resistance of the South; the interest of neutral Powers, the respect due to international securities, and national independence, are alike menaced by this brutal procedure of the United States, which has, strange to say, received the patronage of the Opinion Nationale.

The United States have rejected the generous principles proclaimed by the treaty of Paris; they support privateering; they disregard neutral rights; they do not admit the necessity of effective blockades; the right of search is still rigorously enforced by them: in a word, they override all the protective conditions which the code of civilised nations and humanity itself everywhere impose upon belligerents; and now they trample the sacred rights of national sovereignty beneath their feet.

It would be difficult (says the France, in concluding) for such an outrage as this to pass without protestation; but that even the gravity of its character should be denied, appeared a thing impossible.

This sharp rejoinder is only equalled by that made by the Pays to the Siècle:—

We defy the Siècle to prove that a vessel carrying our national flag ever gave such an example as that which the Wachusetts has just furnished. But the captain of the Wachusetts and Consul Wilson, his accomplice, have not invoked the rules of the law of nations. No. They gave their word of honour that the Florida should not be attacked.

In order the better to lull the vigilance of Captain Morris, to inspire him with a false security, they sent him a cartel; they offered him a loyal combat, which was loyally accepted, and which placed the Florida not only under the guaranty of Brazilian neutrality, but also under the guaranty of American honour.

No American man-of-war would have dared to fire a shot within the port of Brest or of Cherbourg. The sole motive for the insult offered to Brazil was that which has been already named:—Brazil is feeble, and may consequently be insulted with impunity.

What remains of this debate is the undeniable fact that a night attack was made upon an adversary, to which it had been said: 'Sleep peacefully. So long as you remain here, you are safely sheltered from all hostility. I have given my word of honour, and, with a view to still greater precaution, yours has also been demanded. Our engagement shall take place in a few days. I will go out first, I will wait for you in the open sea, and we will fight in broad daylight.'

The captain of the Wachusetts has succeeded in taking off the Florida, but he has left the honour of his flag in the port of Bahia. If the Siècle doubts this, let it enter the first barracks it comes to, and ask the first soldier it there meets. The answer is by no means doubtful.

The Mémorial Diplomatique has treated the question from a strictly legal point of view. The article published on the subject by this journal forms a short treatise, in which a summary exposition is given of those points of international law which the present question involves. This article is from the pen of M. Henri Vignaud, from New Orleans, formerly editor of the Renaissance Louisianaise. The opinions of this writer in such matters may be regarded as of importance, as three or four months since, when some English vessels were condemned by a prize court at New York, some articles were published by him in the Mémorial Diplomatique, which have not only been reproduced by a portion of the English press, but also discussed in Parliament, both in the House of Lords and in the House of Commons.

After having stated the principles by virtue of which the maritime territory of neutrals is inviolable, the Mémorial Diplomatique shows that the territorial seas of the neutral are divided into two separate and distinct regions, over which he exercises an unequal sovereignty: the open territorial sea which waters the coast of the neutral, and over which he has but a limited jurisdiction, and the ports or roadsteads of the neutral, over which he exercises an exclusive sovereignty.

The Mémorial, having laid down these premises, deduces from them results which altogether overturn the arguments of the Siècle and the Opinion. These journals had maintained that, the Confederates having violated the maritime domain of Brazil by capturing American vessels within two miles of the coast, the United States had consequently the right of reprisal. But the distinction above stated destroys such an objection.

That the neutral (says the Mémorial), who exercises but a limited sovereignty over his open territorial seas—who, owing to the nature of this domain, can only with difficulty exercise his jurisdiction over them—may be compelled, under certain circumstances, to tolerate acts of hostility committed there by belligerents, may be conceived; but that he should permit such acts to be committed in ports which are absolutely and directly beneath his control, this is inadmissible, nor has it ever been admitted.

No author has ever ventured to say that the roadsteads and ports of a neutral might, under any circumstances whatever, become a legitimate field for the hostile operations of one or two belligerents.

After a minute and elaborate examination of each of the questions to which the capture of the Florida has given rise, the Memorial deduces its conclusions as follows:—

The Florida having been captured within a Brazilian port, the Government of Rio Janeiro has the right to demand a double satisfaction, namely, for the insult which it has itself suffered and for damages sustained by the Florida.

The United States Government cannot offer as an excuse for the aggression of the Wachusetts that Confederate vessels had already violated the Brazilian territory, since the right of reprisal, doubtful when exercised on the open territorial sea of a neutral, does not exist inside the neutral's ports.

Moreover, the United States Government cannot allege that the Brazilian Government avowed its powerlessness to enforce respect for its neutrality, since this Government spoke only of its sovereignty over its open territorial seas, it being there that the acts were committed of which the United States complained.

If the Brazilian Government does not demand satisfaction from that of the United States, or if it does not obtain it, the Confederate Government will be fully justified in rendering it directly responsible for the wrong which it has suffered.

This long article concludes with the following considerations:—

We have studied this affair of the Florida solely in the light of international maritime law: we have busied ourselves neither with the character of this vessel, nor the part hitherto played by her. We have not seen in her a pirate attached to an unjust cause, nor an heroic vessel defending, amidst a thousand dangers, the independence of its country, but simply a belligerent vessel whose rights have been violated.

That which we regard as specially important in this regretful affair, is the contumacy with which the United States place themselves above all those international obligations, not imposed by any code, but which humanity and reason, strengthened by usage and by the adherence of all civilised Powers, have rendered inviolable.

We have already, in other matters, shown how greatly the maritime jurisprudence of the United States disaccords with the best-established principles of international law, and we have pointed out the danger to which neutrals would be exposed in allowing precedents to be established which may at some time or other be invoked against themselves.

We feel constrained at the present time again to point out this danger. Neutral rights, so repeatedly trampled under foot by the United States, have in the present instance been ignored under circumstances which are without precedent. Surely never since a public right existed has such a crime as this been perpetrated. The capture of the Florida is a unique example in history. To have dared to commit this audacious act, there must have been, to an equal degree, a contempt of the power of neutrals and of all possible rights.

It has been rumoured here that the English Cabinet is about to request the cooperation of that of the Emperor to make certain joint representations to the Washington Government relative to the violation of neutral rights of which Bahia has just been the theatre, but I do not think there any grounds for such a report. The attitude which the Imperial Government will assume in this matter is not yet known; but if we may believe a Brazilian correspondent of the Patrie, the French Minister at Rio, as soon as the affair of the Florida became known there, hastened to express the deepest sympathy on the occasion to the Government of Brazil. This initiative, says the correspondent, has produced an excellent effect, and the whole of the diplomatic body have followed the example given by the French Minister.

I do not know if it is on this account, as it is said to be, that Mr. Slidell has had an interview with M. Drouyn de Lhuys, but I know that the Emperor's Minister for Foreign Affairs received the Confederate diplomatist with more marked respect than usual, and that the interview was a long and friendly one.

The news of Lincoln's election, which reached here yesterday evening, has produced a great sensation, which has been felt at the Bourse. The chief editor of the France, M. Cohen, in devoting the first leader in his journal to the consideration of this intelligence, asks 'if the North will persist in violating, with regard to the South, the rights of popular sovereignty and the independency of States; if all the noble and liberal institutions by which the America of Washington had been made so powerful and so glorious are doomed to perish to the very last in a military dictatorship, having neither restraint nor counterpoise, which sports with the lives of its citizens, with the public fortune, and with the moral and political future of this great nation?' The France hopes not.

The Temps is most brilliant. Hurrah for 'the good news which announces the speedy reestablishment of the Union!' Hurrah for the American people, 'who have seen that there was but one man capable of bringing the war to a favourable termination!'

The same song is sung by the Opinion Nationale.

FUNERAL OF MRS. GREENHOW.—A letter to the Richmond Sentinel says: 'The coffin, which was as richly decorated as the resources of the town admitted, and still covered with the Confederate flag, was borne to Oakdale Cemetery, followed by an immense funeral cortège. A beautiful spot on a grassy slope, overshadowed by trees, and in sight of a tranquil lake, was chosen for her resting-place. Rain fell in torrents during the day, but as the coffin was being lowered into the grave the sun burst forth in the brightest majesty, and a rainbow of the most vivid colours spanned the horizon. Let us accept the omen, not only for her, the quiet sleeper, who after many storms and a tumultuous and checquered life, came to peace and rest at last, but also for our beloved country, over which we trust the rainbow of hope will ere long shine with brightest dyes.

THE ROCHDALE OPERATIVES AND THE WAR.

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Rochdale: November 21.

Another large gathering of the factory operatives in the Rochdale district has taken place this week, the meeting having been convened in accordance with the following placard:—

PEACE AND SOUTHERN INDEPENDENCE.

An open-air meeting will be held on Friday, the 18th inst., on the plot of vacant ground behind Mr. Ralph Rawstron's new mill, Whitworth, to take into consideration the present condition of the country, and also to propose some means whereby the distress in the cotton districts can be brought to an end.

Factory operatives should all attend.

The firm of the Rawstrons, I may observe, are perhaps the largest employers of labour in the whole of the manufacturing district. They have five large cotton mills, known as the 'Bridge Mills,' Whitworth, besides a sixth at Black Pits, near Rochdale; and in good times they used to employ from 6,000 to 8,000 hands. In the present state of affairs they have almost a full complement of hands at work, but for the most part on half time.

The weather being exceedingly unpropitious for an out-door meeting, an adjournment took place by the considerate permission of the rev. incumbent (Mr. Gaitskill) to the Church of England Institute, which building was speedily crowded almost to suffocation. The advocates of 'Peace and Southern Independence,' on mounting the platform, were very cordially received. Mr. Samuel Mills, a cotton operative, Rochdale, was voted to the chair.

The Chairman opened the meeting by stating it was very well known in that neighbourhood that he held tolerably decided views on the American question, having had to discuss it in times past with some of the agents of the Union and Emancipation Society in that very place. He went entirely with the South, because he saw that the people of that part of the American continent had shown, both in the senate and in the field, a high and unquestionable capacity for self-government; and therefore he considered it the duty of this country, along with France and other European Powers, to recognise the Confederacy. He concluded by introducing Mr. Mortimer Grimshaw, of whom he said that he was the first working-man in this country to advocate peace on the basis of the independence of the South.

Mr. Grimshaw then moved the first resolution, which was as follows:—

That this meeting wishes to make known the sufferings which the working men in the cotton trade, and their wives and families, have long had to bear, owing to the stoppage in the supply of cotton, which article affords them the only means to earn their daily bread; and this meeting also wishes to make known their fears that, if this war goes on, the sufferings of the cotton operatives will grow worse and worse; also that the poor-law relief was never intended to meet a case of this kind, and cannot do so effectually; and that this meeting cannot see why tens of thousands of British working men should be brought to pauperism, or how it can be reasonable for any Government in time of peace to act in such a way as to bring them to that state.

He appeared that evening, said the speaker, himself a working man, before the working men of the district around Rochdale, and he was one who, like them, had suffered from the consequences of the unnecessary war in America. That war, he believed, ought never to have been allowed to go on, and in his opinion it would not have been continued to the present time but for such men as John Bright and Richard Cobden—men who cried 'Peace, peace,' when their own country was engaged in the Russian war, but are now writing letters to influential men in America, urging the prosecution of the miserable civil war in that ill-fated country. He was told, he said, that day, by a justice of the peace in Rochdale, that John Bright had said to him, if by putting up his little finger he could stop the American war, he would not do it. This statement was followed by great sensation, after which the mover once more read the resolution, and sat down amid great applause.

Mr. K. Smith, of the Oldham Relief Committee, in seconding the resolution, said the time had fully come when the working men ought to speak out upon the condition of the country. He had been an eyewitness of the fearful distress that existed, being himself a member of the Relief Committee for his own town. He could therefore speak from personal observation. Mr. Smith then detailed a variety of 'cases' within his own knowledge, in a strain of natural pathos that is full of meaning to an audience of Lancashire operatives, and concluded by earnestly seconding the motion.

Upon the resolution being put to the meeting, the Chairman declared it carried by an overwhelming majority.

The next resolution was moved by Mr. Amos Stott (Tunnicliffe), cashier to the Messrs. Rawstron, and was as follows:—

That, in consequence of the widespread distress that now prevails in the cotton districts by the continuance of the war in America, this meeting is desirous that Her Majesty's Government should use their influence, together with France and other European Powers, to bring both the belligerents together in order to put a stop to the vast destruction of life and property that is now going on in that unhappy country.

Mr. Stott, who appeared to be exceedingly popular with the operatives in that district, made a special text of Mr. Bright's letter to Horace Greeley. In the course of his criticism he was interrupted by some person in the meeting, who doubted the authenticity of the document, whereupon the chairman, producing a recent number of The Index, read the letter from beginning to end amid expressions of the greatest indignation and excitement.

Mr. R. Fletcher (Whitworth), one of the employés of the Messrs. Rawstron, seconded the motion. It was the first time, he said, in his life that he had stood up to address an audience, but he felt it his duty to come forward and tell his fellow operatives what his opinions were upon the American war. He considered it a wicked and purposeless war, and he believed it could never have been carried on by the Yankees themselves. Here the speaker entered at some length upon the case of the Great Western. He also called attention to two of their own neighbours who had just returned from New York, one of whom was afraid of being drafted, and the other of being crimped; and both, he added, were teetotallers. This, he said, scarcely bore out the Manchester Examiner's saying, that if people going to New York would only keep sober, they would have nothing to fear whether from the recruiting officer or the kidnapper. He cared nothing about a newspaper 'theorising' about one thing and another; what he wanted was facts, and they had one of such facts in their own neighbourhood, which they all knew.

The Chairman, upon putting the foregoing resolution to the meeting, declared it carried by a majority as large as in the previous case.

Mr. J. Matthew (Manchester), moved the third resolution, which was as follows:—

That this meeting of factory and other operatives memorialise the Right Hon. Viscount Palmerston, Her Majesty's First Lord of the Treasury, for the immediate and total repeal of all duties now levied on cotton goods and yarns when imported into British India, and that such memorial be signed by the chairman on behalf of this meeting; and further, that a deputation be appointed to present the memorial to his Lordship, and that Mr. W. J. Leigh, M.P. for South Lancashire, be requested to accompany the deputation and support its prayer.

In support of this resolution Mr. Matthew said he was 'with' Bright and Cobden in their disapproval of the Russian war, and he was very sorry that those politicians had deserted their principles, for if the doctrine of 'arbitration of nations' was good in 1854, what had made it bad in 1864? He should be more sorry, if, like some of their false notions, time should prove that they themselves were 'unsound.' They were both of them in opposition on the 'Ten Hours Bill,' and would any one now say that Bill had not proved itself a blessing both to masters and to men? (Loud cheering from all parts of the meeting.) The speaker also made an effective point in alluding to Messrs. Bright and Cobden's exertions in the repeal of the Corn Laws and other measures of practical utility, but he wanted to know why Richard Cobden, the champion of free trade and the negotiator of commercial treaties, did not go over to America and 'culminate his labours' by getting the tariffs removed in that country. Mr. Matthew concluded a somewhat lengthy and argumentative address by a vigorous appeal in favour of the resolution.

Mr. John Hoyle, cotton manufacturer (Whitworth), seconded the resolution, which was carried almost unanimously.

Some few representatives of the Northern party attempted to move the following amendment, but to no purpose:—

That this meeting deplores the great and long-continued distress in these districts occasioned by the civil war in America, and is earnestly desirous for a speedy return of peace and commercial prosperity; but, at the same time, they feel bound to confess that, since nothing they could do would have prevented the disastrous and destructive war at present raging on the American continent, so at the present time they cannot see that the working men of the Rochdale district, or of England, could do anything towards hastening the termination of that war; and that the true interests of this country can be best served by allowing the American people to fight it out themselves.

The amendment was declared negatived, and the meeting peaceably terminated, after appointing the Chairman one of the proposed deputation to Lord Palmerston.

SOUTHERN SYMPATHY IN THE POTTERIES.

FROM OUR SPECIAL REPORTER.

Burslem: November 19, 1864.

A large and highly influential meeting, convened upon a requisition presented to the Chief Bailiff, was held last evening in this town, for the consideration of the American question. The requisition was signed by every clergyman of the Church of England, the wardens of the four churches in the parish, many ministers of Dissenting denominations, and nearly 200 of the principal inhabitants of the town. It was set forth by the requisitionists that 'the period had now arrived when the independence of the Confederate States ought to be recognised,' and they based that opinion upon the following 'facts'—that 'the Southern States had successfully combated the vastly superior wealth and forces of the Northern States for upwards of three years:' 'that an able, popular, and vigorous Government had been established;' and 'that it was an impossibility for a spirited Anglo-Saxon united race of people, numbering upwards of 4,000,000 of souls and possessing very many thousands of square miles of territory, ever to be conquered and subdued.' While such, however, were the terms of the requisition, it was plainly stated by the leading promoters of the meeting that they had no hope, or even desire, of carrying at the present time a positive resolution to the foregoing effect, seeing that their object would be fully secured by affording an opportunity to the friends of the South for giving expression to their sympathy with the Confederate cause, while the occasion would also serve to draw from the intelligent portion of their opponents whatever they cared to advance in favour of the North.

The Chief Bailiff (W. E. Twigg, Esq.), upon taking the chair, said he inferred, from the manifest tokens of interest already exhibited by that important meeting, there would be a great difference of opinion upon the subject about to be brought before them. It had been reported that the meeting would partake of a political character and would be made to subserve political ends; but he assured them that such was not the fact. When he told them that he in conjunction with others had done his best to dissuade Mr. Beresford Hope, who was one of the warmest sympathisers with the Confederacy, from accepting a pressing invitation to attend and address them upon 'Southern independence,' preferring to leave the matter entirely to the inhabitants of Burslem, they must feel convinced that the meeting was not marked by a political or partisan bias. With respect to Burslem itself, he might remind them how severely the town, even two or three years ago, suffered from the unnatural contest still protracted in America. He had a strong feeling upon the subject, but that feeling he should suppress in his capacity as chairman of that meeting. He might at least call to their recollection the time when more than 150 wheelbarrows were drawn up round the Town Hall to carry fuel to the humble hearths that wanted the genial aspect of a little fire in consequence of the fearful strife across the Atlantic. That fearful strife still prevailed, and if they could by any means help to bring it to an end, he should individually, and he did not doubt they would collectively, be very glad to do so. He concluded amid general applause by requesting the meeting to give a fair hearing to every speaker.

The Rev. Dr. Armstrong, rector of Burslem, then moved the following resolution:—

That this meeting considers the time has arrived when Her Majesty's Government, in conjunction with the other Powers of Europe, should recognise the independence of the Confederate States of America.

The reading of the resolution was received with prolonged and almost general cheering, followed, however, by some expressions of dissent.

The rev. Doctor said, if he could be convinced that he held wrong opinions, he would abandon those he now entertained, and it would not be the first time he had candidly come forward and acknowledged himself beaten. (Hear, hear.) Not as a champion of the Southerners, but as a Christian minister, he took, he hoped, a broad and liberal view of the subject before the meeting. He saw, on the other side of the Atlantic, how men of the same flesh and blood as themselves had been slaughtering each other for nearly four years, without at present any prospect of the horrible carnage being stayed. Every person having a touch of humanity must feel with him that no proper effort should be spared that might tend to put a stop to the work of slaughter. It was not to be desired that they should interfere in any warlike sense with the North, but it was deemed proper that, as the war had gone on for nearly four years and there appeared to be no likelihood of its terminating, the Powers of Europe should do as the Federal Government had already in a great measure done, viz. recognise the Government of the South. (Great cheering, followed again by some disapprobation.) He would repeat what he had just said: he maintained that in a very great measure the North had recognised the South, and therefore was debarred from taking offence if the European Powers followed its example. If he were asked how the North had recognised the South, he would make the conclusive reply that they exchanged prisoners on equal terms. (Cheers.) If the North had the power to repress the 'rebellion,' they would have shown it before now; but it was manifest that they had not the power, and it appeared equally clear that, failing the ability to subjugate, they would be content with nothing short of extermination. (Interruption.) If they went on as they appeared to be going on, their object must needs be to 'exterminate' the gallant Christians of the South. (Great cheering.) Let him show the ungodly nature of the strife by an instance of the many cruelties practised by the generals and soldiery of the North. (The rev. Doctor then read an extract from a letter by the Special Commissioner of the Daily Telegraph, showing the horrible barbarity perpetrated by the Federal General Custer in the Shenandoah Valley, in subjecting children to martial law and ordering a lad of sixteen years to be shot as a 'rebel.' The reading of the extract caused a profound feeling of indignation, a large majority of the meeting joining in the cry of 'Shame.') The rev. Doctor said that was not all. He held in his hand a document containing legal proof that a young man from the village of Tunstall, apprenticed at Burslem, who took his passage some few years ago to the States, succeeded in acquiring some property at Knoxville, which, however, had been recently confiscated because the owner would not forswear his allegiance to the Queen of Great Britain and become a citizen under the stars and stripes. (Shame.) The Americans of the South, and many of them in the North, were of the same flesh and blood with the people of this country; but judging from the way in which they were combating each other, without any prospect of a termination of the strife, he thought it was time that Her Majesty's Government, without desiring to offend the North, should recognise the Confederate Government so far as the Government of Washington had already done; and in saying this he stood before them simply as a Christian clergyman whose desire was for 'peace in our time' throughout the world. (The rev. Doctor resumed his seat amid warm expressions of applause.)

Mr. W. H. Mayer, in seconding the resolution, declared himself a 'Southerner to the backbone,' and hoped to see the Confederate States free from the most despotic Government that ever oppressed a gallant nation. He advocated the recognition of the South also as a free-trader, and he would ask how could the friends of free trade support the aggressive and bloodthirsty Government of a country that was the greatest monopolist on the face of the earth? He called attention to the high tariffs passed by the North, and said that, so soon as the manufacturers in those States could do without English manufactured goods, fair competition on this side would be stopped by the passing of still higher tariffs. He was surprised to find there were working men so credulous as to admire, at the bidding of their leaders, the operations of a Government that was depriving them directly or indirectly of a portion of their daily bread. (Interruption.) A gentleman in the crowd had just said that England obtained her grain from the United States. All he (Mr. Mayer) could say was, if the people of England had to depend upon that source of supply, the person who had interrupted him would not long have such powerful lungs. The Federal Government, he repeated, was the most despotic on the face of the earth.

(Cheers, and cries of 'No.') Did those who said 'no' think that such a meeting as that could be held in the Empire City of New York? (No, no.) The sooner the unholy war in which the Federals were engaged was ended, the better it would be for all classes. He thought —and he believed the opinion to be general—the British Government ought to abstain from warlike interference; but what he wanted to see was this, that if one or more of the Continental Powers should renew its wish to make a proposition of a friendly kind which would tend to terminate the strife, Her Majesty's Government should be willing to accept such a well-intentioned proffer of good offices. (Loud cheering.)

At this stage of the proceedings, although up to this time the 'South' had the victory by an overwhelming majority, the meeting was thrown into a state of the greatest confusion by the Chief Bailiff introducing the Secretary of the Southern Independence Association (Manchester), who, as a stranger, was not competent, it was urged, to address a formally convened meeting of the inhabitants of the town of Burslem. After a good deal of vehement altercation, in the course of which Mr. Kershaw was warmly supported by a large portion of the crowd, a challenge was offered by that gentleman (and subsequently, I believe, accepted) to meet in public discussion the 'best man' the Northern faction could bring against him. The excitement, however, that had now possessed the popular mind was scarcely allayed by that arrangement, and the remainder of the proceedings were marked by more or less of disorder. This was the first time, remarked Mr. Kershaw, that he had been refused a hearing; and, when he remembered the eulogium recently passed upon the people of Burslem by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, he could scarcely dare to believe they would have conducted themselves in such a manner.

The uproar having somewhat subsided, the Rev. F. W. Macdonald opposed Dr. Armstrong's motion in a speech marked by considerable moderation in tone and statements. When the war broke out the national feeling, he said, was fairly represented by the Times, which used these memorable words: 'The North is fighting for freedom, the South for slavery.' Since then, however, the Times had once more vindicated its title as the 'national weathercock.' It showed which way the wind blew, but could scarcely be consulted with safety as to the cardinal points of right or wrong. They had all admired as they ought to admire the chivalry of the Southern soldier; and they had all admired as they ought to admire the ability, courage, and self-sacrifice of the Southern generals and statesmen. (Applause.) They had been—and they would be more than human if they had not been—irritated through the insolence of the Northern press by the soreness arising out of the Trent and the Alabama; but he hoped they would not suffer prejudice, or, if they pleased, patriotism, to warp their judgment. After dealing at some length with the question of slavery, which he also treated like a man of sense, he argued that to ask the English Government to recognise the independence of the South was almost tantamount to asking them to obtain it. He thought that England ought to acknowledge the Confederacy when the Confederacy had achieved its independence. The rev. gentleman concluded a dispassionate address by assuring the meeting that it was because he loved his country that he wished to refrain from taking part in the strife. He deplored the slaughter, and prayed that no Englishman would write, speak, or do anything to swell the torrent of blood that had already overspread the land.

Mr. Thomas Edge supported the motion in vigorous terms, and said that almost every English statesman of note or no note had acknowledged that the Confederates merited their independence.

The Rev. O'Neil Pratt moved the good-humour of the meeting by proclaiming himself at the outset of his speech a 'red-hot Southerner,' and was greeted with considerable cheering as he continued his address in the same key.

Ultimately, the Chief Bailiff declared that while a vast majority of the meeting sympathised with the South, Dr. Armstrong's motion for recognition was lost by a small majority. The meeting lasted nearly four hours.

The latest trade-report from the Staffordshire Potteries says that trade with the United States has recently undergone great changes. In the early part of the year the demand was excessive, a vast number of orders having been given last fall for spring shipment. They were, indeed, out of all proportion to the immediate necessities of the population, and since that time the continuation of the civil war, the high prices of gold and rates of exchange, the fluctuations in the money market, the excitement caused by the Presidential election, and other causes, have induced many Pottery merchants either absolutely to countermand valuable orders or indefinitely to suspend them. Large stocks of earthenware are held in New York, Boston, and Philadelphia, and there is therefore reason to fear that the manufacturers engaged exclusively in supplying this important market will have to put their hands on 'short time.'

The Federals in the Valley.—At the house of the writer they killed all the sheep except six; took the only horse on the place; killed twenty hogs and fifty turkeys; broke open the meat-house and took all the meat; destroyed all the fruit-trees; tore the carriage to pieces, and carried away all the hay, oats, and corn. The lady told them to take all, for it would not subdue her spirit, and that not one tear would she shed over the loss of anything save friends. They went to the house of one old lady, nearly eighty years old, and robbed her of everything. For three days she had nothing to eat but green corn and salt. Three ladies kept forty of the brutes from entering their house by stationing themselves in the door with knives in their hands, and telling them that they would stab the first man that entered the house. They, before resorting to these measures, appealed to their humanity, asking if there were none present who had brothers and sisters. They only laughed, and replied they never heard of such things. The bravery of the ladies saved them, and the Yankees did not enter.'—Richmond Enquirer.

THE MURDER OF SIX CONFEDERATE SOLDIERS.

The St. Louis Republican contains an account of the shooting of six Confederate soldiers at St. Louis, by order of the Federal General commanding, in retaliation for the killing of Major White and his six comrades by guerillas. When the prisoners arrived on the ground they were marched to the places fixed for the execution, these being six upright pine posts set in the ground, with square hard seats attached for each man to sit upon. They took their places upon their seats, each with comparative calmness, and nearly all with appearances of resignation to the dreadful fate that stared at them so immediately. But little emotion was displayed by any of the six, except Nichols and Minniken; the latter commenced prayerful ejaculations in a subdued tone of voice soon after being seated, which he kept up until the bandage was tied over his eyes; after that his only remark was, 'Boys, when you shoot me, kill me dead.' Nichols made no remarks, but kept weeping from the time of taking his seat until the bandage was placed over his eyes. Ladd and Bunch exhibited some slight evidences of dejection, but not a word escaped them during the whole scene. Blackburn sat still and stolid upon his seat, and throughout was as imperturbed as a statue. No muscle of his face quivered—there was no wildness in his eye—not a movement that denoted the slightest uneasiness in his manner. Gates, who was only twenty-one years of age, and perfectly beardless, at first manifested a most singular indifference. He had the manner of a young man just the least embarrassed upon the introduction to strangers; yet, withal, there was no fear in the expression of his features, but rather a manifestation of self-confidence, as one who had a great and dangerous duty to perform, and who felt himself equal to it. Towards the end he began to manifest emotion, and, speaking to one of the attending physicians who was standing near by, asked, 'Don't you think there is any hope that it will be postponed?' and on being answered in the negative he moaned occasionally, and at intervals made use of the following expressions:—'O Lord, have mercy upon me!' 'Oh! to think of the news that is to go to my father and mother!' 'Well, I a'n't the first, and I don't reckon I'll be the last.' 'Lord have mercy upon me!' 'To be tied to a stake and shot; I tell you its awful.' After he had been tied to the stake, and Chaplain M'Kim had prayed with him, he said, addressing the guard, 'Boys, I hope if any of you are ever shot, you won't be shot as innocent as I am.' Chaplain M'Kim having said prayers with each prisoner, and bid them good-bye, Colonel Heinrichs read the order of execution, after which he informed the prisoners that if they desired to say anything they could have an opportunity. There was no response except from Minniken, who said, 'I would like to say a few words.' He then, with firm and distinct voice and rapid utterance, said, 'Soldiers, and all who hear me, take warning! I have been a Confederate soldier for four years, and as such have served my country faithfully. And I am taken out now and shot for what men have done that I know nothing about, and for what I had nothing to do with. I never was a guerilla, and I am very sorry that I have to be shot for the acts of men that I had nothing to do with, and for what I am not guilty of. If I had taken any of you soldiers prisoners, I would have treated you as such. I never would have had you shot. I never would hurt anybody. I hope God may take me to His bosom after I am dead. O Lord, be with me!' Each prisoner's eyes were then bandaged. When the sergeant approached Minniken to put the bandage on his eyes, the prisoner said, 'Sergeant, I don't blame you, I hope I'll meet you in another world; I hope I'll meet you all in heaven. O Lord, have mercy on my poor soul!' Bunch and Blackburn still remained silent and almost motionless. Minniken said, 'Lord, have mercy on my poor sinful soul!' Gates said, 'John Nichols, we are going to die. Farewell!' Minniken replied, 'Farewell, we will meet in a better world!' Gates responded: 'Farewell to all the boys!' Nothing further was said, and the command to make ready was given. There was a momentary suspense, and then a further command, 'One, two, fire!' and the entire volley was discharged almost as one gun. Instantly the blood spurted from the breast of each prisoner, and, quivering for a moment, their heads fell upon their shoulders, and their bodies lurched to one side, and fell as near to the ground as they could with their arms pinioned to the stakes. In this position the blood streamed from their wounds, which were nearly all in the breast, and in one or two places formed little pools upon the ground. The attending physicians examined the bodies as soon as the firing ceased, and found no signs of life in any except Blackburn. In five minutes from the time the volley was discharged they were all dead. Gates, after he was shot, uttered the exclamation 'Oh!' and Blackburn cried out, 'Kill me quick;' but in an instant later they were evidently insensible.

AFFAIRS FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

Wednesday Evening.

MONEY AND DISCOUNT MARKET.

The money market has assumed a much more easy appearance. The expectation is that the Bank will at once reduce to 7 per cent. if it does not shortly go to 6. It would not be desirable that the lower point should be reached, because if there was an apparent plethora of capital a revival of speculation would speedily follow. For the present, we shall be content to see the rate rule at 7 per cent., since it will allow affairs to adjust themselves; and if after the turn of the year business should assume a more favourable position, the effect would be satisfactory. It must not be forgotten that when the Bank rate went to 9 per cent. it nipped in the bud a variety of schemes which previously had been matured, and the promoters are now only waiting the opportunity when the terms shall recede to introduce them. The Bank Directors will exercise a wise discretion if they do not too suddenly lower the official minimum, because, with the rise in cotton at Liverpool and a fresh stimulus to the exportation of the precious metals to Egypt and the East, the spring might inaugurate a period of pressure worse than that already experienced. The supply of capital at the Stock Exchange has been large; the rates have varied from 4 to 5 per cent. They are now $4\frac{1}{2}$ to $5\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.

BULLION AND SPECIE MOVEMENTS.

The bullion market presents very little change. The transactions during the week have not been of any magnitude, but on the whole the balance is favourable; the amount sent into the Bank having been 174,000*l.*, against which there have been withdrawals to the extent of 86,000*l.* The arrivals of specie have been below the usual average, reaching only 173,900*l.*, all of which was from New York. The shipments of specie to the East by the last mail amounted to 154,218*l.*, of which 94,674*l.* was in silver, and 59,544*l.* gold. The proportions were—to India, 1,044*l.*; China and the Straits, 94,674*l.*; and Alexandria, 58,500*l.* The silver market remains very quiet. A few unimportant transactions have taken place in bar at 61*d.* to $61\frac{1}{8}$d. Mexican dollars are without change, the nominal price being 61*d.* per oz. There are scarcely any in the market. The vessels at present known to be out from Australia are the J. E. H., with 44,000*l.*, and the Sussex, with 27,000*l.*

LOAN TRANSACTIONS.

A new loan is about to be brought forward on behalf of Moldavia and Wallachia. The amount is to be 1,000,000*l.* The Atlantic and Great Western Railway are seeking to consolidate the whole of their bonds at the rate of 8 per cent. at the price of 90.

AMERICAN SECURITIES.

The intelligence received this week from New York has not had the effect of improving the market for American Government and Railway securities, either as regards the number of transactions or prices. In fact, were not a few of the stocks pressed upon the market for realisation, there would be literally nothing doing in them. The dealers will not touch them on speculation, and very few seem disposed to take them as investments. The only official dealings recorded have been—United States Six per Cents., 1882, at $41\frac{1}{4}$, 41, $40\frac{3}{4}$, 41, and $40\frac{3}{4}$; Virginia State Six per Cents., at $26\frac{1}{2}$; Atlantic and Great Western Railway, New York Section, first mortgage, at $70\frac{1}{2}$; ditto Pennsylvania ditto, 70; Erie, $100 shares, all paid, 41 and $40\frac{1}{2}$; Illinois Central, $100 shares, all paid, $51\frac{3}{4}$, $51\frac{1}{4}$, $51\frac{3}{4}$, $51\frac{1}{2}$, 51, $51\frac{1}{4}$, $50\frac{1}{4}$, and 50.

The following letter gives an account of the operations in American bonds on the Frankfort Bourse during the week ending November 20, 1864:—

To the Editor of The Index.

Frankfort: November 19, 1864.

November 14.—The business in American securities was limited to some transactions for to-morrow's counting-day. The bonds are rather scarce, so that quotations, although declining from $44\frac{1}{8}$ to $43\frac{3}{4}$, afterwards recovered to $43\frac{7}{8}$ to 44, and remained firm at that price. The amount of transactions was scarcely more than $20,000 to $30,000. In the evening no essential variation.

November 15.—American funds opened with a rising tendency owing to the want for cash. The first quotation of $44\frac{1}{4}$, however, was not maintained up to the close, when the price quoted was $44\frac{1}{8}$. Transactions about $40,000. The evening business was unusually animated and stormy. Quotations from New York, Nov. 5, being announced 138, bonds opened at $44\frac{1}{4}$ to $44\frac{5}{8}$. But the later quotation of 151 being known, they declined to $43\frac{3}{4}$, and finally recovered to 44, the closing quotation being said to have been 146. Transactions amounted to at least $50,000.

November 16.—The quotation of American funds was nearly the same as yesterday, business rather slow. For the evening, $44\frac{3}{8}$ to $44\frac{7}{8}$.

November 17.—The publication of the state of siege in the province of Friuli, and the lower quotations of Austrian funds at Vienna and Berlin, gave to our Bourse a general tone of dulness, which influenced likewise American securities. They were sold at $43\frac{11}{16}$ to $43\frac{7}{8}$, but recovered to nearly 44. In the evening no important business.

November 18.—The same trifling variations took place today in American funds, although the tendency of the Bourse was generally more steady in consequence of better news from abroad. Some people entertain gloomy opinions about the next steamer from New York; they expect even riots from the electoral struggle. But the great bulk of speculators prefer to await the arrival of the steamer and to abstain from any operations. This explains the small amount of transactions (which was scarcely more than $20,000 to $30,000 during the last two days), but also the steadiness of prices, the more so as the same firmness is shown by the Bourses of Amsterdam and London. In the evening some few sales were made at $43\frac{7}{8}$.

November 19.—American opened 44 and closed $44\frac{11}{16}$ to $44\frac{1}{8}$. The more the arrival of news about the Presidential election is approaching, the more speculators become cautious in their operations. At the close of the Exchange rumours were going round about a despatch from Paris announcing the election of Lincoln; but, the news not being authentic, and New York quotations still wanting, no operations of any importance took place.

CONFEDERATE COTTON LOAN.

The market has been inactive all the week. The price is slightly lower in the absence of business. We quote 61 to 63 as the closing prices.

HOME AND FOREIGN SECURITIES.

The markets for both English and foreign funds continue to be well supported, under the improved aspect of monetary affairs generally, and the prospect almost immediately of a further reduction in the Bank minimum. To-day, however, there has been rather less animation, as is usually the case on the eve of an expected change, but eventually the markets closed steadily. In foreign stocks there has not been any striking alteration, nothing having occurred connected with foreign politics to create excitement. Consols left off this evening at 91¼ to 91⅜ for money, and 90 to 90⅝ ex div. for the account, which, as contrasted with the quotations of this day week, is a rise of about ½ per cent. Exchequer bills remain very steady at 5s. dis. to par, for both issues. Greek stock shows an advance of ½ per cent., the present price being 23 to 23½. Mexican have advanced ½ per cent., closing at 29¼ to 29½. Spanish Passives, 30⅜ to 30⅝, and the Certificates at 13½ to 13¾, showing a rise of ¼ per cent. in the former and a decline of ¼ in the latter. Turkish Six per Cents. of 1854 are down 1 per cent., and those of 1862 are up ½ per cent., the prices being now 88½ to 89½, and 71¾ to 72¼ respectively.

MEETINGS OF PUBLIC COMPANIES.

An extraordinary meeting of the proprietors of the Langham Hotel Company was held to-day, when it was resolved to increase the capital from 150,000*l.* to 180,000*l.*, by the issue of 3,000 new shares, pro rata, to the present shareholders, bearing a preferential dividend at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum.—The South Eastern of Portugal Railway also had a meeting to-day, when a resolution passed at a previous meeting, adopting new articles of association, was confirmed.—The report of the National Financial Company, preparatory to the meeting to be held on the 30th inst., has been issued, from which it appears that the profits for the half-year ending the 15th inst. amount to 57,578*l.* The directors recommend a dividend at the rate of 20 per cent. per annum, together with a bonus of 1*l.* per share, the latter to be added to the paid-up capital, making in all 6*l.* per share paid up. This will be equal to a distribution of 60 per cent. per annum upon the paid-up capital. The directors have resolved to issue 5,000 new shares, with the same amount paid, viz. 6*l.* per share. These shares in the first instance to be offered to the shareholders on the register on the 21st December, in the proportion of one share for every two then held.

MERCANTILE SUSPENSIONS.

The following suspensions have taken place since our last number:—Messrs. Platzmann, Bery, & Co., commission merchants, of Lyons, liabilities 120,000*l.*; Mr. N. Bery, one of the largest North American commission merchants in Lyons; Mr. L. O. Ruutz-Rees, East India merchant, liabilities 110,000*l.*; Messrs. Matti & Co., connected with Mr. Ruutz-Rees, liabilities, 100,000*l.*; a corresponding house of Runtz-Rees & Co., of Calcutta, is also involved in the stoppage, and an establishment at Berne in Switzerland is believed to be compromised; Messrs. Hasselbrink & Oriot, of Havre; Messrs. J. Lourie & Co., merchants, liabilities, about 30,000*l.* Advices from New York state that Mr. Charles Windsor, for fourteen years one of the principal cashiers of the Mercantile Bank in that city, has absconded, leaving a deficiency in his accounts of nearly 50,000*l.* The bank, after deducting this loss, has a reserve of about 90,000*l.*

MEETINGS OF CREDITORS.

At a meeting of the creditors of Mr. Edward Layard, merchant and banker, of Moorgate Street, the accounts presented showed debts and liabilities amounting to 65,084*l.*, and assets at 65,861*l.*, showing a surplus of 827*l.* It was arranged that the business should proceed without interruption.—At a meeting of the creditors of Messrs. Galbraith, Bigland, & Co., who recently failed in the East India trade, it was shown that the debts were 162,000*l.*, of which 55,957*l.* was expected to rank against the estate. The assets were placed at 17,806*l.* It was arranged that the estate should be wound up under a deed of assignment.—At a meeting of the creditors of Messrs. Manning and Collyer, who recently failed in the jute trade, the unsecured creditors figured for 10,500*l.*, and the assets at 4,500*l.* The secured creditors reach to about 63,000*l.* An adjournment was agreed to for the purpose of obtaining a committee of three creditors to look into the particulars.

PROGRESS OF ENTERPRISE.

The prospectus has just been issued of the Bangparah Tea Estates Company, of Assam, for which a capital is thought to be raised of 200,000*l.*, in 20,000*l.* shares of 10*l.* each. First issue 10,000 shares. The object of the undertaking is the purchase of and further developing fine valuable tea estates in Assam, already in profitable cultivation. The property is situated at distances varying from a quarter of a mile to fifteen miles from Dibrooghur, the shipping port of Upper Assam, and they all adjoin the Grand Trunk Assam Road, having direct steam communication with Calcutta. The estates, according to the prospectus, comprised fully 4,500 acres, of which 500 acres are already planted in tea gardens—125 being of four and five years' growth; 50 of three years'; 225 of one and two years', and 100 just planted. The whole of the lands are held direct from the Government, either in fee simple or redeemable in fee simple by the payment of 5*s.* per acre, or on a perpetual lease from the Government, paying 2*s.* per acre per annum. The bonder has guaranteed to the directors a minimum dividend of 10 per cent. per annum on the paid-up capital for the first three years. The purchase money is fixed at 50,000*l.*, and the bonder defrays all expenses incidental to the formation of the company.

THE COURSE OF THE PRODUCE MARKETS.

In the produce markets a more favourable tendency is being slowly but steadily developed, under the influence of increasing ease in money. The enquiry has in some cases improved perceptibly, and the improvement shows signs of gradually becoming general. Meantime, stocks of produce in first hands have not been materially augmented by fresh arrivals, and supplies, as a consequence, are brought forward upon a moderate scale only. The effect has been to impart a greater degree of firmness to quotations in nearly all cases, and to establish advanced rates in many. The greatest movement has been in cotton, which has risen fully 2*d.* per lb., and in some instances even more. The market has to some extent been affected by accounts from India answering our advices of the late heavy fall here, the Indian markets having suffered much less depression than had been expected. In the grain trade the change is very trifling, increased strength and a little more activity being all that can be reported. The provision markets in general are quiet but steady. American bacon (both long and short middles) sells slowly at late rates. Fine American butters are more in request and fully as dear. In beef and pork but little is passing. The imports of sugar continue in excess of last year's at this time, whilst the deliveries show a falling off. The surplus in stock is therefore increasing, and prices have suffered a further decline of 6*d.* to 1*s.* per cwt. Coffee, on the other hand, is 1*s.* to 1*s.* 6*d.* per cwt. dearer on Ceylon knibs, and to-day the favourable result of the Netherlands Trading Company's sales in Holland has given additional stability to prices. In tea only moderate transactions have taken place without material change in quotations. Rice maintains an improved position, and stiffer rates are demanded. Saltpetre is 1*s.* per cwt. dearer, 32*s.* 6*d.* cash having been paid for fine Bengal. The only change in spices is that Penang pepper is slightly cheaper. Linseed oil is quoted 33*s.* 9*d.* to 34*s.* for ready delivery, which is again rather dearer. Fine sagos taken at 36*s.* 6*d.*, also shows a small advance. Other oils remain without essential change. Tallow maintains an upward tendency, especially for distant periods of delivery, as future supplies are expected to fall short. In metals the variations are not important. Scotch pig iron has ranged from 51*s.* 1½*d.* to 51*s.* 4½*d.* cash, and spelter from 21*l.* 10*s.* to 21*l.* 15*s.* Lead is rather more firmly held, and Straits tin has to-day been sold at 94*l.* cash. Hemp is firm at late quotation. Jute has further risen 10*s.* to 20*s.* per ton. In dye stuffs the principal alteration is an advance of 1*d.* to 2*d.* per lb. for cochineal, the fortnightly sales of which were held to-day. The colonial wool sales, which will offer between 80,000 and 90,000 bales, have been in progress since Thursday last, prices ruling fully 1*d.* per lb. below those of the previous series.

Liverpool, Wednesday, November 23.—Throughout the week cotton has been in active and general demand. A large business has been transacted, both for manufacturing purposes and on speculation. In the early part there was a slight tendency to weakness, with regard to prices, but on the arrival of the news of the reelection of Lincoln as President, there was increased animation, and for nearly all descriptions there was a sudden advance of from 1½*d.* to 2*d.* per lb. for Egyptian and Brazilian descriptions, 1½*d.* per lb. on American and Surats, and at about 1*d.* per lb. on the lower descriptions. Since then the market has remained remarkably steady, and closed the same this evening. The sales this week have reached 97,000 bales, of which 37,000 were on speculation and for export. The total sales this year down to the present period have been 2,395,760 bales, against 2,365,296 in 1863. The importations this year have been 2,002,174 bales, and to the same time last year 1,491,536 bales. There have been taken by the trade this year 1,430,982 bales, and in 1863, 1,993,790 bales. The exports this year have reached 503,139 bales, against 431,122 last year. There have been taken on speculation this year 446,571 bales, and in 1863, 701,103 bales. The estimated stocks at the present time are 355,512 bales, and at the corresponding period last year they were 256,536 bales. The closing quotations are for Americans 26*d.* to 28*d.*; Pernambuco, 27½*d.* to 28¼*d.*; Maceio, 27*d.* to 27½*d.*; Bahia, 27¼*d.* to 27¾*d.*; Egyptian, 16½*d.* to 31*d.*; Smyrna, 15¼*d.* to 20½*d.*; Surat, 12*d.* to 22½*d.*; Bengal, 13½*d.* to 14¼*d.*; Scinde, 13¼*d.* to 14*d.*; China, 16½*d.* to 16¾*d.* Japan, 17½*d.* to 18*d.*; and Peruvian, 27*d*½. to 28*d.*

In consequence of the sudden advance in the price of cotton at Liverpool, business at Manchester within the last day or two has become very much agitated, but sales have been greatly restricted through the high prices demanded by spinners and manufacturers. A great struggle has taken place with a view to obtain upon yarns and cloths an advance corresponding to the rise quoted for Liverpool, and some sales it is stated have been effected in yarns at an advance of 2*d.* to 4*d.* per lb, but it has not been general, buyers refusing, under the circumstances, to accept the terms sought for. But for this a large business would have been done both in shipping and home trade yarns. In the early part of the week a good business was transacted in all descriptions of cloths; but the subsequent high prices asked completely altered the state of the market. Since last week the advance on cloths has been from 1*s.* to 2*s.* 6*d.* per piece. Manufacturers still continue very firm, but buyers appear determined not to follow the rapid advance which has taken place. The closing quotations were:—⅞ Grey Printers, 7*s.* 9*d.* to 15*s.* according to quality; ⅞ Grey Madapollams, 7*s.* to 10*s.*; ⅞ Grey Printers, 9*s.* 9*d.* to 17*s.* 3*d.*; ¼ Grey Shirtings, 11*s.* 6*d.* to 25*s.*; Water Twist, No. 20, 1*s.* 9*d.* to 2*s.* 6*d.*; No. 30, 2*s.* 3*d.* to 2*s.* 10*d.*; No. 40, 2*s.* 10*d.* to 3*s.* 4*d.*; Mule Twist, No. 20, 1*s.* 8*d.* to 2*s.* 4*d.*; No. 30, 1*s.* 11*d.* to 2*s.* 8*d.*; No. 40, 2*s.* to 2*s.* 10*d.*; No. 50, 2*s.* 5*d.* to 3*s.*; No. 60, 2*s.* 8*d.* to 3*s.* 2*d.*; No. 70, 2*s.* 11*d.* to 3*s.* 5*d.*; No. 80, 3*s.* 1*d.* to 3*s.* 7*d.*; No. 90, 3*s.* 3*d.* to 3*s.* 9*d.*; and No. 100, 3*s.* 6*d.* to 4*s.* 1*d.*

THERE are at this time many thousands of Confederate prisoners of war confined in the various forts and camps of the Northern States. A large proportion of them are wounded or sick, and all are in a state of destitution, the accounts of which, as given in private letters and in the newspapers, present a picture of human suffering, which has scarcely a parallel in modern times. The merest necessaries of life are wanting, and frequently the wounded prisoner has no raiment save that which is stark and stiffened with his clotted blood. Horrible as war is in all its features, assuredly it has no greater horrors than the long agony of the poor captive who, when the feverish excitement of the contest is over, is left to the bitter charity of strangers and foes, without one friendly hand to soothe the pains of body or friendly voice to whisper hope and comfort to his despairing mind. These men, cut off from the assistance of their kindred or the protection of their Government, have peculiar claims on the patriotism of their countrymen in Europe, and upon Christian benevolence everywhere. They did not recklessly or from choice embrace the profession of arms, but in exchanging the comforts, and often the luxuries, of home for the toils and hardships of a soldier's life, they obeyed a stern sense of duty and the call of their country in its extremest need. An unusual proportion, also, of those that fill the ranks of the Confederate armies belong to the higher walks of life, upon whom privations, such as are endured by prisoners in the hands of the North, fall with increased severity.

The Southern Prisoners' Relief Fund is intended to mitigate some of these sufferings which cannot altogether be relieved. Within little more than a twelvemonth, nearly £3,000 have been collected and expended in relief. The managers of the Fund are assisted in their efforts by self-devoted ladies in the principal Northern cities, who visit the sufferers and give them such aid as the means at their disposal render possible. Of late the Federal Government has granted permission that this Samaritan work may be done openly. It is earnestly hoped that all Southerners residing in Europe will support the Fund to the extent of their ability, and its objects may recommend themselves to all, irrespective of country or political convictions, who sympathise with the sufferings of their fellow-men.

Contributions will be received by J. H. ASHBRIDGE, Treasurer, Walmer Buildings, Water Street, Liverpool; or in London, by HENRY HOTZE, Esq., 17 Savile Row, W.; in Paris, by H. O. BREWER, Esq., 6 Rue Circulaire; and DANIEL HUBBARD, Esq., 24 Rue Lord Byron.

Earl Russell's Note.

LORD RUSSELL'S reply to the Confederate Commissioners, acknowledging the receipt of an official copy of the Manifesto put forth by the Congress of the Confederate States, takes us, we confess, somewhat by surprise. It is true that for a short time past a vague rumour has been afloat in diplomatic circles on the Continent, and has even found expression in the Paris correspondence of the Indépendance Belge and other journals not prone to credit too easily anything favourable to the South. This rumour was to the effect that the American policy of the Foreign Office was undergoing essential modifications, and that, while England would not take the initiative, an opportunity would be welcomed for joining France in any steps in which the latter assumed the chief responsibility. We did not, and do not now, attach any real importance to such diplomatic chitchat, and yet Lord RUSSELL'S note surprises us. Not that, intrinsically, it contains anything more than what belongs to the formula of international civility, but because it is prompt, courteous, and—though it repeats that jargon about strict and impartial neutrality which, in the FOREIGN SECRETARY'S mouth, has often sounded ironical—it practically recognises the political equality and identical title to consideration of the two belligerent federations. This is, on Earl RUSSELL'S part, an immense step in the right direction. It would be churlish in us to grudge him credit for it. But if he intends to be consistent, and if he once admits that the same measure must by right be meted to both the South and the North, we cannot see how, under present circumstances, he is to stop short of actual recognition. We will not repeat arguments which frequent reiteration has rendered hackneyed; we will only observe that after the 4th day of March next, the last pretext for further delay will have disappeared. On that day a government will go into operation at Washington, in which the States of the South have confessedly neither lot nor part nor voice. In the election of the 8th of last month, the vote of every State not actually in the Union or in the occupation of the Union armies, was by an act of the Federal Congress formally excluded. The highest legislative authority of the United States on that occasion decreed that the States of Virginia, North and South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, Florida, Louisiana, Arkansas, and Texas were not among the number of the United States. The Government organised upon the basis of the election of the 8th inst. knows them only as foreign enemies, to be conquered by force. So long as a Federal Executive and Legislature at Washington claimed to represent all the States which formed part of the Union in 1860, and could date their existence back to a period when all the States did so form part, there might be an excuse—albeit an unsound and sophistical one—for foreign Powers to consider that Executive and Legislature as the rightful authority over all the States. The Executive and Legislature which commence their term of authority on March 4 cannot, and do not, set up any such pretension. This new Government at Washington presents to Europe no title which is not vested with even greater validity in the Government at Richmond, which is by three years its senior. The only possible technical conflict of jurisdiction is narrowed down to three States, Tennessee, Kentucky, and Missouri, which are equally claimed by both Governments. With this exception, which cannot cause any serious difficulty, the diplomacy of neutrals is now as free to act as if the United States and the Confederate States were situated in different continents.

The Message of President Davis.

THE attention which the Annual Message of President DAVIS has arrested in this country and on the Continent constitutes the most ample proof of the importance of that document. Through the mouth of the man whose impenetrable calm stands out with enhanced grandeur against the raging fury of her implacable foes, the South speaks to the world with a voice that does not pass unregarded. Not merely does the supreme moment of the agony of two great nations lend significance to her language, but wisdom and dignity combine to add force to this manifesto of the present condition and future policy of the Confederate States.

The PRESIDENT first treats of the subject uppermost in the minds of his own people—the war with the North; and in expounding the situation of affairs he seems to take his stand on the western extremity of the broad dominions of the South, and to survey each State in its turn as his eye is gradually drawn towards the coast of the Atlantic ocean. Insensibly he reveals the war policy which marks the genius of the military chiefs of the South. To sweep the foe from Texas and Arkansas, a task already accomplished; then to drive him from Louisiana, where indeed he only crouches under cover of his gunboats; next to clear the States of Mississippi and Missouri, and the southern borders of Kentucky; gradually to emancipate from the Northern soldiery the north line of Alabama with Western and Eastern Tennessee, until it remains only to drive the foe from the outlying fortress, Virginia—such is the programme now rapidly in course of accomplishment by the valour of the Southern arms. The anaconda efforts have confessedly been defeated, and the Western States are left undisturbed in the development of their wealth in corn, cattle, and cotton—in the tranquil organisation of the State authorities—in the formation of an invincible reserve of men, of supplies, and of territory. Nothing then remains for the North but to make war on the arena which its enemies have chosen for the campaign—to fight with two isolated armies at two isolated points—with the knowledge that success reaching even to the capture of the seat of government, cannot strike the fatal blow. Atlanta has fallen, and the victory has been worse than barren. Richmond may fall, but the drain of blood and of money will still endure, to convince the world that peace is unattainable for the North through the process of conquest.

The PRESIDENT next turns to the foreign relations of the Confederacy. He refuses to believe that the conduct of the Christian nations of Europe is prompted by a design to prolong hostilities, and he is charitable enough to admit the plea of indifference. Yet the position assumed by him is incontrovertible. No precedent can be found in history either of the failure of neutrals to recognise the independence of a nation which has proved its capacity for self-defence, or of a recognition on the part of a belligerent in anticipation of the act of neutral Powers. The Governments of England and France have acknowledged the capacity of the South to resist the aggression of the North. Why, then, has recognition been withheld? Two excuses are given—the first, that intervention must accompany recognition; the second, that the passions of the North would be increased by such a change of policy. Mr. DAVIS absolutely rejects intervention, and the carnage of two years has demonstrated that the fury of the North has never admitted of increase. Peace is impossible without independence, and the enemy will not anticipate neutrals in a recognition of independence. It follows by logical sequence that the responsibility of the prolongation of the war must eventually rest on the shoulders of the neutral nations of Europe.

The financial position and the War Department complete the region of survey. Elsewhere we have commented on the condition of the currency and the proposed systems of taxation. To increase the efficiency of the armies it is proposed to reduce the number of men detailed for professions and trades by abolishing the exemption of entire classes and substituting the discretion of the military authorities. A general militia law is proposed in lieu of the diversified organisations of the separate States, while reforms are suggested for increasing the efficiency of the cavalry and for the consolidation of the infantry regiments. The important question, at least in European eyes, in this department is that of arming the slaves in defence of the country, and nothing more thoroughly demonstrates the confidence of the PRESIDENT in the power of the South to resist aggression than his expression of the opinion that it is not necessary to arm the negro. He candidly confesses that if the alternative of subjugation or arming the slaves were presented, he would not for a moment hesitate in his decision. That the negroes should fight as soldiers for their home is justifiable, when necessary. To employ them as insurrectionists against their masters is an act which has hitherto earned the just execration of the civilised world. Indeed, it was the climax of the grievances of the colonists in 1776 that the English had armed the slaves against their masters. But the PRESIDENT is appalled at the demoralisation, suffering, disease, and death caused by a substitution of the Northern policy for the kind relation existing between master and slave; and, while pointing to the evil produced by external interference, he with a noble humanity shrinks from even the risk of a similar crime. He believes the duty of the South to consist not only in the maintenance of republican institutions resting on the actual political equality of all her citizens, but also in the fulfilment of the task so happily begun, that of Christianizing and improving the condition of the Africans whom God has committed to her charge.

The Message concludes with a renewed expression of willingness to negotiate for peace whenever the enemy shall display a disposition to resort to such a solution. At present the Federal authorities offer no terms short of unconditional submission and degradation, and nothing therefore remains but to devote the united energies of the South to the task of dispelling the illusion of the ability of the North to effect her subjugation. The PRESIDENT therefore exhorts the people to tread that path to peace with full confidence in the assured result. If anything were wanting to inspire in the South a well-founded trust in the valour of her arms and the justice of her cause, that want would be supplied by language which breathes in every syllable the strength of a calm and invincible faith.

Notes on Events of the Week.

AMERICA.

WHERE is General Sherman? Perhaps the Federal Government knows, but deems it inconvenient to inform the public. Northern journalists do not know where Sherman is, and therefore resort to their favourite pastime of guessing. Two things are certain. Sherman cannot be in half-a-dozen places, or marching in half-a-dozen different directions, at the same time. 'It is also past doubt that the Lincolnites are rather anxious and uneasy about the fate of Sherman. That Atlanta has been evacuated is reported from so many quarters that the truth of the report is very probable. Not many weeks have elapsed since Sherman drove all the inhabitants from their homes and from the city on the ground that the place was required as a military station; therefore, if Atlanta is evacuated, either Sherman invented an excuse for an act of barbarism, or he intended to hold Atlanta, and has been forced by the movements of the Confederates to give up possession.

THERE are no movements of importance reported in Virginia. A Federal report says that the Confederates were repulsed in an attempt to pierce Grant's line, from which we may conclude that the Confederates are acting on the offensive. According to the latest advices Sheridan was in 'hot pursuit' of Early, and we may therefore expect to hear in a mail or so that the Federal commander has sustained a reverse. Pennsylvania is alarmed at the increase of 'guerillas,' who cross and recross the Potomac at their pleasure. This shows that Mr. Lincoln is fully justified in saying that he wants more troops.

GENERAL BRECKINRIDGE has achieved an important success in Tennessee. He defeated General Gillem, and captured Bull's Gap with 400 prisoners, six cannon, and some Federal trains. In Louisiana the Confederates have captured Morganzia with its garrison of 1,900 men. General Canby was killed on board the steamer Cricket whilst reconnoitring White River, Arkansas.

THE Federals announce a victory over 3,000 cattle. According to the telegram, 3,000 cattle crossed the Black River, and the Federals 'attacked the guards, captured a third of the cattle, and dispersed the remainder.' This is nearly as funny as one of Mr. Lincoln's jokes.

ADMIRAL PORTER has addressed to the Federal Secretary of the Navy a report of the capture of 'the batteries and town of Plymouth, North Carolina.' As we stated last week, Plymouth is a small place that had been evacuated by the Confederates. Admiral Porter says he took '22 cannon, 37 prisoners, and 200 stand of arms, and more are being picked up daily.' Admiral Porter calls the capture of 37 men 'a handsome finishing stroke,' and that 'this was a very gallant affair, and reflects great credit on the commander of the expedition and all concerned.'

THE official report of the Confederate attack on Johnsonville shows that the victory was complete and important. General Forrest captured and destroyed 14 transports, 4 gunboats, 20 barges, 32 pieces of artillery, over 20,000 tons of freight, and more than $3,000,000 worth of stores.

THE Confederate steamer Tallahassee had safely arrived, at our latest advices, in Wilmington, after a long and exciting chase by the Montgomery and three other Yankee gunboats. The New York Herald contains an account of the pursuit, which would certainly have ended in the capture or sinking of the Tallahassee, according to the Herald's correspondent, but for the inopportune darkness of night enabling her to escape. The Yankees, having only four ships against one, and a still greater disproportion of guns in their favour, were greatly elated at the prospect of an engagement; and as the vessels were near enough together at one time to keep up a rapid exchange of shots, the excitement on the decks of the chasing squadron was lively. 'Many heartfelt remarks were made,' says the writer, 'worthy of our bravest and noblest men!' And when the Tallahassee was at last sheltered by the night from further attack, 'the feelings' of the disappointed Yankees 'found relief in tears.' Affecting recital! The Tallahassee will, no doubt, soon be again upon the ocean, when the blockading fleet will have another opportunity of attempting her destruction.

BERMUDA papers of October 12 contain accounts of the proceedings in the case of Acting-Master John C. Brain, C. S. N., who was arrested at St. George's and committed to gaol with his associates, on the charge of burning the Federal steamer Roanoke off the harbour on Sunday, the 2nd of October. Upon the examination it was sufficiently proved that Lieutenant Brain had acted in accordance with instructions from the Secretary of the Navy of the Confederate States, and he and his companions were discharged. The release of these gentlemen did not, however, repair the outrage of their confinement for three days in a colonial prison by British authorities for an offence which 'was in the habit of being committed,' as the Bermuda Advocate remarks, 'in old days by Nelson, and Collingwood, and Hood, and Howe, and other officers whose names have, somehow or other, come to be handed down to us with some sort of historic fame.'

WE elsewhere publish a letter about the case of the Confederates who made an incursion into St. Alban's. The prosecution of Lieutenant Young has been brought to a close at Montreal, and the Lieutenant has been allowed thirty days to communicate with the Government at Richmond before offering his defence.

THE Second Congress of the Confederate States commenced its second session in the Capitol at Richmond on Monday, the 7th of November. We have already given to our readers the message of the President and the accompanying documents. On the 9th Mr. Henry, of Tennessee, introduced a resolution in the Senate, having reference to the impressment of negro slaves, with just compensation to their masters, for purposes of public necessity other than service as soldiers in the field. In the House of Representatives, on the same day, a discussion arose on a resolution of Mr. Foote of Tennessee with reference to the exemption of editors of newspapers from the military service, in which Mr. Foote gave utterance to some characteristic remarks about the 'liberty of the press' as being endangered, &c.; and his resolution, which disapproved the position of President Davis on this subject, was referred to the Military Committee. Mr. Russell, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill granting seats in the House of Representatives, with the privilege of debate, to the members of the Cabinet, which was made the order of the day for Tuesday, November 15; and Mr. Foote gave notice that he would offer an amendment to the bill, making it obligatory on the members of the Cabinet to resign when defeated upon any important measure of policy.

THE Macon Confederate of November 5 publishes in full the message of Governor Joseph E. Brown, of Georgia, to the two houses of the Georgia Legislature convened at Milledgeville, the capital of that State. The general tone of the message is patriotic, and Governor Brown expresses in unmistakable language the determination of the people of Georgia never to relinquish the cause of Southern independence, for which they took up arms at the beginning of the war. By far the larger portion of the document, however, is taken up with an elaborate argument to show that negotiations for peace can be properly conducted only in convention of all the States, and he earnestly recommends overtures to be made to the States of the North for the assembling of such a body. He denies, however, the right of any individual State of the Confederacy to make peace with the common enemy. Referring to the resolutions of the Governors of the Southern States, which he submits to the Georgia Legislature, he declines to recommend arming the slaves, but thinks they may be usefully employed as teamsters, hospital servants, &c. Taken altogether, Governor Brown's message by no means bears the construction which has been placed upon it of declaring the people of Georgia disaffected towards the Confederate Government, and his remarks concerning the growth of executive power are not likely to excite serious alarm.

THE Convention which was held in New Orleans last spring, under Yankee authority, for the adoption of a new Constitution for the State of Louisiana, seems to have been a very bibulous assembly, given to riding immoderately in cabs, and smoking to excess the best Havannas. A 'nice little bill' has recently been published in the New Orleans Times, presenting a variety of curious items which go to show that liquors and cigars entered largely into the formation of the Constitution. It would appear, too, that committees must have been constantly driving about the streets of New Orleans, discussing doubtful points of organic law while in rapid locomotion. The charges for 'liquors and cigars' amounted to $9,421·55 against $4,304·25 for carriage hire. The stationery furnished cost $8,111·55, and copies of the daily papers furnished to members were set down at $4,237·50. The Convention must have been somewhat uproarious at times, since the fees of policemen necessary to maintain order reached the sum of $1,904·00, but after the liquor item this does not surprise us. A pen-case for General Banks is charged at $150. We suppose this case held the pen which signed the Constitution and crowned the work of the patriotic members of the body.

BUTLER has taken an affectionate leave of New York in an order in which he thanks everybody for loyalty to Lincoln and kindness to himself. His speech at the Fifth Avenue Hotel we republish and comment on elsewhere. Butler was evidently far from comfortable in New York. It is certainly not pleasant to feel it necessary to keep a brace of loaded pistols in one's desk. We do not apprehend that Butler's life was in any danger in New York, but conscience makes a miserable coward of such a thing as Benjamin F. Butler.

THE report that Mr. Lincoln is about to ask the Confederates to lay down their arms caused a fall of gold in New York. We suppose that there must still be men in the North who do not yet understand the character of the contest. The answer to the offer of amnesty may teach them a useful lesson.

AN important decree has just been entered by Judge Shipman, of New York, in the United States District Court, by which one Hamilton E. Towle recovers $15,000 salvage from the owners of the Great Eastern steamship. Towle was a passenger in the Great Eastern, on a voyage to America, when a storm arose in which the rudder-shaft was broken, and the vessel became unmanageable. After the officers had vainly endeavoured for the space of thirty-six hours to repair the disaster, he volunteered his services, and devised means for bringing the ship safely into port. Against the demand of Towle for salvage it was urged that an established rule of the Admiralty disqualified a passenger for claiming remuneration for services rendered a vessel in distress. Judge Shipman held that this rule had reference only to ordinary exertions which any passenger might be called upon to perform, such as working at the pumps, or pulling and hauling sail, but that it did not apply to the case of one who by the exhibition of remarkable skill had saved the vessel from impending wreck. The New York Times, in recording Judge Shipman's decree, with characteristic complacency remarks that the fact of an American's having saved the Great Eastern 'was felt to be something of a national advantage over John Bull.'

THE price of gold in New York has varied considerably during the past week. Mr. Fessenden has been operating largely, but though he can send gold down he cannot keep it down. On November 19, it was quoted at 221.

ENGLAND.

MR. RICHARD COBDEN, M.P. for Rochdale, addressed his constituents on November 23. He commenced with an elaborate dissertation on the policy of non-intervention, taking the Slesvig-Holstein question for his theme. He complained bitterly that the House of Commons had consumed a large portion, and the House of Lords nearly the whole, of the session in debates on the Danish war. He attacked Lord Ellenborough furiously because the noble Lord had affirmed that Court influences had been called in to aid the interests of Germany. He also called the same noble Lord the foremost advocate of the Crimean war, the great supporter of fortifications and of all other abominations. He admitted that in France and Germany England had been derided and caricatured for her pusillanimity, but argued that the doctrine of non-intervention had achieved a triumph. Not only was it the duty of the Government and Parliament to observe this rule, but Englishmen, through their public speakers and through their press, must learn to treat foreign nations in a spirit other than they hitherto have shown, so as not to mislead foreign countries by public demonstrations of opinion. That was the policy which he and his friend Mr. Bright had followed. They had never raised their voices in favour of Poland or Hungary. He had no hesitation in declaring that the manifestations and instigations of London and Paris had incapacitated the Polish insurrection; for Russia had gained strength by an appeal to her people to resist the dictation of the Western Powers. Mr. Cobden had no doubt that he could be Prime Minister if he would only tell the English people that they were the wisest, the best, and the happiest in the whole world. Mr. Cobden then proceeded to speak on the American war. When he saw a people setting up a government founded on pure reason, without religious establishments to guide it, with no born rank of any kind, but with every honour springing from the people, he saw a programme built upon an elevated conception of what humanity was capable. It might fail, but he (Mr. Cobden), who always consulted the interests of the masses, could not be asked to exult if it did fail. The same strait might occur to England to-morrow from the defection of India or Ireland. Was it then conservative to jump up immediately into a kind of partnership with the Southern insurrection? In former disruptions the parties had always issued to the world a programme of their grievances. Cromwell did so. When James II. was dethroned, there was a declaration of rights. In 1776 the Americans put forth a declaration of grievances, and no Englishman now doubted that they were justified in separating from the mother country. Why had not the South put forth any programme? No one was more competent to write such a programme than Mr. Jefferson Davis. It was because the South had but the grievance—that they wanted to consolidate, perpetuate, and extend slavery, but they could not do it. All that the leaders said was, 'Let us alone; all we want is to be let alone.' That was the reason why the conservative Governments of Europe and so large a portion of the upper classes in England had consented to back the insurrection. How would they feel if Essex and Kent, having been beaten on the subject of the Corn Laws, had chosen to set up Kent and Essex and East Anglia right across the Thames, as the Secessionists had sought to attempt to cut off Louisiana from the mouth of the Mississippi, and if they had said, 'We want to be left alone?' Could any Government be carried on if a section of the people, when they were beaten at the poll at a peaceful election, were allowed to secede? Where was the conservative spirit among the governing class of this country? After all there was more conservatism among the Democracy. The contest of the Presidential election was the issue between war with the extirpation of slavery and war without the extirpation of slavery. The people had preferred to act in the interests of humanity. They had preferred the continuance of war to the continuance of slavery. Let there be no more of the late talk that this was not a war to put down slavery. Everybody now admitted that, whatever was the end of the struggle, slavery would be abolished. He now came to confirm with more emphasis than ever his opinion that he should not live to see two independent States on that continent of North America. He looked upon the geographical difficulties in the way of separation as absolutely insurmountable.

Take (said he) the case of the Mississippi. That river with its tributaries flows through 20,000 miles of navigable waters into the Gulf of Mexico, and in order that the United States might have its mouths in their own occupation, that they might have, as it were, the keys of their own doors in their own pockets, they purchased from the First Napoleon the State of Louisiana with the money of the old Union for three millions sterling. Well, now, some 200,000 or 300,000 people could have squatted there. Some English, some French, and some Americans have taken into their heads that they will carry off this State, and place the mouths of that great river, the outlet of that vast country, in the hands of a foreign State. I have said that it would be far easier for Essex or Kent to carry off the mouths of the Thames and set up an East Anglian kingdom than for Louisiana to carry off the mouths of the Mississippi and set up for an independent State. There are some few hundreds of thousands in the counties of Kent and Essex, but the valley of the Mississippi will become the home of 200,000,000, and this makes it infinitely more impossible that the United States should allow the mouths of the Mississippi to be carried off than that England should suffer the mouth of the Thames to be taken away. Why should they do so when they can prevent it by the smallest expense, and retain possession of it, for a few gunboats could easily blockade the outlets of that river? Even if the North cannot conquer Louisiana, they might cut the dykes above New Orleans and drown the whole of that State. In saying this I am speaking of the motives and possibilities, and not of wishes or feelings of my own. If you think that Mr. Jefferson Davis would be contented with the Cotton States and not be allowed to extend into Texas, he would not thank you. They are fighting in the South to carry slavery beyond Texas into the vast regions of Central America. Now, I say that if the geographical features of the country had been looked at by the ruling classes and those who write in the newspapers, they would not have arrived at a conviction of the success of the Southern side.

Mr. Cobden then proceeded to say that if he were rich he would found a chair at Oxford and Cambridge to instruct the undergraduates in American history. He was convinced that not one undergraduate at either University could put his finger on the town of Chicago. They might know all about the Ilissus, but they knew nothing about the Mississippi. However, in the American question he wanted nothing but neutrality. Mr. Cobden then turned to the question of English finance. People exclaimed about the American expenditure. The North was spending perhaps more than $2,000,000 a day; but having regard to the depreciation of American currency, and the present rate of exchange, it was very near the amount drawn by Mr. Gladstone from this country in time of peace. Why had the American States laughed to scorn the financier who prophesied that they could not wage war for six months without a foreign loan? Because in peace they had not had a war expenditure. The savings made in peace had enabled them to spend largely in war.

MR. RICHARD SPOONER, M.P. for North Warwickshire, died last week at the age of eighty-one years. He was educated at Rugby School, and entered Parliament as member for Birmingham in 1844. In 1847 he lost his seat to Mr. Scholefield, and was at once elected member for North Warwickshire. He was best known as the champion in the House of Commons of the Protestant cause, and as the persistent enemy of the grant to Maynooth College.

THE sarcophagus which is to be placed in the Mausoleum at Frogmore to contain the remains of the Prince Consort has arrived at Windsor. It is of dark polished Scotch granite from Aberdeen, and weighs thirteen tons. The recumbent statue of the Prince, which is to be the work of Baron Marochetti, will be placed on the top of the sarcophagus.

MR. DAVID ROBERTS, R.A., whose genius for architectural paintings has earned for him a high reputation, fell dead in a fit of apoplexy in Berners Street in this city on Friday last.

THE ship Great Western was passed by the Customs authorities on Friday last, and proceeded to sea. It is affirmed that Messrs. Baring Brothers have lodged a heavy claim against Her Majesty's Government for the detention of the vessel.

THE Judicial Committee of the Privy Council will hear the Colenso case on December 12.

A GENTLEMAN, who was but a few months since called to the Bar by the Society of the Inner Temple, has unintentionally raised a question of some gravity which yet awaits solution at the hands of the Benchers of the Inn. It appears that the present member of the Utter Bar was formerly, and, as may be contended, is now, a priest in the holy orders of the Church of England. It is argued, therefore, that his 'call' to the Bar was invalid, on the ground that the orders preclude the priest from entering that branch of the legal profession. A resolution of the four Inns of Court against the admission not only of priests, but even of deacons, to the degree of barrister of law, was passed in the time of Horne Tooke, but there is no precedent of the prohibition being put in force. It is pretty certain that, during the interval which has elapsed since the decision in Horne's Tooke's case, clergymen have been called to the bar, and probably great difficulties would be experienced in enforcing the existing regulation.

THE case of Glover v. Persigny came on before the Lord Chief Justice Cockburn and a special jury at Westminster on Saturday last. The action was against M. le Duc Fialin de Persigny and M. Billault, but it had abated as against the latter defendant by his death. Mr. Sergeant Glover was the plaintiff, and sought to recover a large sum of money due to him as the proprietor of the Morning Chronicle, the Morning News, and the Evening Journal, for compensation money for the loss suffered by the insertion of certain articles in those papers, which loss the defendant had agreed to make good. There was also a money demand for work and labour done. It appeared that in 1856 the Duc de Persigny had entered into an agreement with the plaintiff, M. St. André and M. Billault being parties thereto, to pay the plaintiff a sum of 700*l.* or 800*l.* per month in consideration of the insertion of articles to be supplied by the French Government, with a proviso to make good any depreciation suffered by the Chronicle in consequence of such insertions. Many articles of the proposed nature were published during the ensuing two years. In April, 1857, Mr. Glover went to Paris and had interviews with the Emperor, with M. Billault and M. Meygret, Director-General of the Press, and in return for his services obtained a concession of the International Telegraph between Bordeaux and Boston. The company, however, was not established. On May 9, 1859, a letter was addressed to M. Billault by the plaintiff, acknowledging the delight experienced by him that the articles had given satisfaction, that he did not expect nor claim the slightest pecuniary recompense for anything that had appeared in the Morning Chronicle, and that the telegraphic concession would be considered a complete requital. Unfortunately, at the trial, Mr. Serjeant Parry, the counsel for the plaintiff, had been furnished with a copy of the above letter, omitting, however, the very important paragraph concerning the abandonment of any claim for the services rendered. Of course, when it was sought to put in the letter as evidence, the discrepancy was discovered. The case, however, proceeded, until the plaintiff had had an opportunity of distinguishing himself in the witness-box by some peculiarities of conduct, when it was finally agreed to withdraw a juror.

IRELAND.

The Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland was entertained by the Lord Mayor of Dublin at the Mansion House on Friday last. In responding to the toast of the Viceroy, his Lordship spoke at some length on the condition of Ireland. He said that he had served on the Irish Committee in 1847, and had not forgotten the evidence given by Father Mathew on the deplorable condition of the country. Ireland had recovered with astonishing elasticity from her terrible calamity. The country had experienced three bad harvests within the last five years, and the only marvel was that greater distress did not prevail. The advance of an agricultural country was necessarily slow, but his Lordship was rejoiced to see the progress made in the breeding of cattle, the draining of the land, and, above all, in the cultivation of flax. The other great branch of industry was the fisheries, and while England had stood idle and let her fisheries be annihilated, Ireland had saved her wealth by prudent legislation. Then, again, railways had been constructed in the country, at a cost of 24,000,000*l.*, and the capital was supplied mainly by Irishmen. With regard to the linen manufactures, there had been an increase of from 3,200 to 7,500 power-looms in Belfast, and the basis on which the industry was established was so firm that it would stand the shock of peace on the American continent. Then, again, there were seen in the exhibition of the Dublin Society the most ingenious machines for the manufacture of flax, and that machinery was constructed in Belfast. His Lordship admitted that there was a reverse side to the picture, and desired the wand of Prospero wherewith to banish misery, poverty, and wretchedness from the country. He trusted in the industry and enterprise of Ireland and in the commercial freedom of the United Kingdom to effect rapid progress in the prosperity of Ireland, an object which he knew was dear to the present generation of Englishmen.

THE CONTINENT.

FRANCE.

Two events have occurred during the past week in Paris which not only demand the attention of the contemporary chronicler, but will probably form a part of the general history of the country, and are not the less important that they are not strikingly sensational. The first of these is the appeal of the 'Thirteen' to the Imperial Court of Paris against a sentence of the Lower Court convicting them of having formed an illegal association of more than twenty persons. An account of the trial will be found in our number of August 11, in the present year. No recapitulation of the facts is required, as all the more important circumstances are brought out in the course of the trial. The 'Thirteen' were defended on this occasion, as before, by MM. Berryer, Jules Favre, Marie, Greoz, Senard, and other celebrities of the French bar. Procureur-Général de Marnas and Avocat-Général Sallé attended on behalf of the Government. The judgment appealed against is in substance as follows: 'Considering that the named thirty-four persons are accused of having formed part of an unauthorised association of more than twenty persons, and seeing that of these thirty-four persons there are twenty-one against whom there is no case; but considering that there exists against Garnier-Pagès, Carnot, Dréo, Hérold, Clamageran, Floquet, Ferry, Durier, Corbon, Jozon, Hérisson, Melsheim, and Bory sufficient proof of having in 1863 and 1864 belonged to an association composed of more than twenty persons, judgment is pronounced against them.' This report having been read to the Court of Appeal, M. Senard stated the pleas for quashing the said judgment. They are, that the appellants were found guilty without proper examination; that the names of the twenty-one acquitted were only added in order to make up the number to one above that of twenty, and thus to bring the appellants within the operation of the law; and further, with respect to those who were acquitted under the former judgment, that they have a right to protest before a superior court against the action of the prosecution, which qualified them as members of an illegal association, and to demand that their names should be erased from the judgment. In support of these pleas M. Senard urged that, in spite of the acquittal of a certain number, the conviction of the remainder affirmed the complicity of these very persons, or at least their connivance with the defendants. This is of course evident, for if thirteen persons are guilty of forming part of an illegal association of more than twenty, there must be at least eight more who are equally guilty. But, in fact, none of those nominally acquitted were ever put on their trial, and they were now fully justified in requiring that the judgment should be pronounced null and void. M. Sallé, for the Government, expressed a hope that the judgment below would not be reversed on what he considered to be a mere point of law. He maintained the right of the Government to indict whom it chose, and denied the right of the parties already acquitted to compel the public prosecutor to include them in the proceedings. M. Crémieux replied, and again pointed out that, by the withdrawal of the names of the acquitted, there was not a sufficient number left to support the conviction. He warned the court against the principle which it was sought to introduce, of judging persons without first hearing them. Also, on the general circumstances of the case, he argued that the association formed was not illegal; that, had it been so, he and his brother lawyers would not have been so blind as to have belonged to it. The court decided that the issue raised with regard to the persons acquitted in the judgment below should be joined with the principal issue, and the final decision be pronounced upon the two together. The appellants were then interrogated by the court. M. Garnier-Pagès complained that he was under the shameful necessity of appearing to defend himself for having done what he was perfectly entitled to do. The President said the prosecution was under the impression that the election committee, the formation of which was the ground of indictment, was not started for mere purposes of consultation, but itself constituted a most energetic course of action. In the correspondence discovered, the term 'partisans of action' was applied to its members. M. Garnier-Pagès claimed the right of action in such case, and challenged the prosecution to prove from the correspondence that any matter besides election affairs was discussed by the committee. It was true, he had himself travelled about the departments, and had found the populations bowed down by oppression—a remark for which he was rebuked by the President. Another of the defendants, M. Floquet, was next examined. This gentleman was unfortunate enough to state, with a smile on his face, that the collection of subscriptions was an occurrence with which he could not burden his memory; and, on the request of the court that he would be serious, replied that he really could not speak seriously in a case which had nothing serious in it, but that he could and did protest emphatically against the brutal manner in which the police had ransacked his house. The court then adjourned till Wednesday (yesterday). It is, of course, impossible to comment upon this trial until the final judgment has been pronounced; but it may be remarked that a needless difficulty has been raised, and one which is especially surprising among so logical and clear-headed a people as the French, by the confusion of two separate and distinct ideas—the illegality of the formation of a certain aggregate body, and the criminality of the individuals composing it. In England the so-called cumbrousness of our judicial proceedings would have entirely prevented any such confusion: supposing a law to be enacted by which the combination of ten persons, at least, should be necessary to support an indictment for conspiracy, and supposing ten persons to be indicted accordingly, against one of whom there should be no case, the charge of conspiracy would break down, as against the remaining nine charged under the same indictment. The English world looks with anxiety to see whether the conclusion of this trial will clear up the confusion pointed out above, and whether the final judgment of the supreme court will vindicate the claims of French justice to the proud position which it arrogates, and which, so far as it is represented in the French bar, were so cordially recognised lately by us in the person of M. Berryer.

The careful historian will take notice hereafter of a correspondence which has taken place between the Duc de Persigny and M. Emile de Girardin. The correspondence, which is in itself of little importance, will be of great value as a straw which has floated up to the surface of the stream from the undercurrent of French opinion, and, like the fly in the amber, makes the uninitiated spectators wonder 'how the deuce it got there.' The correspondence arose upon certain passages in a work sent by M. de Girardin to the Duke, advocating the complete freedom of the press. The Duke writes in answer:—

> The original idea which you set forth with so much talent is worthy to be taken most seriously into consideration, and I think it must ultimately prevail. But it is not enough to be in the right—it is requisite that you should be backed by public opinion. I think that, like many eminent minds who see too far and go too far for their own times, you are ahead of public opinion. You say somewhere that witches ceased to be dangerous when people ceased to burn them. That is true; but then people no longer believe in witches, and they still believe in newspapers. You endeavour to make out that the press has no influence, and that is true so far as the discussion of opinions goes; but there are many people who dread the scandals that the press may produce, and the passions which may be aroused in consequence. Moreover, I could not understand passing without transition from the present state of things to that which you propose. Assuredly the day when the press may enjoy the same liberty as it does in England, where its freedom is useful to all and injurious to none—that day shall witness the end of our revolutions, and the crowning of the edifice; but, whatever boldness I may feel in my own mind, I do not think public opinion sufficiently prepared to accept a régime which beforehand would inspire so many interests with anxiety. On that point I differ from you, but I confess that that question of the press preoccupies me much, and that I should feel but little inclined at present (aujourd'hui) to maintain the present régime without important modifications.

M. de Girardin, in his reply, accepts the concessions which the Duke is inclined to make, and proceeds to demonstrate that, to be logical, he must proceed to the complete emancipation of the press. He reasserts his original position, that the political importance of the press depends entirely upon the notice which the Government chooses to take of it. If the Government let it entirely alone, and proceeded its own way, the nation would cease to take a morbid interest in the political discussions of the newspapers. Both these letters have been published in La Presse, M. de Girardin's own journal, and have excited the greatest curiosity. That M. de Persigny should have made such admissions was a matter of gratification to the quiet and patriotic citizens who are desirous of seeing a true system of liberty organised under the present Government, so that the freedom of the nation should be secured without detriment to the strength of the executive. They accepted the Duke as a representative of the Imperialist party, and hailed his modified adhesion to their views as a step towards the realisation of their hopes. But a cold November frost was destined to blight the fair blossoms of their expectations; the Constitutionnel published a semi-official statement that the Emperor had written to M. de Persigny, expressing his regret that he should have expressed himself in such terms with regard to the freedom of the press in his letter to M. de Girardin. The latter gentleman, in noticing this statement, informs his readers that no such rebuke would have been called for had the whole letter been published, as it rather advocated leniency in the application of the laws than a radical change in their spirit.

A singular event has occurred in the Gallican Church. Two new bishops, having been nominated to the sees of Châlons and Perpignan respectively by the Emperor, applied accordingly to the Pope for the bull of consecration. The bishop elect of Châlons obtained it without difficulty; but he of Perpignan being questioned, as his colleague had been, on his belief in Papal infallibility, replied with some reservations, and declared himself on this matter a disciple of Bossuet. The Papal advisers were dissatisfied with this, and have refused to confirm him in his see. M. Baroche, the French Minister, is, however, an energetic supporter of the same views, and maintains the Imperial selection. Thus we may see reproduced in the nineteenth century the quarrels between Church and State, the distinguishing feature of the middle ages.

ITALY.

A very singular fact is noticed with reference to the bill for the removal of the capital from Turin. That city, which was originally only the capital of a small province, had suddenly grown into the chief city of a first-rate Power. It could not give sufficient accommodation for the multitude of strangers who flocked into it from all parts of Italy, and at the same time could not afford to raise new buildings for them, considering the probability of the step which has now suddenly taken place. In the last few months, however, the fears of the capitalists seem to have been lulled to sleep. Companies have been formed, and a large mass of buildings have been started. Now the crash has come. Turin is to be deserted, at the very time when it was making ready to provide house-room for its visitors. The blow to the contractors will probably be very severe. The population of Turin, after their first unfortunate outbreak, have vindicated their title to liberty by the calmness and temperateness of their behaviour. The members of the Minghetti-Peruzzi Administration, by whom the Convention of September 15 was settled, have been abused and vilified with all the strength of language of which an Italian is capable. Yet they still live in Turin, and can gaze at the countless caricatures of themselves which fill the windows without fear of molestation. The Parliament has been getting through its business in hot haste. The financial bill of Signor Sella, after having passed the Lower House, was brought before the Senate and carried by 108 votes to 22. In the discussion upon it a passage of arms occurred between Count Revel and divers supporters of the late Ministry, whom the Count accused of improvidence and want of judgment. Count Revel, who was head of the Administration in 1848, and is a great authority in financial matters, found fault especially with the enormous naval and military forces which had impoverished the exchequer. His opponents accused him of unfairness for attacking the Finance Minister, who was a member of the Lower House, and could not be present to defend himself (the counterpart of an attack made on Mr. Disraeli in our own House of Commons for his strictures on the diplomacy of Earl Russell, a member of the House of Lords), and for casting blame on the late Minister of. War, General Della Rovere, who had but just been carried to his grave. Such appeals ad misericordiam are not likely to have much influence in a debate of so vital a character. The Committee of the Senate upon the Convention has reported on it in terms of the warmest favour, and maintains the proposal for the transfer of the capital. In the Lower House Signor Lanza has brought forward a list of the Government bills which must be discussed during the present session. Attention was called to a violation of law committed by the late Administration in not filling up two-thirds of the vacancies in the public service from the list of supernumeraries and pensioners, of whom in Naples alone there are now upwards of 2,000 who remain unemployed. An inquiry was also made into the proposed exchange of convicted criminals between the Italian and Papal Governments. Signor Pisanelli, on behalf of the late Ministry, said that it had been proposed, because it was not proper to leave Italian subjects, even convicts, in Papal prisons. Some one suggested that this exchange might be the first step in a reconciliation of the two Governments. General Della Marmora declared he should never have imagined that the reconciliation between Rome and Italy could commence by an exchange of galley slaves. The Minister of the Interior has brought forward a bill for authority to promulgate throughout the kingdom the civil, maritime, and commercial code.

It is said that the removal of the seat of Government to Florence will take place as soon as ever the bill to that effect has been passed. Some have declared, but the report has been contradicted, that the king would hold the New Year's day levée in the Pitti Palace, at Florence. One of the first steps on the part of France in recognition of the change in Italian affairs will be, it is said, the raising of the legation in Italy to the rank of an embassy, to which Count Walewski would be appointed. The death of General Della Rovere mentioned above has deprived Italy of a good citizen, and an able military administrator. He was Minister of War in the late Cabinet, and had warmly supported the Franco-Italian convention: his health had been for some time failing, and it is feared that his anxiety to be at his post in the Senate to speak in favour of the bill accelerated the illness which has carried him off.

The reports of the encounter between the Italian troops and the Garibaldians at Bagolino has been greatly exaggerated. In fact, there was no encounter, and no bloodshed. The volunteers were 150 in number, and were armed with 75 muskets, which they gave up upon the requisition of the commander of the regular troops. They have since been imprisoned in the fortress of Alessandria. The Central Venetian Committee at Turin has published a declaration that it will be useless to make any further attempts in favour of Venice until the Government takes up arms to deliver 'the national Italian territory occupied by Austria.'

The Papal Government is in a state of great uneasiness. In the first place, Baron von Bach, the Austrian ambassador, has arrived from Vienna, and has not brought with him the pious assurances of protection against the malice of the Franco-Italian Convention which were expected of him. This has been a great désillusionnément for them, as they had built great hopes upon his arrival. In the second place, the hope of arranging matters with Russia through the mediation of the Hereditary Grand-Duke, who was to have spent a winter in Rome, has been rudely crushed by a very significant change of mind on the part of his Imperial Highness, who has given up the idea of visiting Rome. The somewhat too fervid strictures of the Pope upon the conduct of Russia to the Catholics in Poland has been a subject of some regret, and it had been hoped that the visit of the heir to the throne of Russia would be as great an assistance to the diplomatic world, as it would be a boon to the social and commercial community. The Pope is about to change his coinage, and substitute for scudi, paoli, and baiocchi, the lire and centessimi, or francs and centimes of the Italians. As a matter of convenience, considering the universality of the francs, this measure may be advisable; as a matter of principle it was not called for, as the decimal system is as well if not much better expressed in the Papal than in the French coinage; the former has the very great advantage of having the standard unit (the scudo) of the value of 4*s*. 3*d*., which is practically and theoretically more convenient than the franc of the value of 9½*d*. The Diritto of Turin states that General Lamoricière has accepted the mission of forming the Papal army, and that the ex-king, Francis II. of Naples, is to be made generalissimo of the forces. The story is an odd one, and requires confirmation.

DENMARK.

The King, the Crown Prince, and the Prime Minister have started on a visit to Jutland. All parties in Denmark are bracing their energies for the critical operation which they have yet to go through, in the shape of a change in the Constitution, rendered necessary by the articles of the Treaty of Peace. On the 15th ultimo, the anniversary of the death of the late King Frederick VII. —or, as the people love to call him, Frederick the Dane— was celebrated with all marks of respect; the shops were all shut, and the journals all bore an edging of black. A banquet was given by the Swedish ambassador on the anniversary of the union between Sweden and Norway. The warmth with which the toast of Denmark was received was especially observed. The national hymn which was sung on the occasion consisted of three verses—one in Swedish, one in Norse, and one in the Danish language.

GERMANY.

A plenipotentiary was sent from Berlin on the 27th ult. to Saxony and Hanover to demand the withdrawal of the Federal army from the Duchies. To explain this action the Nord-Deutsche Allgemeine Zeitung publishes an article pointing out that a competition for the possession of the Duchies has arisen between the Powers to which they have been ceded by Denmark and divers claimants. The presence of the Federal armies in the Duchies is the only obstacle in the way of an adjustment of the claims of the two parties. Until that is withdrawn, Prussia declines to act. This article is perfectly intelligible, and states openly the very thing against which the Federal Diet and the Duchies themselves are so indignant. The Federal Diet is not a third party and a stranger to the discussions between the two rival parties, but is the principal for whom Austria and Prussia have as yet only been acting as agents. The Diet now claims to assume its position, not only as a principal, but also as arbiter on the succession question. Prussia is not, however, inclined to concede an iota; fresh troops have been sent into the Duchies, and the order to those now in garrison there to withdraw has been rescinded. On the other hand, they have allowed to the Federal troops some reparations in return for certain proceedings which occurred not long since, and which appeared to be a slur on the honour of the Germanic Confederation; a battalion of Hanoverians and two companies of Saxons have been readmitted into the fortress of Rendsburg, into which they were received by the Prussian garrison with military honours.

The two Houses of the Reichsrath of Austria have been engaged in the discussion of the proposed addresses to the Crown. In the Upper House, Count Rechburg commented on the necessity for an intimate alliance with Prussia, the want of which was very nearly her destruction in 1859; at the same time the middle States of Germany, he said, look to Austria for help. In the Lower House Herr von Schmerling stated that it was not the intention of the Government during the present session to bring in a bill for establishing ministerial responsibility. He thought it better to wait till the constitution had been carried into effect throughout the whole empire.

The relations between Austria and Russia have become lately the object of much examination. It is said that the Austrian Government view, with much suspicion, the great intimacy which existed between the hereditary Grand Duke and Victor Emmanuel; they have also remarked that he went out of his way in order not to pass through Vienna on his way to Turin. On the other hand, the journals continue to point out the absolute necessity for political concord between these two great Powers. The Prussian journals express a hope that Lord Napier, the new English ambassador at Berlin, will reestablish a friendly intercourse between his Government and Prussia; his lordship, according to them, has a European reputation as a peacemaker.

We mentioned last week the strong measures which had been forced upon the Chamber of Electoral Hesse by the extraordinary conduct of their sovereign: some details are now given of his singular laziness or obstinacy, whichever it may be, which, however unpleasant to his subjects, is a real comedy to the rest of Europe. It appears that several police laws required as substitutes for the old feudal regulations now abolished still await his sanction. In the meantime every one does that which is right in his own eyes. The paper-money is so thoroughly worn out, that it requires care to keep the various strips of a one-thaler note together. The Chamber voted a fresh issue of notes sixteen months ago, but this still remains undone for the same reason as before mentioned. The railway companies can obtain no fresh powers, and are obliged in consequence either to act without leave, or to risk their passengers' necks. The Academy of Fine Arts has been forced to suspend the presentation of medals to its successful disciples since the year 1855, because the sovereign will not give his decision as to the design of the medals. Perhaps the most absurd trick which he ever played was when he left the members of the Chamber sitting for a whole night, because he had gone to the theatre and could not be troubled to sign the decree for their prorogation. It is expected that Prince Frederick of Hesse will be asked to assume the regency during the life of his father.

SWITZERLAND.

Our readers will remember the suspicious circumstances which led to the trial of Dr. Demme and Madame Trümpy for murder. A report has come from Berne that Dr. Demme and Mdlle. Trümpy, the daughter of the deceased and of Madame Trümpy, had drowned themselves in the lake of Geneva; a story so strange was only a fit conclusion for the horrible tragedy which, whether the accused persons were innocent or guilty, was contained in the events which led to that trial. However, there is a suspicion that it is after all only a made-up tale, intended to mask the departure of Dr. Demme and his wife to a foreign country; it is known that he has been offered the post of physician-in-chief in the army, and a professorship in the University of Mexico. Another rumour is that he has fled from certain well-founded accusations of theft, in consequence of the identification of some objects found in his possession on his arrest. Whether this is the final act, or only an episode in the life of Dr. Demme, it is equally singular, suspicious, and sensational.

RUSSIA.

An Imperial decree has been issued closing certain convents in Poland. It orders that all Catholic monasteries and convents having less than eight members, and also those whose participation in the late insurrection was notorious or has since been proved, are to be immediately closed. The inmates may enter other religious establishments, or will be allowed to go abroad at the public expense. The religious establishments which are not suppressed by this decree are forbidden to maintain relations with either the provincials or generals of their orders. The confiscated property of the monasteries and convents will be exclusively devoted to ecclesiastical, educational, and charitable purposes. In pursuance of this decree, seventy-one monasteries and four convents have been closed on account of not possessing the requisite number of inmates, and thirty-nine other religious houses on account of participation in the Polish insurrection.

General Berg has received instructions to forward shortly to the Russian Government a report upon the general situation of the kingdom of Poland, and to state whether there is any possibility of provisionally raising the state of siege in certain districts.

General Berg is also instructed to cause an address to be signed, requesting the complete incorporation of the kingdom of Poland with the Russian empire.

GREECE.

The king has returned the draft of the Constitution to the National Assembly with a message adopting it, and agreeing to take the oath required of him by it. He requests them, however, to modify two points—one of them requiring ministers of the Catholic Church in Greece (i.e. the Church of Rome, the Greek Church being technically called 'Orthodox') to be Greek subjects; and the other interposing great and, in the opinion of the king, needless obstacles in the way of a revision of the Constitution.

MEXICO.

News has been received in France that Juarez has issued letters of marque to privateers acting in the name of the Mexican Republic against France; that is, that he is about to take a step which no Power, whether recognised or unrecognised, has taken during the last twenty years. The perverted sense put upon the word 'privateer' by the Yankee and most of the English press has led us to forget the real meaning of it. A privateer, the bearer of a letter of marque, is a vessel commanded by private individuals, not public officers, and fitted up at private expense, whose object is to take prizes entirely on her own behalf. The warfare pursued by these vessels has justly been considered by the European powers assembled at Paris in the Congress of 1856 as approaching much too near a licensed piracy to be in harmony with the spirit of this century; they thought that a private person authorised by a Government to make what profit he could out of an enemy, in consideration of the harm which he would inflict upon the enemy in so doing, was not a proper representation of the principles on which one nation makes war against another. If the news mentioned be true, Juarez sets aside these considerations, and reverts to a barbarous system. In doing so he cannot plead the example of the Confederate States, whose national cruisers, commanded by national officers, and armed at the national expense, have been called privateers, apparently because they sail alone and not in large fleets, without any regard to the proper meaning of the term.

JAPAN.

The consequence of the capture of Prince Nagato's forts in the Straits of Simonosaki is a treaty by which the Prince agrees to provide all ships that may require them with coal, wood, water, &c., and also to admit their crews to land should stress of weather compel them to do so. He further agrees not to rebuild the forts or mount fresh guns; and, lastly, to pay a ransom for the town of Simonosaki, which might have been destroyed by the allied fleets, besides all the expenses of the expedition.

LETTER FROM NEW YORK.

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

New York: November 15, 1864.

The result of the Presidential election has disappointed no reasonable expectation. I doubt whether any intelligent friend of General M'Clellan, surveying the whole field, looked for him to obtain more than the vote of several important States, together with ascendency in the State Governments, to be a powerful support in subsequent political movements, of which some that were contemplated were of a very grave nature. With the votes of enough States to make out a case against the President's party of having secured a majority of electoral votes by frauds and military violence in places designated, with the proof supplied with which to affect the public mind with the conviction that the Presidency had been usurped, a formidable issue might have been made for the rallying of an irresistible Opposition in another campaign, or for the immediate reform of the Government, concerning which some very bold schemes were in agitation. Of the existence of extensive frauds, military coercion wherever practicable, military intimidation everywhere, the abuse of the power over the army, and the boundless seductions of the Treasury, there are abundant proofs; but the Democrats have not secured a stand-point anywhere on which they can make battle. The electoral vote for Mr. Lincoln is all but unanimous:—22 States out of 25, and 213 out of 234 votes—leaving General M'Clellan only Kentucky, 11; New Jersey, 7; and Delaware, 3 (21). Against such an array, the allegation of usurpation by fraud would fall on very dull ears. The charge of corrupt influence may be all true, but the table of votes will be cited to show that they were immaterial to the issue, and effected nothing on the result. The verdict is 'not proven,' and the criminal goes free because his crimes were superfluities.

The Democratic party is reduced to a powerless minority for an indefinite period. It has lost the Presidency for four years. It has lost the ascendency in every State Government but two, New Jersey and Kentucky. It is in a minority of less than one-third of the House of Representatives; it has even a smaller proportion of the more permanent body of senators. Its distinctive doctrines, on which the government has been administered ever since its foundation, are about to be subverted, in their last refuge in the Supreme Court of the United States, by the incoming of a new set of judges under the administration of Mr. Lincoln, with the certainty that, during his term, by the regular course of a new appointment, or the intervention of Congress in throwing the balance of a divided court to their own side by the addition of a new judge to the bench, the current of constitutional construction will be turned. There is no hope of the possible revival of the Democratic party in its old strength or with its old objects. The civil revolution against them is complete and irreversible.

The struggle against Mr. Lincoln was the expiring struggle for the restoration of constitutional government over the North. If there had been no war with which to delude and madden the people, the Administration of Mr. Lincoln would have been driven out of power by an electoral vote as large as that by which it has triumphed, and a popular majority vastly exceeding that which it has obtained. It is noticeable, in fact, that, with the nearly unanimous electoral vote which Mr. Lincoln received, his majority of the voters is comparatively meagre. Three hundred thousand is the most claimed for him by his supporters, out of an aggregate of fully four millions, distributed among twenty-five constituencies, and there must have been at least a million and three-quarters—probably there are two millions—of voters who protested against this revolution in their own Government. The control of the army and the Treasury, the successful appropriation to the uses of party of the blind instincts of an unreasoning nationality, and the terrible energy with which the Administration has usurped all powers they needed for their own purposes, and wielded what they usurped so as to be followed by the plaudits of the mob, in crushing their opponents, have been too strong for what remained of public virtue; a popular decision, final in form and irreversible, has been obtained on the only issue which was plainly presented to the people. It is that the unity of the nation—an idea which has finally supplanted that of the union of States—is to be maintained 'at all hazards,' as General M'Clellan said in his letter of acceptance; even, as concurrently said in all the organs of the Administration, at the cost of a sacrifice of the Constitution and the perils of the bankruptcy of the nation.

On these last conditions the Democracy made feeble battle. They and their candidate proclaimed as broad and unrelenting a purpose as their opponents to prosecute the war until unity were established; but they argued, with manifest insincerity, that under their auspices unity might be recovered with a union of the States, and they contended that, for the accomplishment of those ends, it was surely not necessary to abolish the constitution and employ dictatorial powers which amounted to military usurpation over the conceded rights of the States and the civil rights and liberties of citizens of the States. They were for trying conciliation with the South by proffering terms which they knew they had no power to execute, and had no real expectation that the South would accept; and, under these false pretences, struggled for ascendency in the North, with the chief object of being able thereby to recover something of their lost liberties for themselves. Not on the issue of war or peace was the decision against them, but on the simple issue that they made constitutional conditions for their professed support of the war, while it was the determination of the Administration to continue to prosecute it on its past policy, according to which all limitations on power, and all questions of State and individual rights, must give way before the one absorbing question of maintaining a unity of government over all the States. The passion for an overshadowing nationality has extinguished all considerations for consequences, or probabilities, or risks; and, the day after the election, the Democratic party and its candidate stood pledged by its organisation and their declarations during the canvass as absolutely for the continued prosecution of the war as Mr. Lincoln himself. They placed the unity of the Government above all questions of administration and policy. Bitterly assailing the conduct of Mr. Lincoln throughout, as in violation of justice and natural right and the Constitution, and such that the people of the South cannot cease to resist without intolerable degradation and utter ruin, they have deprived themselves of the right, as they have lost all power, to obstruct the success of Mr. Lincoln's plans of subjugation and extermination.

The original Peace men who stood aloof from the canvass for M'Clellan, or were silently absorbed in the movement in the vain hope of finding a starting-point for a new organisation should Mr. Lincoln be defeated, have evidently determined to separate themselves finally and peremptorily from the War Democracy, and, setting up a standard of faith for themselves, to adhere to it inflexibly, without compromise or concession for any temporary temptation of expediency. The fundamental idea is, that the inalienable sovereignty of the States supplies the only power through which the disorders of the times can find a remedy, union be possibly reconstructed, or, failing that, constitutional liberty be sustained anywhere. In the present riotous predominance of an overshadowing centralisation, armed with such prodigious powers by the self-prostration of an insane people, and with the State powers themselves in the service of the central despotism, the prospect of either of these consummations must be confessed to be gloomy. But the madness of multitudes has its paroxysms and its final exhaustion; and, with the inevitable discovery that the South can never be brought back to the Union by war, the pressure of the new war measures which must employ Congress if hostilities are to go on, and tax the resources of the country for men and money, the collapse of the Government currency and credit, and the realisation of the grinding burdens of redoubled taxation, will, according to the friends of peace, work a revulsion in the popular feeling, which, acting upon the necessities of Government will compel it to seek peace in the milder paths of negotiation, and to accept or solicit the agencies it now derides. In the successful defence or protracted resistance of the South rest all hopes of compelling the North to make peace, unless potential influence from abroad come in between the combatants, and Europe demand in the interest of humanity and Christendom that this useless carnage shall cease.

The reelection of Mr. Lincoln is received throughout the South as the pledge of the North for continued and implacable war, and is worth armies to the cause. It extinguishes every feeble thought that might have been entertained among any portion of the Southern people that the North is willing to concede even so much for a voluntary restoration of Union as the deceitful programme at Chicago faintly suggested; and it welds the whole mass together in one resolute purpose to fight on and fight ever for independence. It makes war interminable unless the independence of the Confederacy is conceded, or the other and perhaps impossible form of pacification succeeds by the agency of the State sovereignties.

The military situation in Virginia is not changed during the past week. Grant's army and Sheridan's army have been mostly engaged in President-making—voting in camp, or sent home in large numbers on furlough to deposit their votes for Mr. Lincoln. Sheridan, who has so often, according to the Federal despatches, routed, dispersed, and demoralised the army of Early, has retired far down the Valley with the ostensible purpose of covering the Potomac to prevent an invasion of Maryland and Pennsylvania by the same thrice-beaten troops. The Confederates are said to be reinforced, and under the command of General Ewell. Grant is quiet in the trenches before Richmond. The newspapers are promising another grand effort to capture the rebel stronghold. Price does not appear to have taken a firm foothold in Missouri, but to have withdrawn southwards; the intelligence comes so coloured through Federal sources that it is impossible to know what to believe.

The great military excitement of the day is to know what has become of Sherman's army. Nothing has been heard of him for some time, and there are exulting prognostics, coming mysteriously through various sources, that he has started with a very large force for some point in the Confederate territory where he will strike a blow the most signal and brilliant of the war. But no hint has got out to guide opinion towards the spot—whether it is north, or south, or east, towards Lynchburg, or towards Mobile, or towards Charleston or Savannah. The Confederates at Richmond are observant and reticent, and give no hint. The public curiosity is highly inflamed, and the telegraphs are watched hourly for some intimation. Where is Sherman gone? and the Confederate sympathisers are anxiously asking, Where is Hood?

In the meantime, the Confederate Congress is in session at Richmond, actually within the beleaguered city, which people here say that General Grant is about to capture with all it contains, closing his troops about it so that none shall escape. The members do not appear at all sensible of their danger, and are carrying on their debates and discussing the politics of the Confederacy as though General Grant and his army were beyond the Potomac.

There is now some prospect that there will be, by consent of the two belligerent Governments, some mitigation of the sufferings of the prisoners of war held on both sides. A system of exchange for a large number has been agreed upon at Charleston, and an arrangement, proposed from Richmond by the Confederate Commissioner Ould, for the supplying of the wants of the prisoners of each in the hands of the other, has been accepted by General Grant, and waits only the adjustment of some details to be carried into effect. Mr. Ould proposed that the Northern Government shall be allowed to send supplies to the Northern prisoners held in the South on condition that the Southern Government be allowed to make similar provision by purchases in Europe to be admitted into Northern ports for distribution to Southern prisoners in the North. The delay of sending to Europe when immediate relief is needed at the North has prompted the proposal of an amendment by which the purchases can be made at the North for delivery at once. The assent of the Washington authorities has not been obtained, but it is not thought possible that they will withhold it, and thus become more directly responsible for the inevitable privations of their own soldiers in Southern prisons. The proposal puts the Southern authorities in such a superior position for humanity, that I scarcely think it will be declined on any of the frivolous pretences which have so long obstructed the general exchange of prisoners.

In other respects I am sorry to say the war is assuming new aspects of horror in the retaliatory practices which have come to be so prevalent among the subordinate generals in the frontier States, encouraged by example in high quarters. In the Valley of Virginia General Sheridan burnt every house within five miles of a spot where one of his officers was found killed by parties unknown. He assumed them to be guerillas—they might have been Confederate regulars, or desperado deserters from his own ranks, with which the region is filled. In Missouri the Federals lately took out and shot six 'Confederate' soldiers, in retaliation for the supposed murder of a Major Wilson by guerillas, not knowing, in fact, who killed him. In Fayette county, Missouri, lately, one 'Bill Marshall,' a guerilla, shot a Kentucky farmer, and had previously killed two negroes in Henry county. Eight Confederate prisoners of war, regular soldiers of the Confederate service, were taken from Lexington last week, and all of them shot in retaliation for those murders. Thus, the regular soldiers of the Confederate army were shot for the acts of guerillas. The particulars of the shooting are given with shocking levity in the Kentucky Union papers. The Confederates, who have abstained from meeting this system with direct retaliation in kind, are commencing a system of blood for blood. In several instances lately, they have caused captured Federal soldiers, taken in pursuit after the perpetration of one of these enormities, to be hanged on the spot. Mosby, in Virginia, who has hitherto conducted war on principles of high chivalry, treating prisoners with marked gentleness, has been goaded out of his forbearance, and lately gave a signal example of his determination to take vengeance for all specific acts of barbarity of this sort inflicted on his men. Lately, a number of his troops who had been captured by the Federals were executed by the Federal General Custer, under pretence that they were guerillas, not entitled to privileges as prisoners of war. On learning this, Mosby hanged an equal number of Unionists, giving notice for what particular murder they suffered in expiation, and giving warning that hereafter every such act would be avenged in the like way.

The Federals about Alexandria have adopted the plan of securing their trains against the attacks of the Southerners by selecting prominent friends of the Southern cause and exposing them on each train, so as to be the first victims of an attempt to stop it. It has been seriously proposed in the Unionist papers there, if this expedient fails, to pick out for the exposure the wives and daughters of the principal sympathisers, so that the trains may be protected by the Southern repugnance to fire upon women! It has not come to that yet. The plan of exposing unarmed men to shelter armed ones is indignantly denounced as cruel and cowardly, and some of the Richmond papers are menacing the authors with a system of deadly retaliation of the most thorough and sweeping kind. It is, that special efforts should be made to capture the trains on which these noncombatants are so brutally exposed, and to kill without sparing every Unionist occupant. Thus the tragedy deepens, and the bloody deeds of the invader return back upon him with new horrors.

Immediately after the publication of Captain Winslow's and Captain Collins's report of the 'brilliant' affair of the capture of the Confederate steamer Florida in the Brazilian port of Bahia, 'without the loss of a man,' we received the fuller accounts by way of England. They add to the knavish character of the Federal captain, and the piratical character of the transaction. It will be hard for this Government to give up the Florida, and every device will be considered, and perhaps tried, to escape that humiliation. Brazil is not so powerful as England, and there is therefore better chance than Mr. Seward had in the Trent case for the success of some diplomatic device for delaying restitution, and seeking to satisfy the Brazilian authorities with something less than the actual delivery of the hated ship, which is at last, no matter how, in the Federal grasp. There is a strong desire to keep her. Whatever else Brazil might demand short of this would be conceded without hesitation, with a great show of magnanimity. Full acknowledgments and liberal offers will, no doubt, be tendered at once; but I mistake the Brazilian character, which partakes so strongly of the old Spanish pride of nationality, if the Government will endure delays, or be pacified with anything less than full atonement—the immediate release and return of the vessel to the port whence she was taken, and a signal and public mark of the censure of the Government upon Captain Collins.

THE ST. ALBAN'S RAIDERS.

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Montreal: November 16, 1864.

Intelligence respecting the raid upon St. Alban's, and some of the circumstances attending the adventure, have already been conveyed to Europe. I am aware, however, of some facts which may be desirable to lay before the public, and which, no doubt, will be especially interesting to the readers of your paper.

The case of the raiders was prejudged by the Canadian Government, which, I regret to say, exhibited a political weakness, and a truckling to the Federal Government, far from justifiable, if not absolutely contemptible. Upon the Government receiving intelligence of the attack upon St. Alban's, they took speedy and decided steps against the raiders. The superintendent of police at Montreal, and (as I was informed by the American Consul-General) a company of military were ordered to the frontier for the purpose of effecting their capture. Mr. Cartier, the Attorney-General, not being satisfied with these acts of favour, instructed Mr. Carter, Q.C., the Clerk of the Crown, to proceed to St. John's, where the prisoners were first conveyed, nominally for the purpose of assisting Judge Coursol, but in reality to aid the prosecution by taking care that the proceedings were all regular in form, so that there should be no loophole for escape. The Queen's Counsel (Mr. Johnson), retained by the Government as Crown Prosecutor, being offered a retainer for the prisoners, solicited permission to accept the same. This request the Attorney-General not only refused, but Mr. Johnson was directed to go and assist the United States Government in procuring the extradition of the raiders. For several days I observed these officials, both at St. John's and Montreal, preparing the informations and warrants, offering suggestions to the prosecutors, and in every way assisting in the legal routine preliminary to extradition. Such a biassed course of action on the part of the Government has given rise to much private criticism, and has elicited popular indignation.

Further, it was deemed advisable by Judge Coursol, the Clerk of the Crown, and the Crown Prosecutor, that the prisoners should be removed to Montreal, and the case tried in that city. To this step the Hon. S. J. Edmonds (who represented the United States Government) strongly objected. The Attorney-General for Lower Canada was appealed to, but a telegraphic reply was sent back that 'Mr. Edmonds's objections must be attended to.' Finally, however, Mr. Edmonds conceded; but before any action was taken he had to obtain the sanction of the Federal authorities. It was true that great inconvenience was experienced by the judge and counsel at St. John's. The best hotel of the village was uncomfortable. The rooms were incommodious, and privacy was altogether out of the question. But even these disadvantages would have been borne, had not information been received from trustworthy persons that the Vermonters had purposed to attack the gaol and rescue the prisoners. While at St. John's a cavalry militia guard patrolled around the gaol for several nights until they were relieved by a body of the Rifle Brigade, who occupy quarters adjacent to the town. Such a precautionary measure was deemed absolutely incumbent. All this time the prisoners had no commitments made out against them; and the opinion in some legal quarters was that the men had, therefore, no right to be incarcerated.

When the proceedings were transferred to Montreal, the Clerk of the Crown gave his assistance as before, until the Hon. Mr. Abbott, one of the counsel for the raiders, took exceptions to the authority upon which that gentleman acted.

I am confident, however, that Mr. Carter did not relish his position. The onerous and disagreeable duty he was called upon to perform was both distasteful to his dignity and his understanding. Accordingly, one morning he informed the Judge that, as exceptions had been taken to him, as the Clerk of the Crown, acting in the capacity he did, he should like the Court to pronounce its judgment on the question. Later in the day Judge Coursol ruled that Mr. Carter could not legally act as he had hitherto done. This circumstance led at once to Mr. Carter's relinquishment of his office; but, upon being summoned to Quebec, the Attorney-General caused him to withdraw his resignation. I merely mention these facts to show the meanness and weakness which the Canadian Government evinced on this occasion. I am not surprised that they should have received a congratulatory note from Washington 'for the assistance they rendered in the capture of the raiders.'

I have been a good deal with the prisoners, and must speak highly of their general appearance, conduct, and deportment. All of them have been either officers or soldiers belonging to General Morgan's famous band, and several effected their escape from Northern prisons. The dignified and delicate looks of these young men inspire the utmost sympathy for their condition. No one would be daring enough to designate any one of them as a murderer, or even a burglar.

Lieutenant Bennett Young, who, although a mere beardless youth, has been engaged in many fights, is not only an officer of the Confederate army, but was duly commissioned by the Confederate Government to organise and direct a special raid upon St. Alban's as an act of retaliation for the barbarities perpetrated by the Lincoln troops in the Shenandoah Valley and other places. Not only so, but the names of the entire party were reported to, and approved by, the War Department at Richmond, which facts will be proved when the prisoners are put on their defence. Meanwhile suffer me to send you a copy of Lieutenant Young's commission, with which I have been favoured by the Hon. Mr. Abbott:—

'Confederate States of America, War Department,
'Richmond, Virginia: June 16, 1864.

'Lieutenant Bennett H. Young is hereby authorised to organise a company not to exceed twenty in number for special service, under instructions which he has received.

'They will be entitled to their pay, rations, clothing, and transportation, but no other compensation for any service which they may be called upon to render.

'The organisation will be under the control of this department, and liable to be disbanded at its pleasure, and the members returned to their respective companies.

'By command of the Secretary of War.
(Copy) 'W. S. BARTREN,
Major and Adjutant.'

It may be important to inform you that, shortly after the raiders were captured, I was requested by the son of the Chief Justice of Vermont—himself a judge—to become the intermediary between him, as representing the shareholders of the banks, and the Confederate agents. The proposition was to the effect that he considered, from the influence he possessed with his father and the Governor of the State of Vermont (all large holders of stock in the various banks), the prosecution would be abandoned, provided the abstracted money was restored, and a promise given that no similar raid would be attempted. Did I gain the consent of the other side, I was requested to telegraph to Vermont, and that he would immediately start off for St. John's, to further the arrangement. Now, it strikes me very forcibly that if the legal gentleman referred to had regarded the raiders in the light of miscreants, whose base ambition it was simply to rob and murder, he never would have exhibited such weakness of intellect and absence of principle as to have condescended to a compromise with rogues and rascals, who, were they not, and did they not avow themselves to be, Confederate soldiers, would most certainly be deserving of extradition, and the worst fate attending it.

The raid was not concocted in Canada. Lieutenant Young studied international law three months previous to the attack upon St. Alban's, so that he might be qualified how to act. Upon approaching the Canadian frontier, every man, I believe, flung down his arms, though some were pursued and illegally arrested beyond the lines.

Too much praise cannot be accorded to Mr. Justice Coursol for the high and dignified manner in which, so far, he has directed the investigations. He is a gentleman who eschews partisanship, and is only bent on administering justice; and justice, I believe, he will administer, in spite of any consequence such an honourable course may entail on himself.

INCREASED VALUE OF SOUTHERN PRODUCE.—The most prominent fact that engages our attention is the great appreciation of the Southern resources as a consequence of the war. This presents an anomaly as compared with all preceding wars in any country, and arises from the sort of monopoly which the peculiar situation of the South gives her in regard to certain staples necessary to the world at large. Thus cotton has risen from ten cents to sixty cents, gold price, in Liverpool. Resin that was sold at eighty cents, is now worth forty dollars. Turpentine has risen sixfold in value. Tobacco, rice, sugar, have all risen, not in paper values, which have no foundation, but in specie, based upon the united wants of the world. These prices will not fall on the return of peace, but be maintained relatively for many years to come. The following table presents the case clearly:—

	Pounds.	Specie value. 1860.	1864.
Cotton . .	2,000,000,000	$200,000,000	$1,000,000,000
Tobacco . .	185,023,906	18,505,000	36,000,000
Rice . . .	215,313,497	8,612,539	17,000,000
Sugar . . .	237,133,000	16,599,310	24,000,000
Naval stores .		2,107,100	30,000,000
Annual specie value . .		$245,823,949	$1,107,000,000
Increase			$861,176,051

Thus the annual product in specie value is fivefold that of 1860. If we turn to the North to seek for any interest which has improved otherwise than in paper prices dependent upon war expenditure, we look in vain. On the other hand, we observe vast manufacturing interests before employed in providing goods for the South now permanently ruined by the transfer of the manufactures, with the right of all patent machines, to the South. The blockade, indeed, prevents the South from realising present values, but the longer the blockade continues the higher and the more permanent will be the prices on the return of peace, in consequence of the more entire exhaustion of stocks abroad.—New York Daily News.

BUTLER'S SPEECH AT NEW YORK.

AT the reception given on November 14 at the Fifth Avenue Hotel, New York, General Butler made the following speech:—

Mr. Wadsworth, Ladies and Gentlemen,—The citizens of New York have done me honour overmuch. Their kindness, extended in every form known to Christian courtesy, overwhelms me. That I should be supposed to be able to add anything to their sum of intelligence is a still greater honour. That I entertain very distinct views upon the subjects to which you have adverted is most true. 'Peace hath her victories, no less renowned than war,' and of all the peaceful victories ever yet achieved in the interests of human freedom, that achieved in the peaceful quiet which almost brooded over this land on the 8th of November is the greatest. Before we proceed for a moment to look upon its material results, let us look at its moral. It has taught all the world who shall look on (and it is not now to be said that it is a vain boast that the eyes of all the world are upon us) that we are able in the stress and strain of a civil war like this, which has never been seen before, to carry on our institutions in peaceful quiet, that we can change or reelect our rulers, as we weigh them in the balance and find them either meritorious or wanting, without so much of trouble, disorder, or commotion as pertain to a constable election in a parish in England. The moral then is, that a Government embalmed in the hearts of the people, dependent on the intelligence of the people, is the strongest government on earth—strong in the affections, stronger still in the right arms of the people. We have heretofore been told that it was necessary there should be either monarchy or despotism to wield bayonets, yet we see bayonets wielded by hundreds of thousands of us where other governments have not been able to wield by hundreds, and find them entirely subservient to the people's will. The natural results are not less striking. First, in the fact that all disputed questions which have divided the country are now settled by an almost unanimous verdict of the whole people. Does any one complain that in the conduct of military operations there should be the arrest of a traitor? That question has been argued and settled, and the verdict is 'guilty.' Arrest him if he is guilty. Does any one complain that the theory of the Constitution in relation to arming the people in defence of the country has been carried out, which enrols all able-bodied men to fight in defence of their country's life and liberties, and drafts as many as are necessary? That question has been settled, and hereafter it will be more honourable to be drafted than to volunteer. Does any one complain that the Government in its wisdom has organised troops irrespective of colour, and believes that the black man's grave would fill as much space as if his colour was white when he falls in battle in defence of his country's liberties? That question has been settled, and has passed away for ever to be among the things of the dead past.

Does any one now claim, as was claimed in 1860, that Abraham Lincoln is President of a minority of the people of the Union? That question is now settled by an overwhelming majority. Let us consider a moment the fact that, if we count every rebel against him—as they were—every rebel sympathiser against him—as they were—if we count every disloyal man against him—as they were—yet he is elected by a majority second only to that with which Jackson swept the country in a season of financial peril. These material results have been achieved. Now, then, what is the duty of the Government in the present future? War cannot last always. The history of nations shows—the experience of the world demonstrates—that war must come to an end. But how? In what way? A war such as this, prosecuted for the purpose of breaking down the power of those opposed to the Government and bringing them under the supremacy of its laws, must be terminated either by reconciliation or subjugation. In view, therefore, of the unanimity of the American people; in view of the strength, the majesty, the might of the nation, may it not be suggested that now is the time to hold out to the deluded people of the South the olive branch of peace, and say to them, 'Come back, come back, and leave off feeding on husks, and share with us the fat of the land, and bygones shall be bygones, if bygones are bygones, and in one country and with one law we shall live in peace hereafter?'

Are we not able to offer them this now? Are we not strong enough? Do we not stand firmly, with unanimity of sentiment enough to offer peace to all, if all will submit to the laws? There might have been some complaints, I think, among a proud and chivalrous people, that they would not desert their leaders, by taking advantage of the Amnesty Proclamation of President Lincoln; but none when we come to them and say, 'Come back, and you shall find the laws the same, save so far as they have been altered by the legislative wisdom of the land—both for leaders and followers.' Can there be any excuse for either if they rebelliously remain in contempt of the authority of the Government? Are we not in a condition now, not taking counsel from our fears or from our weakness, but of our strength and magnanimity, again to make such offers of peace and amity in the most beneficent terms, but for the last time? By so doing shall we not, in the eyes of the world, 'have exhausted all the resources of statesmanship in an effort to restore peace to the country?' Who shall hinder them from returning? And if they will not come back, who shall complain?

Let us not permit the rebel, after he has fought as long as he can, and then, if he chooses to, come back; let us state some time, perhaps January 8—for the association will be as good as any—for all to lay down their arms and submit to the laws; and when that hour has passed, to every man who shall scout the proffered amnesty of a great and powerful nation, speaking in love, in charity, in kindness, in hope of peace and quiet for ever to its rebellious sons, I say then let us meet him or them with sharp, quick, decisive war, which shall bring the rebellion to an end for ever by the extinguishment of such men, wherever they may be found. How is that to be done? Blood and treasure has been poured out without stint or measure, until, taking advantage of the supposed depletion of treasure, bad men have banded together by speculating in gold, which ought to be the circulating medium, have raised the price of coals upon every poor man's hearth, and the price of bread upon every poor man's table. Let the Government take some measure to stop this unholy traffic, and let it be understood that the policy of the Government will be hereafter to pay no more bounties for the recruitment of soldiers from the taxes of the loyal North; but, taking counsel from the Roman method of carrying on war, to say to your young men, 'Look to the fair fields of the sunny South; they have refused our amnesty and offers of peace; they have turned away the day of grace. Go down there in arms in support of the Government, extinguish the rebellion, and you shall have what you conquer, in a fair division of the lands to each man to pay for his military service. We will open new land offices wherever our armies march, dividing the lands of the rebellious States among our soldiers, to be theirs and their heirs' for ever.' A harsh measure, it may be said. But is it not quite as just as to tax ourselves, and thus raise the prices of the necessaries of life, for the purpose of giving bounty to and supporting the soldier in fighting those rebellious men whom we have three times over solemnly called to come and enjoy with us the blessings of our liberties and be friends—saying, in 1862, come in June; in 1863, come in December; in 1864, come by the 8th of January, 1865? When the clock strikes the last knell of that parting day, then all hope to those who have not made progress to return should be cut off for ever and ever. No longer should they be permitted to live on the land, or even within the boundaries of the United States. Let them go to Mexico, the islands of the sea, or some place that I care not to name, because I know no land bad enough to be cursed with their presence, but never to live here again.

I look, therefore, with some considerable interest upon what I believe to be the present results of this election. I believe, sir, first, that we have settled by it the war by settling the question that the people are determined to carry the war to the bitter end, unless we have submission to the laws. I think it has always been claimed that we should be strong enough after a great victory to offer to the rebels new terms of peace. I never expect to see in arms or in civil affairs a greater victory than the one we have just achieved; and I think we are now strong enough to make that offer with due regard to our interest, our dignity, and our honour as a nation. I take it that the most squeamish of all the friends of the country will agree with us when they find that in truth we have 'exhausted every resource of statesmanship' in attempting to obtain peace by an offer of amnesty and forgetfulness of the past, limited only by a submission to the laws. We will then be ready to make war, ay, war to the hilt—and such war as should be made to decide the fate of a great nation.

Therefore, while asking pardon for trespassing too long upon the festivities of this occasion, keeping the ladies in waiting, in answer to what you were kind enough to suggest, I look upon this victory as one which has decided the war—decided it, if not in a military point of view, yet overwhelmingly as a civil victory, which, after all, decides the fate of nations everywhere. To this it may be answered, and to that answer I take leave for a moment to call your attention, so that every one may work out the problem in his own mind, much more clearly than any suggestions of mine could do, if we carry on the war with the strength and stringency which I have suggested, how shall we ever live in the same land with the men with whom we thus fight? Let us go to the teachings of history, and draw from the history of that land which we were once proud to own as the mother-country. Every considerable estate in England, in the wars under Cromwell, passed through the courts or commissioners of confiscation; every considerable household fought against every other considerable household; the people fought against the nobles, and the nobles against the people. And yet, when the King came to his own again, the nation came together, cemented in friendship, never to be thereafter divided.

Is there any difficulty, then, in looking at the teachings of the history of the Anglo-Saxon, to know how to live in quiet and peace, ay, in amity and friendship, with those with whom we have been fighting? Is it not a well-known rule of social action that those with whom we have fought bitterly, after the fight is over, are more ready than ever to be taken by the hand? They are more endeared to us after a fair fight, and we are more ready to respect both them and their rights. Therefore I see no difficulty in every good man of the South and every good man of the North coming together—to let bygones be bygones. I have already said that I desire the extinguishment of the bad men so far as this country is concerned. I am glad of this opportunity to tender to the citizens of New York who have so kindly come here this evening to do honour to the Government which I represent my most sincere and heartfelt thanks for their loyal appreciation of the efforts of the Government in their behalf, and to say to them collectively, in reply to the suggestion that the presence of the United States troops here prevented all disorder, that far more did the influence of every good man, all tending in one direction, aid to prevent disorder, and still further, the solemnity of an occasion in which a nation's life was weighed in the balance of a nation's power, which even bad men seemed to feel, repelled tumult. Added to this that the wicked could find neither countenance nor support from any good man of any party. To these we owe the peace of the city.

MR. COBDEN ON THE FEDERAL FINANCES.—In the first place, Mr. Cobden by his announcement that an expenditure of £2,000,000 per diem, or 146,000,000*l.* sterling per annum, is to be considered only about equal to our own expenditure of 70,000,000*l.*, 'having regard to the depreciation of the American currency,' notifies to all the world, not only that the Americans never intend to redeem their note liabilities at par, but that it is quite proper for them at once to base their calculations upon this system of repudiation. Next, when he asks how it is that the Americans have laughed to scorn the prediction regarding their coming to Europe for a loan, and proceeds to account for it by their having during the last forty years somewhere accumulated four hundred millions sterling at compound interest, he simply invents a reason for a fact which has no existence. Throughout the entire war the Americans have so besieged Europe for pecuniary assistance that they are estimated to have obtained from Germany alone 40,000,000*l.* sterling, while Holland has likewise contributed in proportionate abundance. As far as this country and France are concerned, we have had special deputations from Washington to ascertain our inclinations, and if the sums procured from us have not been of the magnitude anticipated it has been from no neglect on the part of the Federal Government. As to the 'fabulous accumulations' of forty years at compound interest, their reality has yet to be demonstrated, since during the whole of that period America has found it necessary to appeal to Europe, and chiefly to England—the country which Mr. Cobden accuses of having hopelessly wasted its substance—for the capital to carry out all the public works by which she has developed her resources. Moreover, even supposing these savings to have been otherwise than imaginary, many people would think it better not to save at all than to do so in order that the thrift of forty years may be dissipated in a three years' saturnalia of carnage and destruction. The fact is, that the Americans have not 'deceived and disappointed the whole of Europe,' and there is reason to fear that if such a result is to be witnessed, it will not be from the astounding accumulations present to Mr. Cobden's mind, but from the adoption of Mr. Cobden's mode of reckoning the expenditure of a borrowed dollar not at 4*s.* 2*d.*, but only at 1*s.* 6*d.*—Times City Article.

THE EXHAUSTION OF THE NORTH.

THE subjoined articles, reprinted from Federal journals, show that Mr. Cobden had good reason for foreshadowing the repudiation of the Federal debt:—

(From Hunt's Merchants' Magazine for October.)

It is worse than folly at such a time as this to parade the census value of all our property, or to point to our mines and declaim upon our boundless wealth. We have been a greatly favoured nation, and unless production becomes so fettered by debt and taxation as to prevent our national growth, a future of great prosperity awaits us. But from what we have already said, it is evident there is a limit to our ability to pay taxes. A child can see that if the poor emigrant, when he first went on his land, had been called upon to give any portion of his first year's crop to the general Government directly, or if he had been compelled to give it indirectly by reason of a tax on manufactures, which would require him to pay an additional sum for his winter clothing, he would have had less left to improve his new home with. And if those taxes, direct or indirect, should become so heavy as to make it impossible for him to pay them, and spend anything on his land, the enterprise would, of necessity, be soon given up. It becomes, then, a question of the first importance, how much interest can we meet without crippling production?

To measure accurately the net income of the nation is of course impossible, and yet through the census we can approximate sufficiently near for the purpose of this enquiry. In our last number we gave the savings of the Northern States up to 1860 at $2,632,709,497. From this we concluded that the annual savings for the ten years, from 1850 to 1860, could not have been more than $60,000,000 a year. Such, then, is probably the amount of the actual savings of Northern States in 1860. Of course, however, it does not follow that we can pay but $60,000,000 additional taxes, or that if the Federal taxes in these Northern States had amounted to $60,000,000 more than they were in 1860, there would have been no accumulation that year, since the necessity of paying such taxes would have induced and will induce greater economy. Economy, however, means decreased consumption, and must, therefore, react injuriously on production. Of course, if every man, in saving money to pay his taxes, buys one coat less, there is so much less produced, and also so much less profit to the manufacturer and merchant. Economy, therefore, causes not only decreased consumption, but decreased production and decreased national profits. But to what extent that economy can be carried without destroying the productive interests of the country is the important question.

We have, from the census report, prepared with great care the following table of the probable profits of the whole country from all sources during 1860:—

From agricultural productions	100,000,000
From industrial products	125,000,000
For stocks, except manufacturing, which are included above	55,000,000
For mines, fisheries, and carrying trade	50,000,000
Total profits North and South	330,000,000

This is the fund out of which the farmer buys his clothing and agricultural implements, repairs and enlarges his buildings, and pays his taxes.

In 1860, as we have stated above, all of this sum that was earned in the Northern States was thus and otherwise expended, except $60,000,000 which was laid up. To this fund, then, and this alone, we must look to pay our debt. The strictest economy could not increase our tax-paying ability beyond the amount of these profits. Besides, out of them must first be allowed sufficient for the emigrant to buy the necessary farming implements and improve his farm, or, as we have stated before, he will soon give up his enterprise; and all classes will require sufficient of their income left them to provide for their family wants, or their labour will be in vain. The balance, after paying these necessary expenses, measures the extent to which economy may be carried. Is then this fund sufficient to allow us to throw away anything more by further uses of paper money? And do not these figures furnish a sad commentary on the acts of those who have heedlessly increased our debt, yes, wasted our resources, and are still doing so by their paper issues?

The expenses of Government after peace is restored, were estimated by Mr. Chase in his last annual report, page 12, at $178,838,010, as follows:—

Interest	$85,587,676
Civil service	37,604,409
Army and navy	55,845,834

These estimates are, however, clearly unreliable. The debt is now $2,000,000,000, and will be at least $2,500,000,000 by the 1st of January. If, therefore, we have peace at that time, the annual expenses of the Government will be about as follows, if our finances are ably managed:—

Interest on the debt at six per cent.	$150,000,000
The pension list will now reach at least	50,000,000
Army and navy	75,000,000
Civil service	35,000,000

These estimates of the expenses of the Government after the war are, we believe, less than can be expected without the strictest economy. Then, besides this, we have largely increased city, county, town, and State taxes. An idea of the extent of this latter burden may be gathered from the expense of raising this last call of 500,000 men; cities and counties having paid a bounty of from $500 to $1,000 for each man. If we estimate the average bounty paid at only $600, we have an aggregate debt of $300,000,000 incurred for this one purpose.

Thus we see that if the war is closed by January 1, there will be from $300,000,000 to $400,000,000 of taxes to be paid, without mentioning the amount required for the sinking fund. Previous to the war we paid in taxes about $70,000,000, leaving at least $300,000,000 additional to be raised hereafter out of our national income simply to pay our current expenses and interest.

To add to the force of these figures would be impossible. They speak more earnestly than anything we could say of the wretchedness of our past policy, and the importance of the future. Clearly our resources are not inexhaustible, and he who preaches such a doctrine is, we had almost said, the worst enemy the country can have; for he encourages a system that can but lead to national dishonour.

(From the New York Daily News, November 16.)

The statistics of the Agricultural Bureau are highly suggestive of the madness of the war. The home markets of the South were purchasers of the breadstuff-surpluses of the West in 1859. The returns of the shipments of the crops of that year show that the amount of corn, flour, and wheat, sent to Europe was therefore small. The crop of 1860 was, to a great extent, excluded from the Southern markets by the embargo of war, and was consequently sent forward, to a very large extent, to Europe. The harvest of 1861 was excluded from the Confederate demand absolutely; and contributed to the supply of the foreign markets to an extent unknown in our previous commerce. The new outlet for our breadstuffs thus fully opened, serves to show very forcibly in its subsequent workings, the alarming extent to which the demands of war upon able-bodied labour has crippled our agricultural industry.

Of the crop of 1861, the barrels of flour sent to Europe from the ports of the United States reached 3,299,187. Those sent of the crop of 1862 numbered but 1,692,991—48 per cent. less; and those of the crop of 1863 only 1,342,315—an amount which, compared with that of the crop of 1861, is 59 per cent. less! The bushels of wheat exported from the Federal States numbered, of the crop of 1861, 33,372,181; but the exports of that article grown in 1862 fell off to 25,510,504 bushels—23 per cent. less! Of the product of 1863, the wheat sent to Europe amounted to but 16,826,342, or, as compared with that of 1861, 49 per cent. less! The falling off in Indian corn is still more remarkable. The shipments to Europe of that cereal from the crop of 1861 reached so many as 14,406,242 bushels, whereas from the crop of 1862 they amounted to but 10,403,313, and from that of 1863 to so few as 730,807! The falling off of the exports to Europe of Indian corn, as compared with those from the surpluses of 1861, reached, therefore, in the case of those of 1862, 28 per cent., and in the case of those of 1863 so great a proportion as 95 per cent. Save only so far as it may be sustained by Canada, there is reason to conclude that our breadstuff trade with Europe will be found to be destroyed already by the madness that has forced our agricultural labour into the field of death.

In order to present more clearly these evidences of exhaustion shown in the decline of our breadstuff trade, we place them here in a form which every one can reason from for himself:—

FLOUR.—Shipments to Europe.
1859–60	766,399 barrels.
1860–61	2,708,790 ,,
1861–62	3,299,187 ,,
1862–63	1,692,991 ,,
1863–64	1,342,315 ,,
WHEAT.—Shipments to Europe.
1859–60	5,116,745 bushels.
1860–61	29,005,866 ,,
1861–62	33,372,181 ,,
1862–63	25,510,504 ,,
1863–64	16,826,342 ,,
INDIAN CORN.—Shipments to Europe.
1859–60	2,241,215 bushels.
1860–61	11,806,179 ,,
1861–62	14,406,242 ,,
1862–63	10,403,313 ,,
1863–64	730,807 ,,

This destruction of the breadstuff trade with Europe is not only an evidence of the extent to which exhaustion has gone in reference to our material for the rank and file of armies, but in reference to the degree to which we have been crippled at the very basis of our finances.

THE NORTHERN PRESS ON THE FLORIDA OUTRAGE.

THE action of Captain Collins in the capture of the Florida in Brazilian waters will be sustained by this Government. Foreign powers may designate these pirates as belligerents, but the United States will take the position that to be such they must belong to some recognised and responsible Government. By the confession of Marquis Abrantes, Brazilian Minister of Foreign Affairs, the Alabama also had her chief rendezvous upon islands which were dependencies of Brazil.—The New York Tribune.

From the cordial friendship subsisting between Brazil and the United States, we consider this case of the Florida as presenting a desirable opportunity for still more intimate relations on our part not only with the great and enlightened Amazonian empire of South America, but with all the independent States of the continent. Why not? Can it not very easily be made apparent to them all, beginning with Brazil and Peru, and pointing to the greater misfortunes of Mexico, that our cause is their cause against any entangling alliances with or concessions to the maritime Powers of Europe? To Mr. Seward, in his settlement of this Florida affair, if not already settled through a satisfactory apology, we recommend this broad American continental grasp of the subject. He has thus a fine opportunity for a grand and effective American alliance, according to the Monroe doctrine, in view of the near approach of the liberation of our armies in the South for active work, if necessary, against the European enemies of the independent States of North and South America.—The New York Herald.

The Florida, then, being little better than a pirate, if Brazil consents to accept something short of its restitution, the uses to which the vessel has been put will more than justify her. . . . . We trust that the resources of diplomacy will find an amicable adjustment without a surrender of the Florida.—The New York World.

It is understood here that Mr. Seward has prepared and transmitted, or is about to transmit, to the Brazilian government a letter wherein, with a customary coup diplomatique, it is said he tenders the most ample apology for the recent violation of the neutrality law by the Wachusetts in seizing the Florida at Bahia, while at the same time he does not offer to return the captured vessel to the port where she was seized. This letter, it is hoped, will allay any irritation which may be felt at the conduct of the Federal officers. There is but one opinion here in the matter, and that is, that the seizure of the Florida, while in the waters and under the protection of a neutral Power, was a gross violation of the law of nations, strict reparation for which offence would include the returning of the Florida to Bahia, the dismissal from the service of the captain of the Wachusetts, and the removal of our Consul at the port in question, together with full apology for the unjustifiable conduct of the United States officials. Mr. Seward, his friends claim, will endeavour to save our national pride such a humiliation, and at the same time satisfy the Brazilian Government that the offence was not a wanton one.—Washington correspondence of the World.

OFFICIAL REPORTS.

THE following are the official accounts of General Forrest's attack on Johnsonville:—

To Lieutenant-General R. Taylor.

Paris, Tennessee, October 31.

My batteries on the Tennessee River have engaged the enemy all day with great success. Two gunboats and two transports were destroyed in attempting to pass. One gunboat and two transports are now in my possession, ready for use, unhurt. The other gunboat and a transport floated down the river in a disabled condition, and both will be either destroyed or captured, as my troops are still in pursuit.

(Signed) N. B. FORREST, Major-General.

Opposite Johnsonville, Tennessee, November 5.

Major-General Forrest on the 4th instant achieved another great victory.

He placed a battery above Johnsonville, moved up his artillery from below, and caught at Johnsonville three gunboats, two transports, and about twenty barges. He planted his batteries at night, and opened with eight pieces, and after an engagement of ten minutes the gunboats were set on fire and consumed.

The batteries then opened on the transports and barges, all of which were set on fire and destroyed. The engagement was terrible. The enemy opened with forty howitzers from their fort and gunboats, but not a man quailed under the storm of shell. The cannoneers had their rammers shot in two, and their clothes and boots shot off. Since last Sunday General Forrest has captured and destroyed fourteen transports, four gunboats, twenty barges, thirty-two pieces of artillery, over 20,000 tons of freight, and over $3,000,000 worth of stores. Our loss has been only ten men wounded. Johnsonville is still burning. The immense amount of freight on shore, covering several acres, will all be consumed, as it is now burning and the enemy cannot extinguish it, as our batteries command the banks.

(Signed) M. C. GALLAWAY.

Tuscumbia, Alabama, November 8.

General Forrest reports that on the 5th inst. he was then engaged fighting the enemy at Johnsonville, having already destroyed four gunboats of eight guns each, fourteen steamers, and twenty barges, with a large quantity of quartermaster and commissary stores on the landing and in warehouses, estimated at between 75,000 to 100,000 tons. Six gunboats were then approaching, which he hoped to capture or destroy.

UNION AND EMANCIPATION AT MANCHESTER. — Mr. Bazley, M.P. for Manchester, addressed his political supporters on Tuesday evening. According to the announcement, the occasion was for the purpose of 'the senior representative holding a meeting of his constituents,' and the Free-trade Hall—a building capable of holding 5,000 or 6,000 people—was engaged for the anticipated gathering, but the invitation was responded to by only some 400 or 500 persons in a constituency of upwards of 20,000 voters. On the platform was the President of the Union and Emancipation Society, accompanied by a locally well-known Radical barrister, and two or three other persons familiarly characterised as constituting 'the rump of the League.' To this audience, 'fit though few,' Mr. Bazley delivered a somewhat lengthy and vapid address, consisting of the old platitudes about the 'commercial, civil, and religious liberties of the people,' followed by some heavy drafts upon blue-book statistics. The hon. gentleman avoided the question of the cotton famine altogether. At the close of his address, and prior to the customary motion of 'confidence' being put to the meeting, a Mr. Cross, of Whitworth, a person who has much interested himself in the cotton question for some years, called attention to the meagre attendance in the Hall, and asked why there were no factory operatives present. He held it was not a competent meeting either of electors or non-electors, and that Mr. Bazley, in discoursing upon Parliamentary reform, lost sight of the more vital question as to how the people were to be fed. This statement was followed by great uproar, and ultimately by personal violence. A rush of half-a-dozen Unionists and Emancipationists took place from the front seats over the reporters' table to the platform, while Mr. Cross, who appeared as cool as the mob was excited, prepared for the worst by pushing up his wristbands. The Manchester Examiner concludes the description as follows:—'Rushes were, however, made from different quarters; the decanter and glasses upon the chairman's table were smashed, and the fragments scattered down upon the reporters' heads and books; and, amidst a howling and scrambling which defies description, Mr. Cross was again pounced upon from behind, hurled with a loud crash of chairs to the ground, and dragged off the platform and out of the room, leaving behind numerous shreds of clothing. Mr. J. B. Torr, barrister, who had witnessed the whole affair, came forward and protested against the treatment to which Mr. Cross had been subjected. He said the police should have been called in if interference were required; but he felt bound to utter his protest against a man being murdered by a public meeting. (Loud cheers.)

'A YANKEE CHEVALIER D'INDUSTRIE.' — General Chevalier Watson Webb, the Minister of the United States north of Mason and Dixon's line to the Court of Brazil, who has recently let off a small stinkpot against Great Britain in a despatch concerning the seizure of the Florida, is a broken-down newspaper hack, whose sole creditable act, as far as we know, was the infliction of one of the many castigations, fustigations, and vistergagations to which the corpus vile of the New York Herald incarnate has been subjected. Not warned by the distressing consequences of that experiment in corporal punishment, however, Chevalier Watson Webb got into a passion with Mr. Christie over a rubber of whist, and, by way of scoring honours, either pulled or threatened to pull poor Mr. Christie's nose, and then, by way of winning the rub, invited him to fight a duel. Lord Russell, in a highly-moral-high-toned-whole-souled-Christian-gentleman-and-Blairgowrie-cum-Aberdeen despatch, rebuked the chevalier, and patted Mr. Christie on the back for his indecorous conduct over the Board of Green Cloth. Mr. Christie did not fight, and Chevalier Webb has no doubt been devoting all his time since to the composition of still-born leaders against the British aristocracy, as exemplified in his very liberal-in-everything-but-manner-and-company-lord, the Secretary for Foreign Affairs. Suddenly comes in the Wachusetts and steals the Florida, and out comes the Chevalier Watson Webb with some charming periods. It will be curious to see how Cleon, of the Herald of New York, treats this attempt of his ancient fustigator, castigator, and vistergagator to steal the bread out of his mouth. The British lion himself has been so often ill-treated lately, that he may rouse up some of these days, and then the Chevalier Webb may have to play double dummy with Mr. Gordon Bennett in an underground cell of Windsor Castle.—Army and Navy Gazette.

TO OUR FRIENDS AND SUBSCRIBERS.

THE INDEX was established in May 1862, in the darkest hour of Confederate fortunes, by earnest friends of Southern Independence, with the distinctly expressed object of being the representative, in English journalism, of a gallant and struggling people appealing to the world not only for political, but still more for moral recognition. Since accepting this great trust, THE INDEX has unceasingly laboured, by the combined aid of English and of Southern writers, to enlarge and extend the common ground upon which two nations may cordially meet, which need only to understand each other in order to cherish the warmest mutual appreciation and lasting friendship. The chief and almost the sole difficulty has been, and is still, the callous indifference of the British Government on the one hand, and, on the other, the perplexity, to the European mind, of the unsolved and unprecedented problems involved in the management and education of four millions of the African race, intermingled with a population of the highest Caucasian type. This difficulty could be met only by a liberal fairness to every shade of honest opinion, by an inflexible adherence to truth under all circumstances, and by a bold avowal of convictions, even though ill received. THE INDEX does not claim to be neutral, but it claims to be independent in the highest sense of that word. It is because it must reflect and appeal to, at one and the same time, the public opinion of two countries as yet only imperfectly acquainted, that this somewhat unusual self-description is called for.

Thanks to arrangements now in successful operation, by which the Letters of regular Correspondents and Newspapers from all parts of the Confederate States are received within from twenty-five to thirty days from their date, THE INDEX is always enabled to present the very Latest Direct News from the South, as well as a faithful reflex of the tone and spirit of the Southern Press.

All communications intended for publication should invariably be addressed to 'the Editor of THE INDEX, 291 Strand, W.C.,' and unless authenticated by a responsible name, can receive no attention.

Advertisements should be sent and Money Orders made payable to J. B. HOPKINS, INDEX Office.

THE INDEX.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 1, 1864.

Mr. Cobden.

THE worthy Alderman of Rochdale, who occupied the attention of the assembled Reformers for some minutes before Mr. COBDEN commenced his recent remarkable harangue at that town, informed his hearers that Messrs. COBDEN and BRIGHT 'had educated the people of this country' so that they were now able to control the foreign policy of the Government against the aristocracy, &c., &c.; and Mr. COBDEN, as if to confirm his title to this praise, proceeded to give a lecture, historical, geographical, ethnological, arithmetical, embracing the whole wide circle of the sciences, which must have greatly enlightened and edified the 6,000 ingenuous pupils who sat that evening under his instructions. Nor was the benefit of these instructions restricted to the narrow limits of the Messrs. ROBINSON'S machine-shops in Rochdale. The next morning many hundred thousand copies of the lecture were in the hands of the British public, and Mr. COBDEN'S audience was multiplied to the extent of all within the United Kingdom who can read their own language. We have rarely known so striking an instance of the 'schoolmaster abroad.' The Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge, if that excellent association continues its invaluable labours, is indebted immeasurably to Mr. CORDEN; for he has shown, amongst other matters, that, in order to teach profitably and intelligibly, it is not at all necessary for the teacher to know anything of the subjects he expounds. Let the captious object to ignorant expositions, if they will. If Mr. COBDEN'S calculus is absurd, the fault lies not with the gentleman at the black board, but in the perversity of figures. If his geography is just a little incorrect, we must blame the physical universe and not the professor. If his historical statements are not in accordance with the facts, we can only say, with the sincerest commiseration for the muse of history, tant pis pour les faits.

We have no intention or desire to review Mr. COBDEN'S exercitation as schoolmaster at Rochdale, in all its parts. Criticism has already been largely expended upon it in the daily press, and we are spared the task of comment upon such passages as refer to general politics or involve classical learning. The affairs of Slesvig-Holstein and the washerwomen of the Ilissus concern us far less than what Mr. COBDEN has to say of the American war, and it is chiefly to his remarks upon the latter that we propose to devote a few paragraphs. It so happens, indeed, that herein, for the most part, do we discover the heterodox history and ricketty arithmetic, to say nothing of the strange geography, of Mr. COBDEN; but as his hearers were presumed to know less than nothing of America, we cannot complain that he attempted to inform them after his own manner of thinking, that they might arrive, through such useful teaching, at his own decided and intelligent convictions.

In referring to the secession of the Confederate States, Mr. COBDEN complains that, in dissolving the political tie which bound them to the Federal Union, they failed to set forth the grievances under which they laboured, and that nothing of remonstrance or expostulation with the United States, no formal declaration of wrongs, on the part of the Confederates, has ever met the eye of the world. Is this a joke? Can the man possibly be serious in his complaint? Has Mr. COBDEN read the Times? Does he not know that every State of the Confederacy, in adopting its course, solemnly registered the acts of oppression that had driven it to the resumption of its own indefeasible sovereignty? Is he ignorant of the efforts of Virginia to preserve the Union, which she had done more than any other State of the old thirteen to establish? Where are the clear, earnest messages of President DAVIS, the noble address of the clergymen of the South to Christians throughout the world, the lofty protests of the Confederate Congress, the speeches and letters of Southern statesmen? Does not Mr. COBDEN know that for years before the secession of the Southern States the local legislatures of the North had violated openly the Federal Constitution, that they had made impossible the enforcement of laws of Congress, in harmony with the spirit and in accordance with the express letter of that Constitution? Ah! but the only grievance of the South was the war upon slavery. Has Mr. COBDEN never heard of the MORELL Tariff? And is he, the apostle of Free Trade, so little acquainted with the causes of the American war as not to have perceived the greatest of all Southern grievances in the restrictions placed upon the commercial intercourse of the South with Great Britain? Strange indeed does it seem that the man of all others in Great Britain who has advocated most strenuously the freedom of trade should espouse the cause of the Protectionists in America. But Mr. COBDEN draws his historical lessons from New England authors, and reads the drama of the Low Countries in the pages of Mr. MOTLEY to such purpose that he confounds the 'Rise of the Dutch Republic' with the 'History of the United Netherlands'—an error which is so insignificant in comparison with his blunders in speaking of the Confederate States, that we might not mention it at all had it not been committed by one who is engaged in 'educating' the English people. So much for Mr. COBDEN'S history.

As a geographer, he is even yet more at fault, while deploring the ignorance of his young countrymen concerning the map of America, and expressing his desire to endow a professorship in the English universities for the express purpose of making the youth of England acquainted with the position of Chicago. To such of HER MAJESTY'S subjects as have invested largely in the Illinois Central and the Northern Indiana and Michigan Southern, we doubt not Chicago may seem the most important city of the Western continent, as being a terminus of these railways, but we are unable to see that a thorough comprehension of the commercial greatness of Chicago would induce the belief that the Yankees were justified in seeking to subjugate the Confederate States or exterminate the Southern people. And to this end all Mr. COBDEN'S teachings turn. He compares Louisiana with Kent and Essex, instituting a parallel between the secession of a sovereign State and the revolt of an English shire—which is really too preposterous for comment—and recognises in the Mississippi river a ligature which must for ever bind in political union the people of Maine and the people of Texas, Floridians and Minnesotans, Virginians and Californians, not less than the dwellers on its banks along a distance of 2,500 miles. The idea that the people who live at the sources of a river, or possess its shores where it has deepened and broadened into a navigable watercourse, should of right command its mouth, is a novel one, but it is not original with Mr. COBDEN. He is indebted for it, and for its application to the Mississippi, to the Hon. EDWARD BATES, of Missouri, a member of LINCOLN'S Cabinet, who unfolded the same in an oration delivered at St. Louis in the year 1857. But surely there never was politico-geographical proposition more untenable in itself, and more distinctly refuted by all experience. What says Mr. COBDEN to the Rhine, a river scarce one-third as long as the Mississippi, and belonging to ever so many nationalities? What means fortified Strasbourg, what significance has frowning Ehrenbreitstein, if the river should be held, not by Prussia, not by France, nor yet by the sturdy Hollanders, through whose green levels it sluggishly seeks the German Ocean, but by the unambitious Switzers, who behold it rushing from the Lake of Constance and leaping over the rocks of Schaffhausen? But it may be said that the Rhine is a river of many languages, and herein differs from the Mississippi. Very well. Let us take the St. Lawrence. If we compute the total length of the great series of great lakes which it empties, we shall find the St. Lawrence as noble a river as the Mississippi. The written and spoken language of the people who live on the St. Lawrence is chiefly English, and the French habitants are English subjects. Admit Mr. COBDEN'S geographical deductions, and Great Britain should surrender the Canadas to Mr. LINCOLN at once, before 'the greatest people on the earth' come down upon the new Colonial Confederation and wipe it out of existence. Were the general proposition correct, which Mr. COBDEN'S views of the Mississippi, borrowed from Mr. BATES, would seem to lay down, it would apply least of all rivers on the globe to the Mississippi; for among the great rivers on the globe the Mississippi is peculiar in constantly changing its latitude in its course towards the sea. Flowing directly south from the moment it assumes the character of a distinct stream—'a rivulet, then a river'—from the Falls of Minnehaha to the Balize, it is ever seeking a sunnier clime, and marked, as it runs, by a richer vegetation. Congealed during many months of the year in the rigorous region of its head-springs, and crashing in ice through the granite ledges of the far North, it melts beneath a genial sky long before it pours its turbid flood into the warm waters of the Gulf of Mexico, and bears on its broad surface the productions of many climates—fruits and cereal grains, timber and live stock, sugar and cotton, representing the industry of many races of men. If geography teaches us anything, it is that the dwellers on the banks of such a river can never be a homogenous people, and that conflicting interests and varying climatic influences must sooner or later disunite them for all time, leaving the navigation of the stream to be settled by conventions and treaties between their respective Governments.

But if Mr. COBDEN'S history and geography inspire us with a certain distrust in his capacity to 'educate the people of this country,' his finance and arithmetic are more unfortunate still. He gravely informs the credulous members of the Rochdale Reform Association that the reason why the Yankees have been able to keep up the war at the expense of $2,000,000 per diem, and have not been compelled to apply to Europe for loans, is that for forty years past they have been accumulating a fabulous sum of money, amounting to something like 400,000,000*l.* sterling. Now this amount of savings is nowhere in existence outside of Mr. COBDEN'S imagination, and the statement he makes that the Yankees have not resorted to Europe for loans is wholly destitute of truth. There has never been a time since the beginning of the war that the agents of Mr. CHASE have not darkened the doors of European bankers for pecuniary aid, and from Holland and Germany they are known to have obtained considerable sums. Their success has not been so great in England, because our capitalists have been better acquainted than Mr. COBDEN with the real condition of the Federal exchequer. As for their ability to spend two millions a day in support of war, because they did not exceed their income in time of peace, it is much as if one should say that a young nobleman, after attaining the age of thirty, might play without limit at rouge-et-noir, because before thirty he had never been guilty of excess. It will occur to thoughtful persons, moreover, that, granting the large margin of expenditure which Mr. COBDEN supposes the United States to have at command, they had far better husband it for purposes of national advancement than expend it all in a 'big' war, only to show that they can distance mankind in the magnitude of their crimes and follies. But Mr. COBDEN seeks to show that the daily expenditure of the Yankees in carrying on the war is not so great as many of us imagine, and herein his method of calculation challenges our marvel if not our respect. An old story tells us that one of the sceptical contemporaries of NOAH, overtaken by the Deluge on the top of a mountain, after vainly entreating the patriarch for admission into the ark, cried out to him to 'go to thunder with his old ship, for, after all, there was not going to be much of a shower.' In like manner, Mr. COBDEN believes that the Yankee burden in maintaining the war is not going to be much of a debt. Two millions a day, reckoned according to the present value of greenbacks, the dollar being worth only 1*s.* 6*d.*, is but 125,000*l.*, or about equal to the expenditure of England at the present moment. Of course Mr. COBDEN yields the point that the Yankees never intend to redeem their greenbacks, or if they redeem them at all, it will be at the frightful depreciation to which they have already sunk. Upon a calculation so convenient the war becomes a cheap luxury indeed, and it is perfectly easy of demonstration that the less their treasury notes are worth the smaller will be the expense at which they can overrun Southern territory, and fit out armadas for the closing of Southern ports. If the dollar sinks to the value of 2*d.*, their daily expenses dwindle to the sum of less than 17,000*l.* As soon as the dollar reaches zero, these expenses will be nothing whatever. Q. E. D.

'My wound is great because it is so small;
Then 'twould be greater were it none at all.'

If the Reformers of Rochdale should trust to Mr

COBDEN's financial calculations, and apply the same to their own business, we think the machine-works of the Messrs. ROBINSON would soon be silent.

Much might be said of Mr. COBDEN as a logician and as a teacher of moral philosophy, but our limits compel us to bring this commentary to a close. He tells us that in any possible event (as, for example, if the Southern Confederacy were recognised by LINCOLN and all the world on the 1st of January next) slavery has received its quietus in America; and yet, lover of peace and confrère of BRIGHT, he encourages LINCOLN to continue a desolating and barbarous war for the extirpation of an evil which is already extirpated. If slavery be dead, why should Mr. COBDEN desire the war to go on in mere wanton malice, and to no other end than to gratify the hate and the pride of the Yankee? Such is his logic—his ethics are even worse. The amiable suggestion that Louisiana might be inundated and its inhabitants drowned by cutting the levees on the Mississippi, will be thankfully received at Washington, though it originated, not with Mr. COBDEN, but with General JAMES WATSON WEBB, the pleasant Plenipotentiary of the United States resident at Rio, while the mild disclaimer of approving such an act will be accepted for just what it is worth. 'Friend, I don't approve mob law,' says the Western Judge, 'but here's a scoundrel, and there's a limb that will swing him.' Shall we not say that the humanity of the Rochdale orator is worthy of the friend of the people, whose sympathies with despotic power lead him to find satisfaction in the sufferings of Poland and the dismemberment of Denmark?

The Lincoln Programme.

WE elsewhere print the speech of BENJAMIN F. BUTLER. The first impression produced by the perusal of it is rather a humorous one. The language is quaint from its inelegance, and it is evident that BUTLER knows as little of the art of oratory as he does of the art of war. It is amusing to hear the man whose petty infamies and cruelties have made him notorious talk about magnanimity and honour. However, it is not for the amusement, but for the instruction of our readers that we give space to BUTLER's speech. He is selected by Mr. LINCOLN to set forth the policy of the Administration. Indisputably Mr. LINCOLN has made a fitting selection. We hope that the sun has never risen on the man whose antecedents make him so worthy to be the herald of a bloody and ruthless extermination.

Knowing that the South is fighting for independence, and will continue to struggle whilst a man survives to wield the sword—knowing that, if ever there was a chance of the South consenting to reunion, that chance has been swept away by four years of cruel and savage war—Mr. LINCOLN, almost in sight of the desolated plains of the Shenandoah Valley, is about to send forth a messenger to the South to promise an amnesty, if the Confederates will lay down their arms and submit to his authority. Wonderful are the delusions which sometimes beset man; but no one in the North, and certainly not Mr. LINCOLN, imagines for a moment that any people would under such circumstances submit to the ignominy of giving up the cause for which so many gallant sons have died. And mark too the time selected for this amnesty. The armies of the North are foiled at every point. The summer and autumn have melted away; and still between GRANT and Richmond is that army which the Federals have never yet been able to overcome. SHERMAN, after driving the inhabitants away, has himself evacuated Atlanta; and wherever he is going it is manifest that the march which cost him half his army has been utterly barren in results. In the last year the Confederates have recovered two-thirds of the territories which they had previously lost. Everywhere the Confederate armies are advancing and making head against the invader. Is that the time to offer an amnesty? It is offered merely that it may be rejected.

BUTLER informs us what is to follow the rejection of the amnesty, and it will be noticed that this part of his speech is clearer than the rest. When he talked of amnesty, of peace, and mercy, the words seemed to stick in his throat; but he talked with sufficient vigour about spoliation and extermination. If, before midnight on the 8th of January next, the Confederates do not submit, the door of mercy is to be closed for ever, the lands of the South are to be divided among the Northern soldiery; and as for the people, this is the sentence pronounced on them by BUTLER, of New Orleans, and the representative of Mr. LINCOLN: 'No longer shall they be permitted to live on the land, or even upon the boundaries, of the United States. Let them go to Mexico, the islands of the seas, or some place that I care not to name, because I know no land bad enough to be cursed with their presence, but never to live here again.'

Impotent, indeed, are the maledictions of BUTLER; but it must be remembered that the policy enunciated was the policy of the Government he represents, and not merely the emanation of his black heart and the invention of his fiendish malignity. We must remember that the Rev. WARD BEECHER, Mr. HORACE GREELEY, and a thousand members of Mr. LINCOLN's party, vociferously cheered BUTLER's speech. We shall do wrong, then, to vent our indignation upon BUTLER for proclaiming a policy of unparalleled ferocity. He was only the mouthpiece of the Administration. Europe now knows the character of the struggle going on in America; that, as Earl RUSSELL said long ago, the North is fighting for empire, but for empire upon such terms as no other power has sought it. A great people is to be exterminated, and their lands divided amongst the soldiers.

Thank GOD, the most timid will be only disgusted, and in no way alarmed, at Mr. LINCOLN's programme. Let every human heart be filled with gratitude to the Giver of all victories that the events of the past four years are an assurance that the wicked designs set forth by BUTLER will not be carried into operation, and the world will not see the hideous spectacle of a vast country laid desolate, and of 8,000,000 of the Anglo-Saxon race killed or expatriated. If the North has one true friend in Europe, let him counsel Mr. LINCOLN, for decency's sake to send no more to the Confederates for ransom, and to offer them no more amnesties, until he has accomplished something towards their subjugation. And if Mr. LINCOLN were wise he would not parade his policy of extermination. It does not help him to overcome; and voracious as are BUTLER, BEECHER, and the rest of his followers, they must overcome before they can slake their thirst by killing, and they must kill before they can satiate their lust by taking possession of the lands of the South.

The War.

THE two great armies of the South-west have for the time disappeared. Notwithstanding all the rumours that are current of the intentions of SHERMAN and the objects of HOOD's northward march, we do not possess at this moment one item of trustworthy intelligence respecting the 'whereabouts' of either army; nor is there even the chance of a reasonable guess at their respective positions, strength, and prospects. If we could believe the latest rumour at Washington, these two great armies were, some three weeks ago, marching in all possible haste in opposite directions; SHERMAN, after destroying all his communications, burning Rome and Atlanta, and cutting loose from his base, was turning southward or eastward, to Mobile or Savannah, to burn more towns on his road, and open up a new inlet into the heart of the Cotton States; HOOD was equally intent upon getting out of the way of his powerful adversary, and was quietly concentrating his troops at Florence, with the view of making sure of Memphis and getting the control of Mississippi. In other words, we are to believe that these two forces, destined for each other's destruction, have suddenly decided to make a fight impossible, and to inaugurate an entirely new campaign, to be conducted on either side as if the opposing general and his troops had really, as has been suggested by a Southern paper, 'evaporated.' De non apparentibus et non existentibus eadem est ratio is a good rule in matters of science, but is not equally applicable in strategy, and we venture to say that neither of the generals has acted on such an inference; although we willingly admit ourselves as much in the dark as to the actual and impending movements of HOOD's and SHERMAN's forces as the public at Richmond and Washington. The last reliable information we are in possession of in regard to SHERMAN left him at Gaylesville in Northern Alabama, whither he had followed HOOD's army retiring from Dalton. There, it would appear, he prudently halted, from want of provisions, and from the inability of maintaining his communications with the Chattanooga and Atlanta line of railroad. There is reason to believe that, after waiting there some days to ascertain HOOD's real intentions, he made up his mind to retrace his steps with all rapidity; but whether he marched thence to Atlanta, leaving Generals THOMAS and SCOFIELD to look after HOOD, or upon Bridgeport with the view of marching along the northern bank of the Tennessee River, and thus either placing HOOD's army between two fires in the event of his advance into Middle Tennessee, or anticipating his passage of the river, it is impossible to say. Most of the reports, we are bound to say, are in favour of the former supposition. Northern and Southern papers point to a march either to the east, viâ Atlanta upon Charleston or Savannah, or upon Mobile, Montgomery, or upon HOOD's communications at some point on the Corinth and Mobile railroad. Now, either of these expeditions would imply one of two things on the part of SHERMAN—either a profound confidence in his own numerical superiority, or a confession of his inability to hold any portion of Georgia, and of the necessity of achieving a contrecoup by establishing a new base of operations against the Cotton States on the seaboard. But the perils of these expeditions are obvious. In no case could SHERMAN undertake to move with less than 60,000 men. The rainy season is coming on, and he would be compelled to take with him a powerful cavalry force for foraging purposes, an enormous train, heavy guns, pontoons, &c. To reach Savannah or Charleston, he would have to march about twenty-five days at the rate of fifteen miles a day through a hostile country, with clouds of Confederate horsemen in front, on his flank, and in his rear, with the certainty of finding a powerful body of regular Confederate troops in front of him and having to fight a pitched battle and assault strong fortifications before he could open communications with a Federal fleet. To reach Mobile would be a work of not less difficulty and danger; whilst it is manifest that if he be unable to hold Atlanta, to march thence to Montgomery and Selma, and then northward upon HOOD's army in Northern Alabama and Middle Tennessee, is out of the question. Nor is it yet quite clear that SHERMAN has evacuated Atlanta. True, there is concurrent testimony to that effect from both North and South; but on both sides it is clear the greatest secrecy is maintained, and, although the Washington Administration may be without news from SHERMAN, or may have very good reasons for not publishing the details they have received, it is not easy to understand why the Confederate authorities should decline to make public movements as to which they must be perfectly well-informed, or to delay announcing results so entirely favourable to their cause. For our own part we confess our inability to penetrate the mystery which at present surrounds SHERMAN's army. Our own theory would be rather in favour of a northward march upon South-western Virginia viâ Knoxville, or of a concentration of SHERMAN's army at Bridgeport on the Tennessee, which would be equally consistent with the burning and destruction of Atlanta and Rome. Without some definite information as to the strength of SHERMAN's force, especially of his cavalry, we are, of course, quite unable to pronounce authoritatively upon his capabilities in the way of further advance. But for the present we cannot bring ourselves to believe that he has any serious intention of cutting his army adrift from its base, and trusting it to the hazard of a fresh invasion. The reports of HOOD's movements are not less conflicting. One day we are told he is marching upon Chattanooga, the next that his army is stationary at Florence. We may surely dismiss the latter statement. The last we heard from HOOD's army was his announcement of his intended invasion of Tennessee. It can hardly be supposed that the speeches of CLEBURNE, BATES, and BEAUREGARD were snares for the enemy. Undoubtedly they meant a forward movement, and that not upon the Mississippi, but on the Tennessee; and the successful operations of FORREST's column at Johnsonville, by which a great Federal depot has been destroyed, and the nucleus of a formidable flotilla has fallen into the hands of the Confederates, are a part of this scheme. Is it reasonable to suppose that HOOD would have left Georgia and South Carolina at the mercy of SHERMAN's devastating legions, for the sake of reconquering Western Tennessee and regaining the left bank of the Mississippi? The mystery cannot last much longer. The next mail must bring us authentic information from one side or the other. We await it with confidence. It is not likely that BEAUREGARD has given over to SHERMAN's troopers the rich territory he was appointed to defend. It is still possible that SHERMAN has found Atlanta untenable; and that, afraid to confess the failure of a campaign which has cost a year's expenditure of life and treasure, he has determined on some desperate attempt to retrieve a great disaster by incurring a prodigious peril.

The anxiety respecting the movements of the armies in the South-west deprives the doings of the forces in Virginia of their usual interest. A daring reconnaissance of EARLY's cavalry, followed by a sudden retreat of his whole army, is the only new feature in the campaign in Northern Virginia. But whether the retrograde movement be designed as a trap for SHERIDAN or as a necessary change of position for the strengthening of Lynchburg, we cannot say. The great victory of BRECKINRIDGE at Bull's Gap ought to secure South-western Virginia against everything but SHERMAN's army; and it is possible that if SHERIDAN advances, we may hear of a renewed trial of strength in the Shenandoah Valley. At Petersburg all is tolerably quiet. The Confederates are reported in great force, and GRANT ...ted to be still meditating another assau... the event of SHERMAN's army being in dang... will be compelled to attack, but of the resu... there need not be the slightest fear. In the mea...time, whatever the Federals mean to do must be done quickly, for the rainy season is close at hand, and this will render the movements of great armies almost impossible.

Confederate Finances.

THE financial position of the Confederate States is unique. If the South were an agricultural country in the ordinary acceptation of that term—that is, if she were merely a food-producing country—the history of the crisis forced upon her by the war would have been far less interesting to the financial student. But the South produces the great staple cotton in unequalled quantity and of unsurpassed quality, besides tobacco and other articles of commerce. Although the South was not classed as a trading nation, because she conducted her business entirely through the agency of the North, yet the South was, and will be again when peace is restored, one of the greatest trading nations on the face of the earth. One result of the South transacting her business through the agency of the North was, that war found her without a navy and without that commercial marine which is the ready nucleus of a navy. We therefore see the anomaly of the great trade of a nation suddenly and entirely stopped. It is the first time such a thing has happened, because it is the first time that a great trading nation has transacted its business altogether through a foreign agency. The consequences would have been disastrous in the extreme, and almost fatal, had not the South been an agricultural as well as a trading nation. Cut off from foreign commerce, the labour and the prolific soil that formerly yielded export staples now produce in abundance food and other requisites. Necessity developed a totally unexpected and latent ingenuity, and to-day we behold the Confederates not only amply supplied with food, but clothed in homespun, and confronting the invading armies with home-made weapons and ammunition. Never was a country or a people better adapted for a defensive war, for no country or people can be more thoroughly independent of foreign supplies. The friends of the Confederates have sometimes been surprised, and the enemies of the Confederates have been confounded, at the coexistence of material abundance and financial pressure. If the Confederates are so well supplied with food, clothing, and the munitions of war, how is it they are in such monetary difficulty? The enigma is solved by considering the twofold character of the country. The sudden suspension of all trade involved a monetary crisis. The marvellous agricultural and other resources of the country, and the devotion and ingenuity of the people, yield an ample provision of all things needful for the sustenance of man and for the prosecution of the war. It is easy to see that the financial difficulty is due solely to suspension of trade, and not to the expenses of the war, by comparing the financial position of the South with that of the North. On October 1 the public debt of the North was officially stated to be $2,026,949,092—or say 405,389,818*l.; but it is well known that this statement does not represent the full amount of the Federal debt, and of course does not include the large war debts contracted by the several States in the payment of bounties and other contingent expenses. The price of gold has advanced to 150 per cent. premium, notwithstanding that the export of the Northern staple—breadstuffs—has been uninterrupted. Although this trade is now falling off, how much it supported the war may be seen from the following return of the breadstuffs sent to Europe the year before the war, and the year after the war was begun:—

	1859–60.	1861–62.
Flour . .	766,399 barrels	3,299,187 barrels
Wheat . .	5,116,745 bushels	33,372,181 bushels
Indian corn	2,241,215 „	14,406,242 „

On October 1 the Confederate debt was $1,426,381,095—or say 225,276,219*l.* This amount of debt was rather more than 50 per cent. that of the North, but the premium on gold was immensely higher. Now be it remembered that the South has not been able to ship her staples. Of cotton alone she has a stock on hand of at least 2,000,000 bales, worth in gold at present prices 80,000,000*l.*, but representing in Confederate currency a sum equal to five times the funded debt. Who can reasonably doubt that if the South had enjoyed the same trading facilities that the North has done, the Confederate debt would not have attained a sixth of its present total, because there would not then have been a resort to a paper currency, or at all events the limited Government issues would have been quoted at par, and the Government would have supplied its armies at specie prices? That, despite her open trade, the Northern debt is so large and the Northern currency so depreciated, is due to several causes. An aggressive war is always more costly than a defensive war; the North has had to pay an enormous price for mercenary troops; the corrupt Northern Administration has been prodigal in expenditure; and, above all else, the North is not, like the South, independent of foreign supplies. Supposing that the North had carried on the war without the support of commerce, her paper would have been more depreciated than that of the South, and her debt would have been vastly greater than it is. At the present moment Confederate bonds are higher than Federal bonds in the London market. What would be the effect of peace on the price of these securities? Confederate bonds would forthwith be quoted far above par; and, on the other hand, it is safe to predict that Federal bonds would fall in value, and would most likely be unsaleable.

Having thus directed attention to the peculiar financial position of the South, having endeavoured to explain how it is that abundance of home-produced supplies is co-existent with great financial depression, we will proceed to note the chief points in the report of Mr. TRENHOLM. After a careful perusal every one must be struck with the ability and candour displayed in that document. Indeed, we are disposed to agree with some Southern journals who complain of Confederate officials persistently presenting the darkest side of the picture. The War Department in Richmond is never slow to publish a defeat, but it is not nearly so prompt in proclaiming victories. Mr. TRENHOLM parades all the financial difficulties, and does not deem it necessary to dwell on the hopeful and assuring features of his department. It is, however, a great advantage that when we get a Confederate official document we know the whole truth, and that we know the worst.

The following is a statement of the financial position in pounds sterling, taking the dollar at four shillings:—

Public debt on October 1 . . .	225,276,219
Increase in six months . . .	19,530,152
Receipts from April 1 to October 1 .	83,038,306
Balance in Treasury on April 1 . .	61,656,544
Total	144,694,850
Applied to reduction of debt . .	68,522,065
Expended	54,475,700
Balance	21,967,085
Total	144,694,850
Estimated expenditure to June 30, 1865	87,620,538
Balance of appropriations in hand on January 1, 1865	93,483,240
Estimated balance of appropriations on June 30, 1865	5,862,705

Of the public debt 120,000,000*l.* is unfunded, and 90,000,000*l.* of this, as we shall presently see, Mr. TRENHOLM proposes to withdraw from circulation, leaving a balance of 30,000,000*l.* or $150,000,000 to be used as currency until the return of peace makes a specie currency possible. The small increase in the debt for the six months ending October 1 is due to the large balance in the Treasury on April 1. In the receipts for the six months ending October 1 is included the amount withdrawn from circulation by the tax on the Treasury notes, which amount is written off in the item on the credit side of 68,522,065*l.* appropriated to reduction of the debt. The excess of appropriations is attributable to two reasons. In the first place, it is difficult to form an accurate estimate for a war conducted on such a vast scale; and, secondly, with an inflated currency, it is impossible to estimate correctly the cost of clothing and provisioning the armies. Congress has the most complete confidence in the Government, and does not hesitate to vote the estimates submitted.

Mr. TRENHOLM regards the inflation of the currency and its depreciated value as an evil calling for immediate remedy. No one can deny that a depreciated currency is a gigantic, widespread, and ever-growing evil. The public debt increases in an alarming ratio, seeing that the Government expenditure is made in the high prices consequent on the depreciation of the currency. According to Mr. COBDEN, this is a matter of congratulation, but then Mr. COBDEN is the advocate of the Northern Administration, which looks to repudiation, whereas the South desires to pay its debts. Posterity cannot and will not complain that a large debt was incurred to carry on a war for the salvation of the country; but posterity might complain if the debt imposed upon it was ten times the amount actually received. Moreover, the depreciation of the currency is a serious loss to poor people, to all persons with fixed incomes, and notably to the gallant defenders of their country. The evil is palpable. What is the remedy proposed by Mr. TRENHOLM?

The Confederate SECRETARY of the TREASURY is too versed in business and too able a financier to be guilty of the folly of attempting to get rid of a burden by shifting it from one side to the other. He is not under the delusion that by clever contrivances paper can be transmuted into gold. The Confederacy is shut in from the rest of the world, and cannot exchange her produce for specie; and consequently a sufficient supply of specie cannot be obtained to carry on the business of the country and pay the taxes. What then remains? Since Mr. TRENHOLM cannot reduce the currency with gold, he proposes to reduce it by taxes received in kind. He cannot get gold, but he can get the things which fairly represent gold. Since he cannot have a specie basis for the currency, he will have a wheat, corn, and cotton basis.

Mr. TRENHOLM proposes an Act pledging the faith of the Government against any issue of Treasury notes beyond the amount already authorised. This, of course, is an essential preliminary condition, for it is in vain to try to reduce the volume of the currency, if the Government can at some future time increase it. It is no use pouring out at one end if you are to pour in at the other. Such a process will not relieve the vessel. To facilitate the redemption of the notes, Mr. TRENHOLM suggests that they should be exchanged on demand for Treasury bonds bearing six per cent. interest free from taxation, secured and redeemable in the same way as the notes themselves, and applicable after the war to the payment of the tax in kind. The notes received in exchange for such bonds to be cancelled. In order to increase the value of the Treasury notes, it is suggested that they should be for ever free from taxation. By this provision, it is hoped that confidence will be restored in the Government issues, which confidence, it appears, was greatly impaired by taxing the notes 33 per cent. It must, however, be remembered, that that sweeping measure was not forced upon the people by the Government, but rather forced upon the Government by the patriotic devotion of the people.

We now come to the keystone of Mr. TRENHOLM's plan. He proposes that the tax of 10 per cent., or rather tithe, on cotton, wheat, and corn, shall be redeemable at certain fixed prices—that is to say, cotton at fifty cents a pound, wheat at four dollars per bushel, and corn two dollars per bushel—and that the notes shall be received now and after the war in payment of these commutations. Twenty per cent. of the entire taxation is to be allotted to the reduction of the debt, and the 20 per cent. will be more than obtained from the commuted tithes on the articles above enumerated. Mr. TRENHOLM estimates to receive $90,000,000—or say 18,000,000*l.*—per annum from this source. Certainly he does not exaggerate the probable yield of this tax in kind, as may be seen from the following table:—

	Crops in 1860.	Mr. Trenholm's Estimate.
Cotton .	5,185,645 bales	2,000,000 bales.
Wheat .	42,989,291 bushels	25,000,000 bushels
Corn . .	417,600,804 „	200,000,000 „

It may be said that the crop of cotton has sunk very low, but it is much larger than generally supposed. So far as wheat and corn are concerned, we confess that we are not aware of the reason why Mr. TRENHOLM has placed the production at so low a figure. Making every allowance for the difficulty of collecting taxes in those places which are in the immediate neighbourhood of the theatre of war, and of the many difficulties that are inseparable from the collection of a tax in kind or of commuted tithes, we are persuaded that the Confederate Treasury will receive far more than 18,000,000*l.* sterling per annum from the tax on cotton, wheat, and corn.

But assuming that Mr. TRENHOLM's estimate is correct, then the amount derived from this tax will, in five years, reduce the volume of the currency to about 30,000,000*l.*, or $150,000,000, which amount will be necessary for carrying on the business of the country until the return of peace provides a specie currency. The paper currency being reduced to $150,000,000, will be at a small, if any, discount.

It may be asked what is the Government to do if the people elect to pay their tithes in kind and not in notes? It is not clear whether Mr. TRENHOLM means to make the payment of the commutation compulsory, but we think he does. If not, the Government can use for the supply of its troops more corn and wheat than will be yielded by the tax, and, let Mr. LINCOLN make the blockade as rigid as he likes, the Government will get out far more than 200,000 bales of cotton per annum. If the Government receives the tithes in kind, the notes that would have been spent in purchase will of course be cancelled. After very careful consideration of this scheme in all its bearings, we are hopeful that its adoption will relieve the Confederate States from their present financial difficulty, and will stop the unnatural growth of the public debt.

There are other parts of Mr. Trenholm's report well worth studying, but on which we need not comment. He advises an additional tax of five cents per lb. on the export of cotton—an addition which, he rightly observes, will hardly be felt at the present Liverpool prices. He recommends an additional five cents per lb. on tobacco, and that the duty on imports be doubled. He also recommends alterations in the law to redress some glaring inequalities in the levy of taxes.

Hereafter, according to Mr. Trenholm's plan, the expenditure of the country is to be met from the two legitimate sources of loans and taxes. He estimates the expenditure from the 1st of January next to the 1st of January, 1866, at 154,800,000*l.*, but this includes 12,000,000*l.* for the redemption of the notes, and 22,800,000*l.* for the estimated amount of floating debt. He estimates the absolute expenditure with an improved currency at 120,000,000*l.* He proposes to raise the amount—that is, 154,800,000*l.*—by loan 81,800,000*l.*, and by taxes 73,000,000*l.*, and he is confident that the Government can raise the estimated sums without crippling the resources of the people. We think, upon a candid review of Mr. Trenholm's plan, that European financiers will consider it sound in principle, expedient, and feasible. Loans contracted in the open market, and at the current rate of interest, form the cheapest way in which a Government can obtain money. Our great finance minister, William Pitt, singularly enough, allowed himself to be fettered by a ridiculous usury law, so that, as he never could pay more than five per cent., he was obliged to contract a debt nominally larger than the amount he actually received. We know now that Pitt committed a costly blunder. We know that as the credit of a government improves it is able to borrow money at less and less interest; and though the amount of the principal of the debt may remain stationary, the amount of interest will decrease under favourable circumstances. But for that fatal usury law and for Pitt's extraordinary reverence for it, the public debt of England, instead of being nearly 800,000,000*l.*, would not have exceeded 500,000,000*l.*, and our annual interest at the present moment would have been about 16,000,000*l.* instead of 27,000,000*l.* per annum. We trust that the Confederate States having this great lesson before them will not commit the like blunder, but, remembering that their interest will decrease in times of peace, take care not to increase the volume of the debt for the sake of paying rather a lower interest for the next few years—if indeed they do pay a lower interest—for it must not be forgotten that a government needs to sell more bonds at a discount than at par to obtain a required amount.

The taxation estimated by Mr. Trenholm is about the same as the amount raised in this country in times of peace; but it will be remarked by those who criticise Mr. Trenholm's scheme that it is to be levied on a population about one-third of the population of the United Kingdom, and that whereas the taxation of this country is about 2*l.* 10*s.* per head, the taxation proposed by Mr. Trenholm is at the rate of about 8*l.* per head of the population. Under normal circumstances, we do not believe that the Confederate States could pay taxes at the rate of 8*l.* per head of the population; but then we have to deal with abnormal circumstances. Allowing for the inflation of the currency, the 73,000,000*l.* per annum that Mr. Trenholm proposes to raise by taxes is not more in specie value than 8,000,000*l.* or 9,000,000*l.* per annum, or 1*l.* per head of the population, and not more than two-fifths of the taxation per head levied in this country; and as the paper currency is withdrawn, the amount required for the Government will be less and less, because there will be less floating debt to redeem, and the fall in prices will diminish the expenditure of the Government.

The question will be suggested to the minds of some of our readers, why was this plan not tried before, and why did the Confederate States incur avoidable difficulties? We reply that, in the first place, the Confederates did not expect and were not prepared for war. Had they deemed war imminent when they resolved to secede, it would have been easy to transfer the bulk of their then stock of cotton to Europe, and so have obtained a very large supply of gold and such a credit on this side as would have kept down the price of exchange. When war did break out it was thought that, though the contest would be sharp, it would be short, and that, when the North saw that secession was the unanimous work of the Southern people, it would cease from the vain attempt at subjugation and sheath the sword. No one in the North, unless perhaps the Administration, believed in a long war. When the cost of the war was estimated at about half the amount of the present debt, leading Northerners said, 'We shan't spend that—we shan't ruin ourselves to get back the South; if she won't come back after one or two campaigns, we shall let her go.' Mr. Seward was conscious of the feeling of the country; he knew in 1861 and 1862 that the only way to obtain money and recruits was to delude people with the idea that peace was at hand, and hence his many dishonoured drafts of ninety and sixty and thirty days. Well, the South too believed in speedy peace, although perfectly reconciled to a long war in case of need. Therefore every budget, until the present one, has been more or less a budget of mere expediency framed in view of the approaching termination of the contest. At length, whether peace is near or distant, the Confederate States are about to legislate financially for a long-continued war. If peace comes soon, so much the better; if not, still the finances of the Confederacy will go on improving—that is, so far as the currency is concerned. The debt indeed will increase, but it will be a burden easily borne by a people made by a long war totally self-dependent, and yet to whose ports the nations of the world will resort, when peace is concluded, for those precious staples which no other country yields in such profusion or in such perfection. To the South, peace means the commencement of an era of prosperity and riches, but to the North the culmination of insolvency and ruin. Yet both communities are interested in the war being quickly brought to an end. The sooner the struggle is over, the sooner will the South enjoy the full blessings of her prolific land. The longer the war is protracted, the more terrible will be the disaster in which the North will be involved.

EARL RUSSELL'S REPLY TO THE CONFEDERATE MANIFESTO.

Foreign Office: November 25, 1864.

Gentlemen,—I have had the honour to receive the copy which you have sent me of the manifesto issued by the Congress of the so-called Confederate States of America.

Her Majesty's Government deeply lament the protracted nature of the struggle between the Northern and Southern States of the formerly United Republic of North America.

Great Britain has since 1783 remained, with the exception of a short period, connected by friendly relations with both the Northern and the Southern States. Since the commencement of the civil war, which broke out in 1861, Her Majesty's Government have continued to entertain sentiments of friendship equally for the North and the South. Of the causes of the rupture Her Majesty's Government have never presumed to judge; they deplore the commencement of this sanguinary trouble, and anxiously look forward to the period of its termination. In the meantime they are convinced that they best consult the interests of peace, and respect the rights of all parties, by observing a strict and impartial neutrality. Such a neutrality Her Majesty has faithfully maintained, and will continue to maintain.

I request you, Gentlemen, to accept the assurances of the very high consideration with which

I have the honour to be, Gentlemen,
Your most obedient, humble servant,
Russell.

THE FIRST HERO OF THE WAR.*

The volume before us purports to be a history of the life of General Jackson from his childhood until the close of the campaign in the Valley in the winter of 1861-62. The work is a labour of love, for the book is published for the benefit of the widow and child of General Jackson. This fact alone would disarm criticism, if the author had stood in need of a protecting shield. While, however, he undoubtedly exhibits vulnerable points, he yet possesses qualities sufficient to constitute a defence against fatal attacks. His faults, however, are readily stated, and in justice to the readers who will inevitably be attracted by the subject of his toil, they shall precede his virtues.

Perspicuity of style could not be claimed for the Professor even by an ardent admirer. Indeed, he is singularly devoid of that genius which brings before the eye the panorama of a battle, or before the mind the portrait of a man's character. He is verbose and not methodical. He is liable at any moment to break out into an elaborate disquisition on morals or religion. His loyalty to the object of his admiration betrays him into strong and undignified condemnation of the chiefs of the Confederate army and of the Secretary of State. When he touches on sacred ground, he is not replete with charity; he is dogmatic beyond measure, both in the theory and practice of Christianity; he has even gone out of his way to launch a weak but violent invective, such as the hero of his story would never have approved, against the doctrines and maxims of the Roman Catholic faith. In the opposite scale, however, many excellent virtues may be thrown. His materials have been ample, and he has used them with industry. His heart is in his work, and he has omitted no exertion to make all men know Jackson as he himself understands him. Nothing is neglected. The moral nature of the warrior is not drawn as Gibbon or Macaulay might have sketched it, with one stroke of the pen, in one grand epigram of description. On the contrary, the Professor appears to revolve round the star of his worship in unwearied circles. He approaches and recedes, striving to judge the effect of the brilliant luminary from every point of observation. His examination is never complete, never once for all satisfied. He is unwilling or unable to solve the problem, but he will consume endless formulæ in approximations to the truth. The Professor is, of course, thoroughly at home in Virginia, and his grasp of the geographical features of the campaign of 1861 is singularly able. He comprehends and demonstrates the doctrine of secession; on the slavery question he dilates with much success. His statement of the grounds upon which the Confederacy has complained, and does complain, of the attitude of the European Powers, is so complete that we are tempted to quote his words:—

> Men have seen fit to adopt the slanders of our known enemies as the only description of our institutions, and have refused us the poor privilege which even the criminal has, of being heard before he is condemned. The word slaveowner has been the talisman to evoke everywhere an ignorant prejudice, too conceited to learn correction; and men have been willing to accept the rendering which it suits the malice of our enemies to give, falsely, as they know—that we are contending, not to preserve our own freedom, but to perpetuate the bondage of our fellowmen, unjustly enslaved. It is by this device our enemies have sought to hide the enormity of their attacks, and to rob us of even the sympathy of mankind. The Confederate States have, indeed, never complained of the refusal of aid to fight their battles, for they have never asked it. But they have a right to complain, that the interested slanders of their enemies should be echoed abroad without even examination; that the moral support of a recognition should be withheld, when it is an historical fact that the independence of several of those same States was recognised by all Europe eighty years ago, and, as is known to all the world, has never since been forfeited; that the maritime law, so recently and solemnly established for all nations, should be compelled to receive a new and deceitful interpretation for the benefit of our enemies, the moment it began to apply in our favour; and that a pretended neutrality should be so observed as to make every advantage accrue to them.

The doctrine that men inherit the virtues and vices of their progenitors stands not in need of proof. The families of the English aristocracy can furnish a thousand illustrations. Thomas Jonathan Jackson was no exception to the rule. Scotland was the cradle of his race; Ireland nurtured it, along with the family whence sprang the conqueror of New Orleans, until one John Jackson, born in Ireland and reared in London, transplanted in 1748 the stock into the hero-nurturing soil of the Old Dominion. There it took deep root, and branched out superbly. Into it was grafted Elizabeth Cummins, a woman 'with the stomach and mettle of a man,' who, far away in the North-west, was not afraid to confront the Red Indian in defence of her homestead and her cattle, and who, living to the age of 105 years, saw her descendants in the enjoyment of broad acres and high consideration. Then, again, there was the mother of the hero, who met death with a fortitude that amazed the witnesses, and of whom her husband declared that 'he had known few women of equal, none of superior merit.' Lastly, there was Cummins Jackson, a strong, brave, temperate, energetic man, a grand old country gentleman withal, liberal and kind, full of wild adventure and boisterous humour, fond of horses and horse-racing, so possessed with the charm of fearless enterprise as in the decline of life to leave his home and penetrate the unexplored regions of California, leading along a brave company of gold-finders. To Thomas Jonathan Jackson the house of Cummins was always open; and though the old sportsman loved to see his nephew on the country racecourse steering some Sir Peter Laurie to victory—for Jackson could win races as easily as battles—yet the religious tone of the General's mind never tempted him to speak of his uncle in the terms which the peculiar views of the Professor deem applicable to a lover of sport. The first evidence of the inheritance by Jackson of the energy of Elizabeth Cummins was afforded when, at the age of fourteen, he, in company with his brother, went down the Ohio River, cut firewood on a lonely island of the Father of Waters, and returned home half dead with ague. Until his migration to West Point in July 1842, at the age of eighteen years, he continued to live with his uncle, having, however, held for a short period the office of Constable or Under-Sheriff in the county of Lewis. With West Point his career as before the world commences, for with him at West Point begins the history of the war which has immortalised him. The names of his classmates are sufficient to call up a thousand scenes of stirring courage, noble devotion, disappointed ambition. Among them was General M'Clellan, formerly the pride of the North, now a man without even a commission in that army which once believed him to be the antitype of Bonaparte. There was also the glorious Hill, on whom Hancock has so often vainly hurled the masses of the crack 2nd Corps of the Federal army. There were Pickett Maury and Wilcox, and the Northern generals Stoneman, Foster, and Gibbon. We may readily believe that in Jackson—the plodder who, by sheer perseverance, rose from fiftieth in his class to the respectable but not eminent position of seventeenth—his comrades did not recognise the warrior who, on the ridge above Bull Run, in answer to the cry of General Bee that the enemy were beating back the Southerners, commanded the Stonewall brigade to 'sweep the field with the bayonet.'

In 1847, T. J. Jackson, as second lieutenant, accompanied the expedition of General Wingfield Scott to Mexico. It is impossible to follow within our limits the course of the campaign which resulted in the storming of the capital. But nothing is more striking than the promise which was then given by the officers who have since risen to eminence in the Southern army. It was the skilful flank attack planned by Captain Robert E. Lee, of the Engineers, which won the fight of Cerro Gordo. There Captain John Bankhead Magruder won brilliant distinction for the unprecedented success of the light field battery. There Lieutenant-Colonel J. S. Johnstone was wounded. At Churubusco and in front of the Castle of Chapultepec, Jackson performed deeds of sublime heroism, and astounded even the gallant Magruder by serving, with the aid of one sergeant, his last available gun against the concentrated fire of a powerful battery. Jackson's courage was neither unobserved nor unrewarded; he was noticed frequently in the despatches, and as frequently received promotion, passing within seven months all the grades from brevet second lieutenant up to that of major. In March 1851, Jackson, wearied of the lazy routine of garrison life, accepted the chair of Natural and Experimental Philosophy and Artillery Tactics in the Military Academy of Virginia. The climate of Lexington, the nature of the studies over which he presided, the opportunites afforded him of scientific progress, and, what in his eyes was superlatively precious, the cultivation of religious thought and knowledge in the society of earnest theologians, combined to render his life from 1851 to 1861 happy and useful, to elevate the noble instincts of his soul, to arm the massive force of his resolute will, and to complete the pure, strong, and heroic man. In 1856 he visited England, Belgium, France, and Switzerland, and in 1857 he married Miss Mary Anna Morrison, of North Carolina. The offspring of the marriage was one daughter, born in November 1862.

On April 13, 1861, Fort Sumter fell, and the Yankee nation rose to arms with the ecstasy of a people vain of its own power and contemptuous of its foe. Among the earliest preparations of the Confederates was the formation of Camp Lee, just outside Richmond. Thither at once came Major Jackson with the Lexington cadets, to drill the Virginian patriots who had volunteered for their State. In May, General Johnstone assumed the command at Harper's Ferry, and Colonel Jackson was assigned to the command of the brigade which, consisting of the 2nd, 4th, 5th, 27th, and 33rd Virginia Regiments, won at Bull Run the undying name of the Stonewall brigade. The first proof that the ancient fire of Jackson still burned, and the first example of the unblushing falsehood which has throughout the war stained the fame of the Northern officers, were exhibited on the same day. In the combat of Haines' Farm, Colonel Jackson, with only 380 men and one piece of artillery, for three hours withstood the onslaught of Cadwallader's brigade, 3,000 strong, under General Patterson. Jackson lost twelve men, killed and wounded. Forty-five Federals were captured, and the numerous covered wagons of the Dutch farmers which went to the rear with blood dripping through the seams of the boards, testified to the murderous accuracy of the Southern fire. In his official report General Patterson had the audacity to declare that he had repulsed 10,000 rebels, with the loss of one man killed. Jackson was immediately made a Brigadier-General. In July came the glorious battle of Manassas, in which the handful of men under Beauregard inflicted on the host of M'Dowell the most disgraceful defeat ever endured by men of European descent. In the description of this action, Professor Dabney is exceedingly happy; and had the intended diagrams been added, the story of the fight would have approximated to the panoramic style of Creasy. The Professor endeavours at some length to show that had Jackson been in command the whole Confederate army would have advanced to Washington to the capture of the capital and the overthrow of the Northern Government; and it must be admitted that the eagerness with which President Davis urged the pursuit of the shattered foe lends colour to that doctrine. On October 7 Jackson was made Major-General, and took the command of the country lying between the Blue Ridge and the Alleghany Mountains, bidding farewell to his brigade in words which will never fade from the recollection of the heroes of the Second War of Independence.

Of the man Thomas Jonathan Jackson we must here speak concisely. In person he was tall, erect, and muscular, with large hands and feet. His bearing was peculiarly English. He had a brow fair and expansive, blue eyes, a grand Roman nose, ruddy and sunburnt cheeks, and his beard was of a comely brown. He strode as he walked, he was a fine horseman, and had a noble appearance as bareheaded he rode along the line of battle while the shouts of his men rent the skies. In mind he was so broadly excelling as to defy the efforts of a hasty portraiture. If it be once admitted that a great warrior must be a man of superhuman intellectual power; if to entrance the imaginations, not only of fellow-soldiers and fellow-citizens, but of the world, argues a soul sublime in its divine grandeur; if purity of manners, deep religious convictions, an abiding faith in the ever-present guidance of an omnipotent God, indicate a holy and humble spirit, then, indeed, through all ages of the world will Thomas Jonathan Jackson stand out on the page of history a hero rarely equalled, never surpassed. Whether the peculiar views he formed on the principles and practice of religion, and whether the particular school of theologians whose teaching he imbibed, served to contract or to enlarge his character, may well be questioned. On such a point men will form opinions in accord rather with their own acquired ideas than with sober judgment. It is enough for us here with all modesty to ask men to remember that with the blood of Jackson has the cause of the South been consecrated, and to demand whether it is no argument in her favour that men like Jackson have fought and died for her.

Can it possibly be true that such as he was have devoted themselves with unhesitating self-sacrifice for a cause which is 'impious, vile, accursed in the sight of God and man,' as some persons are never wearied of protesting? What, too, is to be said of the heroism of men pure and holy in their lives and deaths as were Stuart and Polk—ay, even of that living type of the Christian gentleman, Robert E. Lee? Surely such as these drive as chaff before the wind the maddened invectives of men who dare to regard the chivalry of the South as the despair of savages, and her genius as the skill of devils.

FICTIONS.*

SPIRITUALISM, or whatever else we ought to call it, does not make so much noise in the world as it made some years ago. The intense absurdity of some of the manifestations, the obvious dishonesty of some of the practitioners, the entire want of purpose and coherence which characterised the whole system, prevented its taking any deep hold on the opinions of men of business, who had neither the time nor the taste for investigations of a purely speculative kind. But it retained its place in the studies and affections of a different order of minds. Of the existing votaries of the art, some belong to the feebler and more fanciful class of literary men and women, others to the social aristocracy of England. They have for the most part two characteristics in common—minds rather amiable and refined than strong and practical, and an ample sufficiency of leisure. Indeed, the most damaging evidence against spiritualism is perhaps the general character of the minds in which it finds a reception. There are some exceptions, and one of them is a very remarkable one—being no other than a Professor of Mathematics, an acute, hard-headed reasoner, thoroughly versed in the theory of probabilities and the laws of evidence. But, as a general rule, few have been converted to a zealous belief in the doctrines, or even a vivid interest in the phenomena of the spiritualists, who have not been naturally predisposed in that direction.

Great mischief has been done by the mental deficiencies of nearly all the persons who have written on the subject. They do not understand the laws of evidence, and they do not care to distinguish clearly between inferences and phenomena. They believe energetically, and they are not careful to give the outer world an account of the unmistakable facts upon which they base their very fallible conclusions. They mix up what they have been told with what they have seen, and what they infer with both. The only exception to this rule with which we are acquainted is furnished by Mr. R. Dale Owen's work, 'Footsteps on the Boundary of another World.' This gentleman is careful in every case to state the exact process by which the stories he relates became known to him. Even he does not understand the laws of evidence. A. told him that A. B. C. D. E.... had seen a ghost, and he thinks that he has the independent testimony of the whole alphabet. The truth is, he has only A.'s; for if A. lied, she may as well have lied with regard to the testimony of her companions as with regard to the subject of their vision. But most of the spiritualists have no idea what evidence means. And we regret to say that the biographer of the Brothers Davenport is no exception to the rule.

For four-fifths of the miracles of which they were the subjects we have no evidence at all. Dr. Nichols does not tell us who told him that Ira was carried through the air for several yards, and across a river; nor does he say who told him that William was inspired to make certain discoveries by a ghost, which were afterwards verified in a startling manner. We are obliged on this account to set aside the whole account of what happened to them before their recent arrival in England. There is no evidence of it. No witnesses are cited except themselves and the persons now travelling with them; that is, the only witnesses called are those accused of complicity. This might be said to afford strong presumption against the brothers. But in fairness we must observe that an honest and unconcerned person of high capacity and character fails to recognise this defect of evidence; it is therefore quite possible that what Dr. Nichols conceives to be satisfactory proof may seem such to the accused themselves. There is no amount of stupidity in regard to the value of evidence which may not be fairly attributed to a spiritualist.

'Macaria' is an American novel. Where its scene is laid we have great difficulty in ascertaining; it is in some Southern town, and, in the absence of distinct assertion, we suppose it to be Charleston. The hero is the son of a poor gentleman, who had committed manslaughter on an insulting creditor, had been found guilty of murder, and anticipated the gallows by suicide. The heroine is the daughter of a leading man of the city, whose persecution had contributed to the victim's fate. She is intended to be a very high-spirited and charming girl; she is made very self-willed and petulant—so petulant that at first we concluded, as a matter of course, that the girl of fourteen who fairly set her father at defiance, and persisted in riding and walking with forbidden friends, must be a denizen of the North. The whole interest of the story arises out of the father's cruelty in forbidding his daughter to associate with the children of a felon, and her obstinate disobedience. In England, the story would have come to an end in the fifth chapter, with the whipping wherewith the disobedient Irene is very properly threatened; but they manage things—and children—differently in America. Irene perseveres through years of estrangement from her father and separation from her friends; and finally, at the close, displaying a filial reverence which she had never before thought necessary, refuses the hero out of respect for the father whom she had so long defied and disobeyed on this very point. Northern bullets terminate the lives of the gentlemen, and the ladies devote themselves to Southern hospitals. Altogether, the story is not satisfactory. But there are episodes here and there which are not deficient in spirit, and on the whole it is possible, after Irene emerges from childhood, to read her story without too impatient a sympathy with her father's opinion of her deserts.

'Uncle Angus' is a much better book. It has faults, and serious faults—improbabilities, exaggerations, caricatures—but it has countervailing merits, and above all it has the supreme merit of being thoroughly readable. Having got half through the first volume as a matter of duty, we found it difficult to lay the book down till we had read it through. The characters are all distinct, most of them possible, and none of them very inconsistent with itself. It is, perhaps, taking too great a liberty with public opinion and probability to represent a usurer as a high-minded affectionate gentleman; and the ignorance of accounts and incapacity for business manifested by both the literary men is simply absurd. We object, too, to the extravagance with which the villain of the story is bedaubed with black. An elegant and cultivated gentleman in public, he is made to act behind the scenes the parts of forger, bully, ruffian, and bigamist; and finally, when detected on the verge of consummating his last crime, he attempts to shoot his wife, before a dozen witnesses, as the cause of his exposure. This is an exaggeration; but it is, perhaps, atoned by the very fitting retribution which overtakes the criminal. Other villains of fiction are hanged, drowned, horsewhipped, shot, or commit suicide; Clifford Chessington is got rid of in a much more artistic way. He seeks the shelter of the United States consulate; professes a wish to join the Federal army; accepts a commission in that congenial service; and is last heard of as the comrade of Butler and M'Neil, a brigadier-general in the hordes of Abraham Lincoln. Could a scoundrel receive a more fitting reward? For the rest, the story is sober, and the characters are natural and pleasant. Angus, the hard-headed, kind-hearted, rough-handed man of business; Alexander, his brother, the unbusiness-like man of letters; his wife, who disposes where he proposes; their daughter, high-spirited, wilful, petulant, but capable of good; their nephew Charlie, an idler and poet, fond of his squirrel and his friends, grateful, simple, and capable of anything except a scene or a meanness; Jessie, his little Quaker cousin and sweetheart; Fitzharding, the rich donkey, with a literary taste—all are well drawn, and almost all are interesting. The scenes among the Quakers are probably a little too strongly drab-coloured, and the last hours of Mr. Boodle's 'young man' are a little more natural than is in good taste in a work of art, but both are good, and the work generally is well worth reading.

'Percy Talbot' narrates the career of a well-bred, clever, fashionable fortune-hunter, with considerable tact and spirit. The hero is first introduced to us making himself agreeable in the sick-room of an elderly miser, with a niece in attendance, whom Mr. Talbot proposes to marry. The niece is discarded, the old man dies, a legacy is left to Mr. Talbot, and the bulk of the property to Miss Fleming. Mr. Talbot devotes himself to Miss Fleming, who proves to be a charming girl, but the wrong one. Finding this out in time (a fortune-hunter would have taken care not to make that mistake), he transfers his affection to the right lady, taking care to break the heart of the wrong one by way of revenging himself for the sneers of a friend and rival who had detected his purposes. He marries the heiress, while loving her namesake; and, finally, is goaded by his wife into shooting himself. The story is well told. In some respects it resembles that of the 'Small House at Allington.' But Mr. Talbot is an inferior creation to Crosbie, while his conduct is more skilful and less outrageous. He shows none of Crosbie's violent shame and remorse; nor does he, like Crosbie, fall into a snare, however willingly. His misdeeds are done with deliberate calculation and of malice aforethought; and he feels no shame, and no remorse, till he suffers their consequences. But, on the other hand, he takes care not to commit himself by an open proposal, and leaves no right to any one to play the part of John Eames. The story is skilfully worked out, and though its catastrophe is unsatisfactory, and leaves everything unsettled, the interest of the reader does not diminish towards the close. We hope better things from the author of 'Percy Talbot.'

EUROPE AND THE WAR IN AMERICA.—The truth is, that our whole trade suffers terribly by the American war. We are losers thereby to the tune of more millions a year than it would cost us to put a stop to it for ever. The cotton trade is going to absolute ruin. No one can adventure his fortune on the production of cotton, or on the accumulation of yarn or cloth, because no one knows but that peace in America might, ere it was sold, reduce the value of his stock by 60 per cent., and consign him to the Bankruptcy Court. So Lancashire is idle, hungry, and demoralised, and must be so while the war continues. What is going on in France is kept in the dark; but it can hardly be much better with Mulhausen than with Manchester. And for these evils there is no possible remedy but in the adoption of prompt measures to bring the war to a close. France and England, acting together, can do this. They have simply to say what nearly all the educated men in either country feel—have only to give effect peacefully and fearlessly to the sympathies of their subjects, and the war will not last six months. Hitherto they have given a strong moral support to the North by adopting on every occasion the interpretation of neutrality most favourable to the stronger Power. Let them reverse this conduct. Let them notify the Federal Government that if any more recruits are shipped for New York the Confederates will be allowed to consider the Foreign Enlistment Act suspended in their favour. Let them open their ports to the vessels of war of both Powers with their prizes. Let them recognise the Confederate States, and send ambassadors to President Davis. Let them demand prompt satisfaction for every injury or affront received from the Northern Government, its envoys, and its officers. All these steps are strictly in accordance with neutrality; the only one concerning which any question could be raised is that of recognition, and we have proved over and over again that no state in a position half so strong as that of the South was ever before refused admission into the family of nations. By taking these simple, neutral, lawful measures, without a threat or a blow, the European Powers would virtually terminate the war. At present they are mainly instrumental in prolonging it.—Standard.

THE CONFEDERATE CAUSE IN FRANCE.

FROM A CONFEDERATE CORRESPONDENT.

THE FRENCH PRESS ON MR. LINCOLN'S RE-ELECTION—PRESIDENT DAVIS'S MESSAGE—THE CIRCULAR OF THE CONFEDERATE COMMISSIONERS.

PARIS: November 30.

THE re-election of Mr. Lincoln has, during a week past, formed the general topic of discussion with the whole of the Paris press. I send you a short analysis of the statements which have been put forth on this subject by the several journals.

THE 'CONSTITUTIONNEL.'

The Constitutionnel expresses itself with a degree of prudence on this important event, and remarks as follows:—

There is no longer the least uncertainty; it is a war of extermination, it is conquest, the submission of the South by force of cannon, which is desired by the majority of the Northern people.

This journal then exposes the terrible consequences of the contest, and is appalled at the proportions which it now assumes:—

If we cannot be deceived respecting the dominating spirit which has taken possession of the Northern States, we cannot, on the other hand, entertain any doubts whatever as to the firm determination of the Southern States to resist to the last extremity.

The above extract, in which we recognise the clear and resolute style of M. Marie-Martin, concludes with some sympathising remarks in favour of the South.

THE 'PAYS.'

This twin-brother of the Constitutionnel seems likewise somewhat puzzled to characterise the election of Mr. Lincoln with any degree of clearness. Having, however, less restraint than the Constitutionnel, it is more bold—perhaps more imprudent.

The Pays (it remarks) has no reason whatever to regret the personal success of Mr. Lincoln.

On the contrary, probably; but it laments that this success should have for its result—

The continuation of an extreme and implacable policy, which causes torrents of blood to flow in vain, and which heaps up ruins to reach an impossible goal.

Nevertheless, as—

Any other President would have continued the war commenced by the North against the South, and would not, perhaps, have acknowledged the empire of Mexico,

Mr. Lincoln's maintenance in the Presidency is not to be regretted.

No; it is rather

The stubbornness of the Washington Government in seeking to impose upon the Government of Richmond a union with which the Confederate States will have nothing to do at any price.

THE 'PATRIE.'

The usual editor of the American articles published by the Patrie, M. Aucaigne, has raised a difficulty with respect to Mr. Lincoln, which none, probably, had thought of. He remarks that in 1860, the entire Union having taken part in the election, Europe saw in Mr. Lincoln the representative of all the States, but in the election of the present year, the South not having voted, we have a right to ask:—

Whether Europe can continue to recognise officially in Mr. Lincoln the President of the United States.

This novel way of considering the election has greatly annoyed the Opinion Nationale, which exclaims—not without some show of anger:—

Mr. Lincoln is, was, and shall be, the legitimate President of all the United States.

That is possible, replies the Patrie, but it is almost equal to saying—

As the Pope is the legitimate sovereign of the Marshes and of Umbria, and as the King Francis II. is sovereign of the Two Sicilies.

It is therefore true that—

The United States have ceased to be the United States, and that Mr. Lincoln has ceased to be, constitutionally, the President of the Union.

The Opinion Nationale (continues the Patrie) objects, with good reason, that the ex-King Francis II. should style himself King of Naples, and makes some cutting jokes respecting the address of the Austrian Archdukes, who have still at some courts their accredited ambassadors. We will never say anything so bad of the address of the United States Legation at Paris, but we are certainly surprised to find that the title should remain when the position no longer exists, and that Mr. Lincoln should still style himself President of the United States when he has ceased to be such, both by the force of events and by the weakness of the ballot.

THE 'NATION.'

The Nation seems to have formed a more correct opinion than the other journals as to the position in which the Americans themselves and the European Powers are placed by the re-election of Mr. Lincoln.

Considering that this re-election, effected by a portion only of the original United States, deprives Mr. Lincoln of the moral right of regarding himself as President of all the old Union, the Nation declares that it is the duty of Europe at the present time to acknowledge the South. The following is the passage referred to:—

So long as the American people could with justice see in Mr. Lincoln and his Government the President and the Government of the United States—that is to say, of the entire Union—it was necessarily justified in regarding the secessionists as rebels, and, under this title, they might seek to compel them, at whatever cost, to reenter the Union. But at the present time this is no longer the case, and not even the bare shadow of a right can now be invoked by the people of the North.

Evidently it is now for Europe to take a step to which, up to the present moment, she has objected; that which she refused so long as the North could assume even the semblance of a right she should grant now that secession is legally consummated. The two confederations, that of the North and that of the South, should be acknowledged by Europe unless the bases for some arrangement between the two countries be immediately established; a result for which, notwithstanding all opposition, we cannot yet cease to hope.

THE 'FRANCE.'

This journal gives full consideration to the consequences of the election; it counsels the new President—

To be no longer the instrument of a fierce party which is destroying the greatness, the prosperity, the liberties, and the future of North America; to abandon all efforts to overcome the indomitable resistance of the Confederates, resolved, if need be, to bury themselves beneath the ashes of their ruined city; and to cease to speak of slavery, which is but a pretext for war, and which has never served any other purpose than that of a lying label for an oppressive policy.

THE 'GLOBE.'

M. Castille's journal thus expresses itself respecting the result of the Republican candidate's nomination:—

We may now anticipate the propagation of a series of laws authorising new loans and fresh conscriptions. Abraham Lincoln's Government has already expended, most uselessly, ten thousand millions of francs in three years; this, say they, was doing things on too small a scale, and now they are to be done on a more extensive one. We are prepared for all we may hear of a party to which the 8th of November afforded a victory which it has not been able to obtain on a field of battle at the cost of a million men.

THE 'MÉMORIAL DIPLOMATIQUE.'

The most nufavourable estimate which has ever been made here of Mr Lincoln has appeared in this journal, which is, as you are aware, the avowed organ of the Emperor Maximilian.

After having reviewed the administration of Mr. Lincoln, and proved that, with unlimited power and resources, he has been unable to advance the conquest of the South a single step, the Mémorial judges him as a soldier, as a politician, as an orator, and as a moralist, and concludes that the Presidential seat of Washington, of Jefferson, and of Madison, was never before occupied by so insignificant a personage.

MR. DAVIS'S MESSAGE.

This document has been reproduced, in part, by nearly all the Paris journals.

According to the Constitutionnel, it furnishes proof that the determination of the Southern States is to resist to the last extremity.

The Pays is convinced that 'the bold and manly accent by which it is pervaded denotes an invincible resolution.'

The Patrie acknowledges that the complaints of the President respecting the indifference shown by Europe are natural, and considers his language to be 'very worthy, very firm, eminently wise, prudent, and patriotic.'

The Journal des Débats also considers Mr. Davis's language to be 'bold and manly, and betraying no signs either of discouragement or of weariness;' it thinks, however, that the resources of the South are weakening, and interprets the Message as a desperate appeal to France and England. 'The North,' adds the Débats, 'does not solicit the support of any one.'

M. Dréolle, of the Patrie, has sharply refuted this false interpretation:—

This is indeed a most unfortunate reflection. Does the Débats then forget that the North, which does not call on any for their support, has not ceased during the last two years to use every effort in its power to prevent the acknowledgment of the South, because such an acknowledgment would be its ruin? Is not the absolute neutrality observed by Europe a considerable support to the North? If the South looks towards France and England, it is because (as the Morning Post stated yesterday) these two countries are involuntarily protecting the North by not acknowledging the right of the South to form an independent State. Let this protection be withdrawn from the North, and the Débats will soon see how much its supreme contempt for foreign support is worth.

The Débats is unable to make any reply to this.

The circular of the Confederate Commissioners has been published in all the Paris journals, the Opinion Nationale excepted, and its tone and spirit have been eulogised by nearly all of them.

The Gazette de France believes with regret that this step of the Confederate envoys will be barren in its results, and that they will fail to interest the London and Paris cabinets in favour of their cause.

If the South (it observes) wishes to be independent, it must be content to gain its independence by its own heroism. The Governments of France and of England will still continue to wish it well, but these wishes will not enable it to subdue Grant's army.

The France observes that this circular 'states very precisely, and in terms full of justice and moderation, the cause for which the South is now fighting with so much energy.' Speaking of the manifesto which accompanies this note, the France remarks:—

The true cause and the real aim of the war, the ardent desire to conquer and to enforce respect for the independence of the South, have never been set forth with greater firmness, moderation, and proof.

I regret that the length of this letter prevents me, at the present, from informing you of the opinions expressed on the subject by the Opinion Nationale, the Temps, the Siècle, and the Débats. Suffice it to say that M. Malespine and M. Prévost-Paradol join hands and sing the praises of Mr. Lincoln.

In conclusion, let me mention two learned articles on the Florida question which have appeared in the Gazette des Tribunaux. These articles, which escaped my notice last week, are written by M. Charles, and deserve the greatest consideration.

AFFAIRS FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

WEDNESDAY EVENING.

MONEY AND DISCOUNT MARKET.

THE money market, after having assumed an appearance of easiness, has now become slightly altered, and, instead of an expected further drop in the rate from 7 to 6 per cent., the tendency seems once more upward. A few days ago the bankers and brokers were charging only $6\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. for first-class short-dated paper; they are now raising the terms to $6\frac{7}{8}$ and 7, and if the same character of inquiry continues, the average quotation will in the course of next week be slightly above this figure. It is quite evident that the late reduction in the rate has afforded those who required them facilities to secure supplies of gold and silver for the East, of which Egypt for the moment is taking the greater proportion, for the totals will be required for India and Japan. It is believed that, owing to orders coming forward, the price of silver will advance, and if this shall prove the case, the strain on the market will be proportionally increased. Recently there have been good supplies from America and the West Indies and Mexico, but they have been more or less swallowed up to provide for the continental and Indian enquiry. Nothing can be more certain, from what is daily transpiring, than that the prospect of any cheap money is again removed till the spring, since, in additton to the ordinary enquiry for general wants, the new loans announced will withdraw a rather full total from circulation. Exceptionally this state of things may be beneficial, as it will prevent the revival of ephemeral enterprise and check too large an influx of financial transactions. Even the best and shortest paper could not this afternoon be done below $6\frac{7}{8}$, and the terms were more commonly 7 per cent. Through the half-monthly settlements at the Stock Exchange, the rate for advances has been exceedingly high.

BULLION AND SPECIE MOVEMENTS.

The bullion market does not this week present any very favourable features. Since the reduction in the Bank rate, gold has been taken from the Bank to a greater extent than for some time past, and it is believed that a considerable quantity more will shortly be required for foreign purposes. The amount sent in this week has been only 60,000*l.*, whilst the withdrawals have reached 358,000*l.* The arrivals of specie have been to a fair extent, comprising 212,740*l.* from New York, and 448,800*l.* from the West Indies and Pacific, making a total of 661,540*l.* The Brazil mail is now on its way from Lisbon, and will bring about 53,000*l.* The silver market has been rather quiet within the past week, but prices are rather firmer. Bar is quoted at $61\frac{3}{8}$d. per oz., and Mexican dollars at 61*d.* to $61\frac{1}{2}$d. per oz. Neither of the vessels known to be on their way from Australia has yet been heard of, although over due.

HOME AND FOREIGN SECURITIES.

Notwithstanding the reduction in the rate of discount on Thursday last, and the continued easy state of the money market, English securities have been very dull and heavy, and the tendency is still in a downward direction. Business, however, has been fairly active, but an apprehension appears to be entertained that, now money has become cheaper, there will not only be a fresh introduction of new companies, but that gold will be withdrawn in considerable quantities from the Bank to meet foreign wants. The foreign stock market is likewise generally depressed, the only exception being in Spanish, which have considerably advanced in consequence of a belief being once more entertained that the outstanding claims are likely to be satisfactorily adjusted. Consols closed this evening at $90\frac{3}{8}$ to $90\frac{1}{2}$ for money, and $89\frac{1}{8}$ to $89\frac{1}{4}$ ex div. for the account, which, as compared with the quotations of this day week, is a fall of $\frac{7}{8}$ per cent. Exchequer bills, on the other hand, are tolerably steady—the March issue being still at 5*s.* dis. to par, and those of June 6*s.* to 1*s.* dis. Greek stock has declined $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., the present quotation being $22\frac{1}{2}$ to 23. Mexican are steady, being only $\frac{1}{8}$ per cent. lower, the quotation standing at $29\frac{1}{4}$ to $29\frac{3}{8}$. Spanish Passives are $33\frac{1}{4}$ to $33\frac{1}{2}$, and the Certificates $15\frac{1}{4}$ to $15\frac{1}{2}$, being a rise respectively of $2\frac{7}{8}$ and $1\frac{3}{4}$ per cent. Turkish Six per Cents. of 1854, are 87 to 88, being a fall of $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., and those of 1862 at $71\frac{1}{4}$ to $71\frac{3}{4}$, or a decline of $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.

THE NEW DANUBIAN LOAN.

The new loan for the United Danubian Principalities has been officially announced. It is for 916,000*l.* at the price of 86 for each 100*l.* stock. The interest is 7 per cent. per annum, with a sinking fund of 2 per cent. per annum. The bonds to be redeemed by annual drawings, and paid off at par in London in sterling.

A NEW DANISH LOAN.

The particulars have been issued of a new Danish loan. The amount is 728,000*l.* in a 5 per cent. stock at $94\frac{1}{2}$, payable 25 per cent. on allotment; the same on December 15 and January 16; and the balance, $19\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., on February 15. The loan is redeemable at par, and will expire in May 1877.

AMERICAN SECURITIES.

The latest news from New York has had anything but a beneficial effect upon the market for American Government and railway securities. The dealings have been exceedingly limited, nevertheless prices are if anything a trifle firmer. The dealings officially reported have been in United States of 1882, at 40½, 41, 40½, 42, 42½, 43 and 42⅝; Atlantic and Great Western Railway, New York Section, first mortgage, at 70; ditto ditto, second ditto, at 65; ditto Pennsylvania Section, first mortgage, at 69½ and 70; Erie, $100 shares, all paid, at 39; Illinois Central, $100 shares, $90 paid, at 50½; ditto ditto, all paid, at 51¼, and Panama Railway, second mortgage, at 102 and 102½.

CONFEDERATE COTTON LOAN.

The market for this stock continues inactive, the prices heavy, closing, without any fluctuations in the meantime, 59 to 61.

RAILWAY SECURITIES.

Although there has been a good business transacted in Railway Shares, prices have again become rather heavy, with but few exceptions. At present the dealers are chiefly engaged with the half-monthly settlement, which materially tends to weaken the market. The traffic receipts, however, continue good, which has to a certain extent the effect of keeping up prices. As compared with last week there has been a rise of 3 per cent. in Great Northern; of 1 per cent. in Dublin and Belfast Junction, and London and Blackwall; and of ½ per cent. in Caledonian, East Anglian, Sheffield and South Eastern; but on the other hand there has been a decline of 2 per cent. in West Midland (Oxford and Shropshire Union); of 1 per cent. in Midland, Birmingham and Derby, North Eastern (Leeds), North Staffordshire, South Devon, and Vale of Neath; and of ½ per cent. in Great Eastern, Great Western, Lancashire and Yorkshire, London and North Western, and North Eastern (York). Foreign and colonial shares have been moderately dealt in, but without any material alteration in prices.

MEETINGS OF CREDITORS.

At a numerously attended meeting of the creditors of Messrs. Halliday, Fox, and Co., East India Merchants, who failed a few weeks ago, a balance-sheet was presented by Mr. Coleman, of the firm of Coleman, Turquand, Youngs, and Co., showing direct liabilities amounting to 319,264*l*., against which there were assets to the extent of about 307,937. The chairman, Mr. M'Kinnon, expressed a strong opinion that nearly twenty shillings in the pound will be obtained. It was unanimously resolved to liquidate the estate under inspection, and satisfaction was expressed at the explanations afforded.—At an adjourned meeting of the creditors of Mr. Aaron Salomons, warehouseman, of Old 'Change, the committee appointed at the previous meeting presented a report tending to exonerate Mr. Salomons from the suspicion of complicity in the fraudulent transactions of his absconded clerk. It was resolved that the estate should be wound up under an assignment to trustees.—At a meeting of the creditors of Messrs. Brown, Buckley, and Co., a balance-sheet was presented showing liabilities to the amount of 221,416*l*., with assets estimated at 236,055*l*. It was resolved that Messrs. Buckley and Co. be requested to wind up the estate and pay as soon as possible 10*s*. in the pound, no doubt being entertained that 20*s*. would be eventually paid.

THE COURSE OF THE PRODUCE MARKETS.

In the produce markets trade progresses slowly but steadily. There is very little disposition to extend purchases beyond the mere provision for immediate requirements, but the demand arising in this way is sufficient to take off the bulk of the moderate supplies that are offering, and to lend steady support to prices. Instances of depression occur, but they are rather the exception than the rule. Imports are by no means heavy, and this is another cause of the general firmness in quotations. Cotton, which continued to advance until the close of last week, has since remained nearly stationary, with diminished transactions, speculators having for the time almost entirely left the market. The grain trade pursues the same even course as noticed for some time past, prices scarcely varying, and the dealings being limited in extent. The cured provision markets are dull without much alteration from current rates. Irish bacon offers on easier terms, but American long and short middling being scarce, are relatively firm at 40*s*. to 45*s*. per cwt. Fine American butter at 112*s*. per cwt. meets a good enquiry. A small trade is doing in cheese at 46*s*. to 56*s* for American brands. Sugar remains out of demand, and is again lower by fully 6*d*. to 1*s*. per cwt., with increasing stocks. The coffee market still improves. Since the Netherlands Trading Company's sales, which resulted in a decided advance, the demand here has increased, Ceylon kinds realising 1*s*. per cwt. more, and Rio coffees also meeting a much larger sale at firmer prices than were obtainable recently. To-day some large floating parcels of the latter are understood to have changed hands, but the particulars are as yet kept secret. There is nothing new in reference to tea, in which there is still very little doing. Rice is more in demand, the Indian advices being in favour of holders. Fine Bengal saltpetre maintains its value at 32*s*. to 32*s*. 6*d*. Spices sell slowly without essential change in price. Dried fruits during the last day or two have not gone off so freely, but lower rates cannot be quoted. The principal feature in dyes is a further extension of demand for cochineal, which has again advanced 1*d*. per lb. Safflower is very firmly held. Jute continues in steady request, with an upward tendency in value. Hemp, both Manilla and Russian, is dull, and late rates are hardly obtainable. The value of oils is generally well maintained. Linseed remains at 33*s*. 9*d*. to 34*s*.; pale rape has advanced to 46*s*. to 46*s*. 6*d*., and brown to 43*s*. to 43*s*. 6*d*. per cwt. Sperm has been sold at 63*l*. per tun for American fishing. Petroleum has advanced to 2*s*. 1*d*. per gallon for American refined, but crude remains at 16*l*. 10*s*. per tun. There is more doing in metals. Scotch pig iron from 50*s*. 3*d*. has risen to 50*s*. 10½*d*., which was the closing price to-day.

Liverpool, Wednesday, November 30.—Our cotton market has been very unsteady during the past week, but still prices are relatively higher than they were. In the early part of the week business was not particularly active, a subsidence having taken place from the effects just produced by the news of the reelection of President Lincoln. On Monday there was more animation, and prices once more had an advancing tendency, in consequence of the nature of the telegraphic news from Bombay; but yesterday the advance was counteracted by the peace rumours contained in the news from New York. To-day the market has been steady, and without any material change. The sales this week have not been so large as for some time past, amounting to only 35,000 bales, of which 12,300 were taken on speculation and for export. The total sales this year down to the present time have been 2,518,591 bales, and to the same period in 1863, 2,440,132 bales. There have been imported this year 2,080,483 bales, last year the number was 1,537,572 bales. This year the trade have taken 1,492,682 bales, against 1,231,759 bales in 1863. The exports this year have been 515,135 bales, last year they were 436,462 bales. There have been taken on speculation this year 493,551 bales, and in 1863, 722,362 bales. The estimated stocks at the present time are 360,104 bales, whilst at the corresponding period last year they were 259,272 bales. The official closing quotations ware for American descriptions, 24¼*d*. to 26¼*d*.; Pernambuco, 26¾*d*. to 27½*d*.; Maceio, 26¼*d*. to 26½*d*.; Bahia, 26¼*d*. to 26½*d*.; Egyptian, 7½*d*. to 31*d*.; Smyrna, 16½*d*. to 20¾*d*.; Surats, 9½*d*. to 21¾*d*.; Bengal, 12*d*. to 13½*d*.; Scinde, 12*d*. to 13½*d*.; China, 14½*d*. to 16¾*d*.; Japan, 17*d*. to 17¼*d*.; and Peruvian, 28*d*. to 29*d*.

During the past week there has not been much animation in the Manchester markets, the extreme prices demanded last week having completely checked operations, from which there has not been any visible recovery, notwithstanding a general reduction in prices, caused by the rumours of peace negotiations between the American belligerents. Although the news from India is of a very satisfactory character, it has not proved sufficient to counteract the effects produced by the rumours alluded to. The market for shipping, and in fact all descriptions of yarns, remains very dull, and quotations have declined from 2*d*. to 3*d*. per lb. since last week. At this decline, some little business has been done in second-hand lots, which had been bought by speculators during the previous depression, but spinners are not disposed to operate at this decline. In cloths prices have also been gradually weakening, and in some cases the reduction has been upwards of 1*s*. per piece. The buyers of goods at the late panic prices have been tempted by the present decline to offer them for resale at rates which manufacturers cannot compete with at the present price of cotton. The latest quotations were:—⅞ Grey Printers, 7*s*. 6*d*. to 14*s*. 9*d*. according to quality; ⅜ Grey Madapollams, 6*s*. 9*d*. to 9*s*. 9*d*.; ⅝ Grey Printers, 9*s*. 3*d*. to 16*s*. 9*d*.; 5/4 Grey Shirtings, 11*s*. to 24*s*.; Water Twist, No. 20, 1*s*. 8*d*. to 2*s*. 5*d*.; No. 30, 2*s*. 2*d*. to 2*s*. 9*d*.; No. 40, 2*s*. 9*d*. to 3*s*. 3*d*.; Mule Twist, No. 20, 1*s*. 7*d*. to 2*s*. 3*d*.; No. 30, 1*s*. 10*d*. to 2*s*. 7*d*.; No. 40, 1*s*. 11*d*. to 2*s*. 9*d*.; No. 50, 2*s*. 4*d*. to 2*s*. 11*d*.; No. 60, 2*s*. 7*d*. to 3*s*. 1*d*.; No. 70, 2*s*. 10*d*. to 3*s*. 4*d*.; No. 80, 3*s*. to 3*s*. 6*d*.; No. 90, 3*s*. 2*d*. to 3*s*. 8*d*.; and No. 100, 3*s*. 5*d*. to 4*s*.

In One Volume, handsomely bound, with gilt edges . . . . One Guinea.
As separate Pictures, in elegant Portfolio . . . . . One Guinea.

'Generations hence, the CORNHILL GALLERY will be referred to as the most perfect example of the taste of our day, shown in the illustrations of books of amusement. Never were woodcuts more carefully and luxuriously transferred to paper. The CORNHILL GALLERY, now wonderfully cheap, will, we believe, rise in market value as its date runs back into the past. For it is unquestionably the best extant illustration of one not unimportant section of the Fine Arts of this country in the middle of the 19th century.'—Examiner.

'This noble volume possesses [unusual attractions for the connoisseur and collector.'—Illustrated London News.

'As an elegant drawing-room volume, as a pleasant monument of many agreeable tales, and as a volume of really well-designed and carefully executed engravings, the CORNHILL GALLERY has our hearty commendation.—Observer.

'As a 'show-book for a drawing-room, it is the best that has been published for a long time, and we believe that it will meet with an extensive sale.'—Press.

'This remarkably cheap and beautiful volume is sure to charm many a fireside circle during the coming season. This book is one to tempt even a man of small means to purchase a copy, not only for the pleasure it affords, but as a good and safe investment for his money.'—Reader.

'A splendid volume. The CORNHILL GALLERY is a beautiful specimen of the art which it represents. A choicer ornament for a drawing-room table could hardly be had.'—Morning Star.

SOUTHERN PRISONERS' RELIEF FUND.

THERE are at this time many thousands of Confederate prisoners of war confined in the various forts and camps of the Northern States. A large proportion of them are wounded or sick, and all are in a state of destitution, the accounts of which, as given in private letters and in the newspapers, present a picture of human suffering, which has scarcely a parallel in modern times. The merest necessaries of life are wanting, and frequently the wounded prisoner has no raiment save that which is stark and stiffened with his clotted blood. Horrible as war is in all its features, assuredly it has no greater horrors than the long agony of the poor captive who, when the feverish excitement of the contest is over, is left to the bitter charity of strangers and foes, without one friendly hand to soothe the pains of body or friendly voice to whisper hope and comfort to his despairing mind. These men, cut off from the assistance of their kindred or the protection of their Government, have peculiar claims on the patriotism of their countrymen in Europe, and upon Christian benevolence everywhere. They did not recklessly or from choice embrace the profession of arms, but in exchanging the comforts, and often the luxuries, of home for the toils and hardships of a soldier's life, they obeyed a stern sense of duty and the call of their country in its extremest need. An unusual proportion, also, of those that fill the ranks of the Confederate armies belong to the higher walks of life, upon whom privations, such as are endured by prisoners in the hands of the North, fall with increased severity.

The Southern Prisoners' Relief Fund is intended to mitigate some of these sufferings which cannot altogether be relieved. Within little more than a twelvemonth, nearly £3,000 have been collected and expended in relief. The managers of the Fund are assisted in their efforts by self-devoted ladies in the principal Northern cities, who visit the sufferers and give them such aid as the means at their disposal render possible. Of late the Federal Government has granted permission that this Samaritan work may be done openly. It is earnestly hoped that all Southerners residing in Europe will support the Fund to the extent of their ability, and its objects may recommend themselves to all, irrespective of country or political convictions, who sympathise with the sufferings of their fellow-men.

Contributions will be received by J. H. ASHBRIDGE, Treasurer, Walmer Buildings, Water Street, Liverpool; or in London, by HENRY HOTZE, Esq., 17 Savile Row, W.; in Paris, by H. O. BREWER, Esq., 6 Rue Circulaire; and DANIEL HUBBARD, Esq., 24 Rue Lord Byron.

SECOND SESSION OF THE SECOND CONGRESS OF THE CONFEDERATE STATES.

The Annual Message of President Davis.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the Confederate States of America:

It is with satisfaction that I welcome your presence at an earlier day than that usual for your session, and with confidence that I invoke the aid of your counsels at a time of such public exigency. The campaign which was commenced almost simultaneously with your session early in May last, and which was still in progress at your adjournment in the middle of June, has not yet reached its close. It has been prosecuted on a scale and with an energy heretofore unequalled. When we revert to the condition of our country at the inception of the operations of the present year, to the magnitude of the preparations made by the enemy, the number of his forces, the accumulation of his warlike supplies, and the prodigality with which his vast resources have been lavished in the attempt to render success assured; when we contrast the numbers and means at our disposal for resistance, and when we contemplate the results of a struggle apparently so unequal, we cannot fail, while rendering the full meed of deserved praise to our generals and soldiers, to perceive that a Power higher than man has willed our deliverance, and gratefully to recognise the protection of a kind Providence in enabling us successfully to withstand the utmost efforts of the enemy for our subjugation.

At the beginning of the year the State of Texas was partially in possession of the enemy, and large portions of Louisiana and Arkansas lay apparently defenceless. Of the Federal soldiers who invaded Texas, none are known to remain except as prisoners of war. In North-western Louisiana a large and well-appointed army, aided by a powerful fleet, was repeatedly defeated, and deemed itself fortunate in finally escaping with a loss of one-third of its numbers, a large portion of its military trains, and many transports and gunboats. The enemy's occupation of that State is reduced to the narrow district commanded by the guns of his fleet. Arkansas has been recovered with the exception of a few fortified posts, while our forces have penetrated into Central Missouri, affording to our oppressed brethren in that State an opportunity, of which many have availed themselves, of striking for liberation from the tyranny to which they have been subjected.

On the east side of the Mississippi, in spite of some reverses, we have much cause for gratification. The enemy hoped to effect, during the present year, by concentration of forces, the conquest which he had previously failed to accomplish by more extended operations. Compelled, therefore, to withdraw or seriously to weaken the strength of the armies of occupation at different points, he has afforded us the opportunity of recovering possession of extensive districts of our territory. Nearly the whole of Northern and Western Mississippi, of Northern Alabama, and of Western Tennessee, are again in our possession: and all attempts on these States have been baffled. On the entire ocean and Gulf coast of the Confederacy the whole success of the enemy, with the enormous naval resources at his command, has been limited to the capture of the outer defences of Mobile Bay.

If we now turn to the results accomplished by the two great armies, so confidently relied on by the invaders as sufficient to secure the subversion of our Government and the subjection of our people to foreign domination, we have still greater cause for devout gratitude to Divine power. In South-western Virginia successive armies, which threatened the capture of Lynchburg and Saltville, have been routed and driven out of the country, and a portion of Eastern Tennessee reconquered by our troops. In Northern Virginia, extensive districts, formerly occupied by the enemy, are now free from their presence. In the lower valley their general, rendered desperate by his inability to maintain a hostile occupation, has resorted to the infamous expedient of converting a fruitful land into a desert by burning its mills, granaries, and homesteads, and destroying the food, standing crops, live stock, and agricultural implements of peaceful non-combatants. The main army, after a series of defeats, in which its losses have been enormous—after attempts by raiding parties to break up our communications, which have resulted in the destruction of a large part of the cavalry engaged in the work—after constant repulse of repeated assaults on our defensive lines—is, with the aid of heavy reinforcements, but with, it is hoped, waning prospects of further progress in the design, still engaged in an effort, commenced over four months ago, to capture Petersburg.

The army of General Sherman, although succeeding at the end of the summer in obtaining possession of Atlanta, has been unable to secure any ultimate advantage from this success. The same general who, in February last, marched a large army from Vicksburg to Meridian with no other result than being forced to march back again, was able, by the aid of greatly increased numbers, and after much delay, to force a passage from Chattanooga to Atlanta, only to be for the second time compelled to withdraw on the line of his advance, without obtaining control of a single mile of territory beyond the narrow track of his march, and without gaining aught beyond the precarious possession of a few fortified points, in which he is compelled to maintain heavy garrisons, and which are menaced with recapture.

The lessons afforded by the history of this war are fraught with instruction and encouragement. Repeatedly during the war have formidable expeditions been directed by the enemy against points ignorantly supposed to be of vital importance to the Confederacy. Some of these expeditions have, at immense cost, been successful, but in no instance have the promised fruits been reaped. Again, in the present campaign, was the delusion fondly cherished that the capture of Atlanta and Richmond would, if effected, end the war by the overthrow of our Government and the submission of our people. We can now judge by experience how unimportant is the influence of the former event upon our capacity for defence, upon the courage and spirit of the people, and the stability of the Government. We may, in like manner, judge that if the campaign against Richmond had resulted in success instead of failure; if the valour of the army, under the leadership of its accomplished commander, had resisted in vain the overwhelming masses which were, on the contrary, decisively repulsed; if we had been compelled to evacuate Richmond as well as Atlanta, the Confederacy would have remained as erect and defiant as ever. Nothing could have been changed in the purpose of its Government, in the indomitable valour of its troops, or in the unquenchable spirit of its people. The baffled and disappointed foe would in vain have scanned the reports of your proceedings, at some new legislative seat, for any indication that progress had been made in his gigantic task of conquering a free people. The truth so patent to us must ere long be forced upon the reluctant Northern mind. There are no vital points on the preservation of which the continued existence of the Confederacy depends. There is no military success of the enemy which can accomplish its destruction. Not the fall of Richmond, nor Wilmington, nor Charleston, nor Savannah, nor Mobile, nor of all combined, can save the enemy from the constant and exhausting drain of blood and treasure which must continue until he shall acknowledge that no peace is attainable unless based on the recognition of our indefeasible rights.

Before leaving this subject, it is gratifying to assure you that the military supplies essentially requisite for public defence will be found, as heretofore, adequate to our needs; and that abundant crops have rewarded the labour of the farmer, and rendered abortive the inhuman attempt of the enemy to produce, by devastation, famine among the people.

FOREIGN RELATIONS.

It is not in my power to announce any change in the conduct of foreign Powers. No such action has been taken by the Christian nations of Europe as might justly have been expected from their history, from the duties imposed by international law, and from the claims of humanity. It is charitable to attribute their conduct to no worse motive than indifference to the consequences of a struggle which shakes only the republican portion of the American Continent, and not to ascribe to design a course calculated to insure the prolongation of hostilities.

No instance in history is remembered by me in which a nation pretending to exercise dominion over another, asserting its independence, has been the first to concede the existence of such independence. No case can be called to my mind in which neutral Powers have failed to set the example of recognising the independence of a nation, when satisfied of the inability of its enemy to subvert its government; and this, too, in cases where the previous relation between the contending parties had been confessedly that of mother country and dependent colony; not, as in our case, that of coequal State united by Federal compact. It has ever been considered the proper function and duty of neutral Powers to perform the office of judging whether in point of fact the nation asserting dominion is able to make good its pretensions by force of arms, and, if not, by recognition of the resisting party, to discountenance the continuance of the contest. And the reason why this duty is incumbent on neutral Powers is plainly apparent, when we reflect that the pride and passion which blind the judgment of the parties to the conflict cause the continuance of active warfare, and consequent useless slaughter, long after the inevitable result has become apparent to all not engaged in the struggle. So long, therefore, as neutral nations fail by recognition of our independence to announce that, in their judgment, the United States are unable to reduce the Confederacy to submission, their conduct will be accepted by our enemies as a tacit encouragement to continue their efforts, and as an implied assurance that belief is entertained by neutral nations in the success of their designs. A direct stimulus, whether intentional or not, is thus applied to securing a continuance of the carnage and devastation which desolate this continent, and which they profess deeply to deplore.

The disregard of this just, humane, and Christian public duty by the nations of Europe is the more remarkable from the fact that authentic expression has long since been given by the Governments of both France and England to the conviction that the United States are unable to conquer the Confederacy. It is now more than two years since the Government of France announced officially to the Cabinets of London and St. Petersburg its own conclusion that the United States were unable to achieve any decisive military success. In the answers sent by those Powers no intimation of a contrary opinion was conveyed; and it is notorious that in speeches, both in and out of Parliament, the members of Her Britannic Majesty's Government have not hesitated to express this conviction in unqualified terms. The denial of our right under these circumstances is so obviously unjust, and discriminates so unfairly in favour of the United States, that neutrals have sought to palliate the wrong of which they are conscious by professing to consider, in opposition to notorious truth and to the known belief of both belligerents, that the recognition of our independence would be valueless without their further intervention in the struggle—an intervention of which we disclaim the desire and mistrust the advantage. We seek no favour, we wish no intervention. We know ourselves fully competent to maintain our own rights and independence against the invaders of our country, and we feel justified in asserting that, without the aid derived from recruiting their armies from foreign countries, the invaders would, ere this, have been driven from our soil. When the recognition of the Confederacy was refused by Great Britain in the fall of 1862, the refusal was excused on the ground that any action by Her Majesty's Government would have the effect of inflaming the passions of the belligerents, and of preventing the return of peace. It is assumed that this opinion was sincerely entertained; but the experience of two years of unequalled carnage shows that it was erroneous, and that the result was the reverse of what the British ministry humanely desired. A contrary policy—a policy just to us—a policy diverging from an unvarying course of concession to all the demands of our enemies—is still within the power of Her Majesty's Government, and would, it is fair to presume, be productive of consequences the opposite of those which have unfortunately followed its whole course of conduct from the commencement of the war to the present time. In a word, peace is impossible without independence, and it is not to be expected that the enemy will anticipate neutrals in the recognition of that independence. When the history of this war shall be fully disclosed, the calm judgment of the impartial publicist will, for these reasons, be unable to absolve the neutral nations of Europe from a share in the moral responsibility for the myriads of human lives that have been unnecessarily sacrificed during its progress.

The renewed instances in which foreign Powers have given us just cause of complaint need not here be detailed. The extracts from the correspondence of the State Department, which accompany this message, will afford such further information as can be given without detriment to the public interest, and we must reserve for the future such action as may then be deemed advisable to secure redress.

FINANCES.

Your special attention is earnestly invited to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, submitted in conformity with law. The facts therein disclosed are far from discouraging, and demonstrate that, with judicious legislation, we shall be enabled to meet all the exigencies of the war from our abundant resources, and avoid, at the same time, such an accumulation of debt as would render at all doubtful our capacity to redeem it. The total receipts into the Treasury for the two quarters ending on the 30th of September, 1864, were $415,191,530, which sum, added to the balance of $308,282,722 that remained in the Treasury on the 1st of April last, forms a total of $723,474,272. Of this total, not far from half, that is to say, $342,560,327, has been applied to the extinction of the public debt, while the total expenditures have been $272,378,505, leaving a balance in the Treasury on the 1st of October, 1864, of $108,435,420.

The total amount of the public debt, as exhibited on the books of the Register of the Treasury, on the 1st of October, 1864, was $1,147,970,208, of which $539,340,090 were funded debt, bearing interest, $283,880,150 were treasury notes of the new issue, and the remainder consisted of the former issue of treasury notes which will be converted into other forms of debt, and will cease to exist as currency on the 31st of next month.

The report, however, explains that, in consequence of the absence of certain returns from distant officers, the true amount of the debt is less by about twenty-one and a half millions of dollars than appears on the books of the register, and that the total public debt on the 1st of last month may be fairly considered to have been $1,126,381,095.

The increase of the public debt during the six months from the 1st of April to the 1st of October, was $97,650,780, being rather more than $16,000,000 per month; and it will be apparent, on a perusal of the report, that this augmentation would have been avoided, and a positive reduction of the amount would have been effected, but for certain defects in the legislation on the subject of the finances, which are pointed out in the report, and which seem to admit of easy remedy.

In the statements just made the foreign debt is omitted. It consists only of the unpaid balance of the loan known as the cotton loan. This balance is but 2,200,000*l.*, and is adequately provided for by about 250,000 bales of cotton owned by the Government, even if the cotton be rated as worth but sixpence per pound.

There is one item of the public debt not included in the tables presented, to which your attention is required. The bounty bonds promised to our soldiers by the third section of the Act of February, 1864, were deliverable on October 1. The Secretary has been unable to issue them, by reason of an omission in the law, no time being given therein fixed for the payment of the bonds.

The aggregate appropriations called for by the different departments of the Government, according to the estimates submitted with the report, for the six months ending on June 30, 1865, amount to $438,102,679, while the Secretary estimates that there will remain unexpended out of former appropriations, on January 1, 1865, a balance of $467,416,204. It would, therefore, seem that former estimates have been largely in excess of actual expenditures, and that no additional appropriations are required for meeting the needs of the public service until July 1 of next year. Indeed, if the estimates now presented should prove to be as much in excess of actual expenditure as has heretofore been the case, a considerable balance will still remain unexpended at the close of the first half of the ensuing year.

The chief difficulty to be apprehended in connection with our finances results from the depreciation of the treasury notes, which seems justly to be attributed by the Secretary to two causes—redundancy in amount and want of confidence in ultimate redemption—for both of which remedies are suggested that will commend themselves to your consideration as being practicable as well as efficient.

The main features of the plan presented are substantially these: First, That the faith of the Government be pledged that the notes shall ever remain exempt from taxation. Second, That no issue shall be made beyond that which is already allowed by law. Third, That a certain fixed portion of the annual receipts from taxation during the war shall be set apart specially for the gradual extinction of the outstanding amount until it shall have been reduced to $100,000,000. And fourth, The pledge and appropriation of such proportion of the tax in kind, and for such number of years after the return of peace, as shall be sufficient for the final redemption of the entire circulation. The details of the plan, the calculations on which it is based, the efficiency of its operation, and the vast advantages which would result from its success, are fully detailed in this report, and cannot be fairly presented in a form sufficiently condensed for this message. I doubt not it will receive from you that earnest and candid consideration which is merited by the importance of the subject.

The recommendations of the report for the repeal of certain provisions of the tax laws, which produced inequality in the burden of taxation; for exempting all government loans from taxation on capital, and from any adverse discrimination in taxation on income derived from them; for placing the taxation on banks on the same footing as on other corporate bodies; for securing the payment into the Treasury of that portion of the bank circulation which is liable to confiscation because held by alien enemies; for the conversion of the interest-bearing treasury notes now oustanding into coupon bonds, and for the quarterly collection of taxation—all present practical questions for legislation, which, if wisely devised, will greatly improve the public credit, and alleviate the burdens now imposed by the extreme and unnecessary depreciation in the value of the currency.

The returns of the Produce Loan Bureau are submitted with the report, and the information is conveyed that the Treasury Agency in the Trans-Mississippi Department has been fully organised and is now in operation with promise of efficiency and success.

The provision heretofore made to some extent for increasing the compensation of public officers, civil and military, is found to be in some places inadequate to their support, perhaps not more so anywhere than in Richmond; and enquiry with a view to appropriate remedy is suggested to your consideration. Your notice is also called to the condition of certain officers of the Treasury who were omitted in the laws heretofore passed for the relief of other public officers as mentioned in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury.

DEPARTMENT OF WAR.

The condition of the various branches of the military service is stated in the accompanying report of the Secretary of War. Among the suggestions made for legislative action with a view to add to the numbers and efficiency of the army, all of which will receive your consideration, there are some prominent topics which merit special notice.

The exemption from military duty now accorded by law to all persons engaged in certain specified pursuits or professions is shown by experience to be unwise, nor is it believed to be defensible in theory. The defence of home, family and country, is universally recognised as the paramount political duty of every member of society; and in a form of Government like ours, where each citizen enjoys an equality of rights and privileges, nothing can be more invidious than an unequal distribution of duties and obligations. No pursuit nor position should relieve any one who is able to do active duty from enrolment in the army, unless his functions or services are more useful to the defence of his country in another sphere. But it is manifest that this cannot be the case with entire classes. All telegraph operators, workmen in mines, professors, teachers, engineers, editors and employés of newspapers, journeymen printers, shoemakers, tanners, blacksmiths, millers, physicians, and the numerous other classes mentioned in the laws, cannot, in the nature of things, be either equally necessary in their several professions, nor distributed throughout the country in such proportions that only the exact numbers required are found in each locality, nor can it be everywhere impossible to replace those within the conscript age by men older and less capable of active field services. A discretion should be vested in the military authorities, so that a sufficient number of those essential to the public service might be detailed to continue the exercise of their pursuits or professions, but the exemption from service of the entire classes should be wholly abandoned. It affords great facility for abuses, offers the temptation as well as the ready means of escaping service by fraudulent devices, and is one of the principal obstructions to the efficient operation of the conscript law.

A general militia law is needful in the interests of public defence. The Constitution, by vesting the power in Congress, imposes on it the duty of providing 'for organising, arming, and disciplining the militia, and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the Confederate States.' The great diversity in the legislation of the several States on this subject, and the absence of any provision establishing an exact method for calling the militia into Confederate service, are sources of embarrassment which ought no longer to be suffered to impede defensive measures.

The legislation in relation to the cavalry demands change. The policy of requiring the men to furnish their own horses has proven pernicious in many respects. It interferes with discipline, impairs efficiency, and is the cause of frequent and prolonged absence from appropriate duty. The subject is fully treated in the Secretary's report, with suggestions as to the proper measures for reforming that branch of the service.

The recommendation hitherto often made is again renewed, that some measure be adopted for the reorganisation and consolidation of companies and regiments when so far reduced in numbers as seriously to impair their efficiency. It is the more necessary that this should be done, as the absence of legislation on the subject has forced generals in the field to resort to various expedients for approximating the desired result. It is surely an evil that a commanding officer should be placed in a position which forces upon him the choice of allowing the efficiency of his command to be seriously impaired, or of attempting to supply by the exercise of doubtful authority the want of proper legal provision. The regard for the sensibility of officers who have heretofore served with credit, and which is believed to be the controlling motive that has hitherto obstructed legislation on this subject, however honourable and proper, may be carried to a point which seriously injures the public good; and if this be the case, it can scarcely be questioned which of the two considerations should be deemed paramount.

The Secretary's recommendation on the subject of facilitating the acquisition of the iron required for maintaining the efficiency of railroad communication on the important military lines is commended to your favour. The necessity for the operation in full vigour of such lines is too apparent to need comment.

The question in dispute between the two Governments relative to the exchange of prisoners of war has been frequently presented in former messages and reports, and is fully treated by the Secretary. The solicitude of the Government for the relief of our captive fellow-citizens has known no abatement, but has, on the contrary, been still more deeply evoked by the additional sufferings to which they have been wantonly subjected, by deprivation of adequate food, clothing, and fuel, which they were not even permitted to purchase from the prison sutlers. Finding that the enemy attempted to excuse their barbarous treatment by the unfounded allegation that it was retaliatory for like conduct on our part, an offer was made by us with a view of ending all pretext for such recriminations, or pretended retaliation.

The offer has been accepted, and each Government is, hereafter, to be allowed to provide necessary comforts to its own citizens held captive by the other. Active efforts are in progress for the immediate execution of this agreement, and it is hoped that but few days will have elapsed before we shall be relieved from the distressing thought that painful physical suffering is endured by so many of our fellow-citizens whose fortitude in captivity illustrates the national character as fully as did their valour in actual conflict.

EMPLOYMENT OF SLAVES.

The employment of slaves for service with the army as teamsters or cooks, or in the way of work upon fortifications, or in the Government workshops, or in hospitals, and other similar duties, was authorised by the Act of 17th of February last, and provision was made for their impressment, to a number not exceeding twenty thousand, if it should be found impracticable to obtain them by contract with the owners. The law contemplated the hiring only of the labour of these slaves, and imposed on the Government the liability to pay for the value of such as might be lost to the owners from casualties resulting from their employment in the service.

The Act has produced less result than was anticipated, and further provision is required to render it efficacious. But my present purpose is to invite your consideration to the propriety of a radical modification in the theory of the law.

Viewed merely as property, and, therefore, as the subject of impressment, the service or labour of the slave has been frequently claimed for short periods in the construction of defensive works. The slave, however, bears another relation to the State — that of a person. The law of last February contemplates only the relation of the slave to the master, and limits the impressment to a certain term of service. But for the purposes enumerated in the act, instruction in the manner of encamping, marching, and parking trains is needful, so that even in this limited employment length of service adds greatly to the value of the negro's labour. Hazard is also encountered in all the positions to which negroes can be assigned for service with the army, and the duties required of them demand loyalty and zeal. In this aspect the relation of person predominates so far as to render it doubtful whether the private right of property can consistently and beneficially be continued, and it would seem proper to acquire for the public service the entire property in the labour of the slave, and to pay therefor due compensation, rather than to impress his labour for short terms; and this the more especially as the effect of the present law would vest the entire property in all cases where the slave might be recaptured after compensation for his loss has been paid to the private owner. Whenever the entire property in the service of a slave is thus acquired by the Government, the question is presented by what tenure he should be held. Should he be retained in servitude, or should his emancipation be held out to him as a reward for faithful service, or should it be granted at once on the promise of such service; and if emancipated, what action should be taken to secure for the freedman the permission of the State from which he was withdrawn to reside within the limits after the close of his public service? The permission would doubtless be more readily accorded as a reward for past faithful service, and a double motive for zealous discharge of duty would thus be offered to those employed by the Government, their freedom and the gratification of the local attachment which is so marked a characteristic of the negro, and forms so powerful an incentive to his action. The policy of engaging to liberate the negro, on his discharge after service faithfully rendered, seems to me preferable to that of granting immediate manumission, or that of retaining him in servitude. If this policy should recommend itself to the judgment of Congress, it is suggested that, in addition to the duties heretofore performed by the slave, he might be advantageously employed as pioneer and engineer labourer; and, in that event, that the number should be augmented to forty thousand.

Beyond this limit and these employments it does not seem to me desirable, under existing circumstances, to go. A broad moral distinction exists between the use of slaves as soldiers in the defence of their homes, and the incitement of the same persons to insurrection against their masters. The one is justifiable, if necessary; the other is iniquitous, and unworthy of a civilised people; and such is the judgment of all writers of public law, as well as that expressed and insisted on by our enemies in all wars prior to that now waged against us. By none have the practices, of which they are now guilty, been denounced with greater severity than themselves in the two wars with Great Britain in the last and in the present century; and in the Declaration of Independence of 1776, when enumeration was made of the wrongs which justified the revolt from Great Britain, the climax of atrocity was deemed to be reached only when the English monarch was denounced as having 'excited domestic insurrection among us.'

The subject is to be viewed by us, therefore, solely in the light of policy and our social economy. When so regarded, I must dissent from those who advise a general levy and arming of the slaves for the duty of soldiers. Until our white population shall prove insufficient for the armies we require and can afford to keep in the field, to employ as a soldier the negro, who has merely been trained to labour and as a labourer, for the white man, accustomed from his youth to the use of fire-arms, would scarcely be deemed wise or advantageous by any; and this is the question now before us. But should the alternative ever be presented of subjugation or the employment of the slave as a soldier, there seems no reason to doubt what should then be our decision. Whether our view embraces what would, in so extreme a case, be the sum of misery entailed by the dominion of the enemy, or be restricted solely to the effect upon the welfare and happiness of the negro population themselves, the result would be the same. The appalling demoralisation, suffering, disease, and death which have been caused by partially substituting the invaders' system of policy for the kind relation previously subsisting between the master and slave, have been a sufficient demonstration that external interference with our institution of domestic slavery is productive of evil only. If the subject involved no other consideration than the mere right of property, the sacrifices heretofore made by our people have been such as to permit no doubt of their readiness to surrender every possession in order to secure their independence. But the social and political question, which is exclusively under the control of the several States, has a far wider and more enduring importance than that of pecuniary interest. In its manifold phases it embraces the stability of our republican institutions, resting on the actual political equality of all its citizens, and includes the fulfilment of the task which has been so happily begun—that of Christianising and improving the condition of the Africans who have, by the will of Providence, been placed in our charge. Comparing the results of our own experience with those of the experiments of others who have borne similar relation to the African race, the people of the several States of the Confederacy have abundant reason to be satisfied with the past, and to use the greatest circumspection in determining their course. These considerations, however, are rather applicable to the improbable contingency of our need of resorting to this element of resistance than to our present condition. If the recommendation above made, for the training of forty thousand negroes for the service indicated, shall meet your approval, it is certain that even this limited number, by their preparatory training in intermediate duties, would form a more valuable reserve force, in case of urgency, than threefold their number, suddenly called from field labour, while a fresh levy could, to a certain extent, supply their places in the special service for which they are now employed.

OTHER DEPARTMENTS.

The regular annual reports of the Attorney-General, the Secretary of the Navy, and the Postmaster-General are appended, and give ample information relative to the condition of the respective departments. They contain suggestions for legislative provisions required to remedy such defects in the existing laws as have been disclosed by experience, but none of so general or important a character as to require that I should do more than recommend them to your favourable consideration.

NEGOTIATIONS FOR PEACE.

The disposition of this Government for a peaceful solution of the issues which the enemy has referred to the arbitrament of arms has been too often manifested, and is too well known to need new assurances. But while it is true that individuals and parties in the United States have indicated a desire to substitute reason for force, and by negotiation to stop the further sacrifice of human life, and to arrest the calamities which now afflict both countries, the authorities who control the Government of our enemies have too often and too clearly expressed their resolution to make no peace except on terms of our unconditional submission and degradation, to leave us any hope of the cessation of hostilities until the delusion of their ability to conquer us is dispelled. Among those who are already disposed for peace, many are actuated by principle and by disapproval and abhorrence of the iniquitous warfare that their Government is waging, while others are moved by the conviction that it is no longer to the interest of the United States to continue a struggle in which success is unattainable.

Whenever this fast-growing conviction shall have taken firm root in the minds of a majority of the Northern people, there will be produced that willingness to negotiate for peace which is now confined to our side. Peace is manifestly impossible unless desired by both parties to this war, and the disposition for it among our enemies will be best and most certainly evoked by the demonstration on our part of ability and unshaken determination to defend our rights and to hold no earthly price too dear for their purchase. Whenever there shall be on the part of our enemies a desire for peace, there will be no difficulty in finding means by which negotiation can be opened, but it is obvious that no agency can be called into action until this desire shall be mutual. When that contingency shall happen, the Government, to which is confined the treaty-making power, can be at no loss for means adapted to accomplish so desirable an end.

In the hope that the day will soon be reached when, under Divine favour, these States may be allowed to enter on their former peaceful pursuits, and to develop the abundant natural resources with which they are blessed, let us then resolutely continue to devote our united and unimpaired energies to the defence of our homes, our lives and our liberties. This is the true path to peace. Let us treat it with confidence in the assured result.

JEFFERSON DAVIS.

Report of the Confederate Secretary of War.

WAR DEPARTMENT, C. S. A.
RICHMOND, Nov. 3, 1864.

To the President of the Confederate States:—

Sir,—The operations of the War Department since the date of my last report embrace in their scope the events of the present campaign, which at that time had not fully opened, and which has not yet been brought to a close; also the measures instituted for the increase, organisation, equipment, and supply of the army, under the laws adopted at the last session of the first Congress. The importance of the elections to occur within the United States during the present year, the condition of their finances, and a growing discontent among their people because of the war, induced a belief that their executive and military authorities would prosecute the campaign with extraordinary vigour, and seek to render it decisive and final. Nor has this anticipation been disappointed. In the winter and spring the enemy collected a larger body of men than he had before assembled in the field, who were commanded by his favourite generals. His fleets were enlarged, and their armaments embraced all the improvements that naval architecture had discovered. His arms and equipments were of the most approved model, and whatever was required for the success of the campaign was supplied with lavish profusion. He opened the campaign by an attempt to obtain command over the States bordering on the Gulf of Mexico. He invaded Florida, set on foot an expedition to sweep through Mississippi and to effect the capture of Mobile, and he penetrated with formidable armies to the western limits of Louisiana to establish his dominion over that State. The success of these enterprises was expected to give him a firm hold upon these States, and to enable him to concentrate all his energies upon the campaigns in Virginia and Georgia. But these invasions were defeated or repelled.

THE TRANS-MISSISSIPPI DEPARTMENT.

My last report communicated the victories obtained in the States of Florida and North Mississippi, that relieved Alabama and Florida from the invader, and I have now to announce a series of brilliant triumphs obtained by our arms in Louisiana and Arkansas, commencing with the signal victories of Mansfield and Pleasant Hill, and extending into the interior of Missouri, where our victorious troops were at the date of our latest information. Almost the entire Trans-Mississippi Department enjoys security and repose; and the troops, long engaged with invaders there, may now, as in part they already are, be employed in formidable offensive operations.

THE DEPARTMENT OF NORTHERN VIRGINIA.

But the primary object of the enemy was to effect the capture of Richmond and the defeat and dispersion of the armies of Northern Virginia and Tennessee. He assembled his main army for this purpose in April last on the Rappahannock, under General Grant. Another was collected on the Peninsula, under command of General Butler, to cooperate on the south side of Richmond. A third was designed to penetrate to the James river through the Valley of Virginia, and the forces in Western Virginia and Kentucky were to cross the mountains and join it on its march. It is believed that more than 200,000 troops were combined for the execution of this plan in April last, and that from 50,000 to 100,000 men have been since added as reinforcements.

The army of General Grant was met at the Wilderness on the 5th of May last, and defeated. It was encountered with the same result at Spottsylvania Court House, the Po, the North Anna, and at Cold Harbour; after which it abandoned its march on Richmond, and crossed the James River to form a junction with General Butler, near Petersburg. The army of General Butler had landed on the south side of the James, at Bermuda Hundred, early in May, to cooperate with the army of General Grant, which was expected to arrive before Richmond in a short time. On May 16 this army met with a defeat at Drewry's Bluff, and was confined to its intrenchments from that time until it was joined by the army of General Grant.

The army of General Sigel, designated for the invasion of the Valley of Virginia, was defeated at New Market in May last, and the troops from West Virginia driven from the Valley of the Upper Roanoke about the same time. At a later period these armies were united under General Hunter, and, after a successful march up the Valley of Virginia, were encountered by General Early at Lynchburg, and driven to the Ohio River. General Early, seeing Washington City and Baltimore exposed, passed through the valley, defeating all opposing forces, crossed into Maryland, and penetrated to the suburbs of Washington City and Baltimore. The cavalry raids of Sheridan and Wilson were defeated, and the attempts to permanently obstruct our communications have failed. The campaign projected by General Grant with such mighty preparation has been frustrated, and if he depended alone upon the means that were provided and were deemed to be superabundant, his failure would be absolute. But a proclamation has been made for the draft of 500,000 men by the President of the United States to recruit his defeated and dispirited army, and we cannot yet claim security or quiet.

THE DEPARTMENT OF TENNESSEE.

In the great central State of Georgia the campaign opened about the same time, but operations have been so far less favourable to our arms. Preparation had been made there early to meet with adequate force, exceeding the relative disproportion which has usually existed with all our armies, and repel the enemy on the threshold of the State, but prudence or strategy led the General intrusted with the conduct of the campaign to prefer a retreating and defensive line of action. In consequence, our forces, though not without on several occasions severely checking and punishing their adversaries whenever venturing upon direct assaults, were gradually manœuvred or pressed back towards Atlanta, the leading objective point of the campaign. When that important central point and union of various converging lines of communication had been nearly reached and appeared about to be abandoned, a change was made in the commanders, and a strenuous effort was made to hold and defend by force of arms this place, which had become more important in a political and moral than in a military view from the significance the public of both sides had attached to its possession. It was bravely held for several weeks, and some successes, achieved with skill and valour, for a time seemed to assure to us its retention, when a hazardous movement of the enemy (which, with as much success to our arms as there was promptitude in seizing the occasion by our commander, must have caused his ruin), resulting in victory, compelled our evacuation of the city and its occupancy by the enemy.

This was felt as a serious reverse, and caused some depression of feeling throughout the Confederacy, while it was hailed with unbounded acclamation and revived hopes by the enemy. For the time the loss of prestige and the political effects were unquestionably adverse to us; but results may show that the consequences were on both sides strangely misunderstood and exaggerated. It has liberated our army for offensive operations, while it has chained down our enemies to the tenure of a far inland position of no real strategic value since the breaking up of its railroad connections, in the midst of a hostile population, and to be sustained only by supplies drawn hundreds of miles by a single line of road. The opportunities presented by such a situation have been seized and used by our bold and enterprising leader with promptitude and energy. The communications of the enemy have been cut in many places. Our army is in his rear, and he, instead of resting securely behind the strong intrenchments of his recent capture, is forced to come forth to encounter his skilful adversary on ground of his choice, and where defeat is ruin to the enemy, only reverse to us.

KENTUCKY AND TENNESSEE.

Meantime the necessity for concentration by the enemy of his scattered forces, for the invasion of Georgia, compelled the relaxation of the bonds which have restrained the patriotic desires of the loyal in Kentucky and Tennessee. In consequence, in different portions of both States, with the encouragement of some little aid from an officer or company from our army, the people are organising and arming in force to repel their oppressors and hold their own country.

In fact, at this time we have possession of larger portions of both States than at any period since they were overrun by the enemy, and by the indignities and wrongs of their domination they have driven all loyal people to bid defiance, and to resolve never to submit. Should disaster overtake the army invading Georgia, the uprising of the people behind it would probably be general, and the reestablishment of the permanent ascendency of the Confederacy over those important and abundant States be fully secured.

EARLY'S DISASTERS.

Shortly after the fall of Atlanta, a series of disasters befel our troops in the Valley of Virginia, and contributed to the discouragement then existing. But when we consider the events of the entire campaign, the brilliant achievements of our armies in Florida, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, and Missouri; the long, and arduous, and successful resistance made by the army of Northern Virginia, in which every virtue of an army and the genius of consummate generalship have been displayed; the glorious defence of Petersburg and Richmond; the numerous successes that have crowned our arms in Maryland, Virginia, Georgia, South Carolina, and Mississippi; the adventurous, bold, and effective efforts of our cavalry, under Hampton, Forrest, Lee, and others—we could have cause for congratulation and rejoicing. We have resisted the mightiest of the efforts of our enemies. We have encountered and defeated his largest and best appointed armies. We have thwarted his best-laid plans. We have shown ourselves to be worthy of that separate and equal place among the nations of the earth which is our birthright, and which has been unjustly withheld from us.

MAINTENANCE OF THE ARMY.

The superintendence of the measures for the increase, organisation, equipment, supply, and movement of the army is devolved upon this department. The Acts of Congress of April and December 1862, to make further provision for the public defence, and the Act of Congress in February last, to organise forces to serve during the war, contain the authority of the department and designate the means for maintaining the efficiency of the army as to men. The war upon the part of the Confederacy being defensive, the proportions it was to assume depended upon the character and extent of the means employed by the enemy for its prosecution. His scheme for the prosecution of the war was to overcome all opposition by the magnitude of his means and the superiority of their supply and equipments. Referring to the census tables, he estimated the arms-bearing population of the Confederate States accessible to their control in any form to be less than 1,000,000 of men. He determined to place forthwith in the military and naval service some 700,000 men, and thus to compel the Confederacy to put in requisition its entire strength, and since 1861 he has strained every nerve to maintain his armies at the same standard as to numbers. He has recruiting agencies throughout the continent of Europe, and he has enlisted from the negroes of this continent, it is said, some 200,000 soldiers. It is evident, therefore, that to carry on the contest the Confederacy was compelled to put its entire resources in the field. The Acts of Congress of 1862, before mentioned, contained the principle that in a struggle involving the being of a nation every citizen may be assigned to that position, and to perform that duty in which he can render best service.

The Exemption Acts of 1862 and 1863, which followed the Acts of Conscription, do not contract this principle. They were designated to effect such an organisation of the industry of the States as to enable us to defend ourselves with all our resources. Cut off from the commerce of the world, and destitute as we were at the beginning of the war of magazines and arsenals from which to draw supplies, it became apparent that our safety depended upon the activity and success with which our internal resources could be developed. For us there was an imperative necessity for a pretension to manufacturing, mechanical, and mining enterprise, and for the devotion of agricultural industry to the production of subsistence for the army and people. The Exemption Acts of 1862 and 1863 were liberal in the promotion of this policy, and the Confederacy has derived from them the most beneficial results. Notwithstanding the embarrassment and obstruction that follow upon the use of a depreciated currency, and that much of the territory of the Confederacy has undergone the devastation of war, an adequate supply of provisions has been obtained for the army. The moving of our armies has been maintained by the aid extended to railroads; the manufacturing establishments have supplied a large portion of the clothing for soldiers; and the mechanical, mining, and manufacturing industry employed upon the production of arms and munitions of war, have enabled us to conduct our campaign with security and confidence.

We have been enabled to compete with a nation of artisans and mechanics whose invention and skill have been stimulated by the munificent bounty of their Government. Nor were these results achieved by any sacrifice, or even detriment to the claims of the armies in the field. The muster and pay rolls of the armies show that through the campaigns of 1862 and 1863, if any undue diminution was discernible, it was due to desertion and absentees more than to any deficiency in the recruiting system that had been adopted. It cannot be disguised that the duration of this war for more than three years, the unparalleled largeness of its proportions, and the sanguinary nature of the warfare, have become manifest in the official returns of our armies and of the recruiting service. The Acts of Congress during the past winter contain admissions of the fact. They provide in no indistinct terms for the contingency that was anticipated shortly to occur, when the capacity of our people to contribute further recruits to the army would be more heavily fixed than at any future period. The regulation that discharged a principal who had furnished a substitute was abrogated, and the principal was required to return to the army. The bureau service was curtailed in its efficiency by the withdrawal of men able to perform duty in the field, their places to be supplied by the disabled, feeble, and invalid. A large portion of the exemptions were repealed, and details were limited to cases of public necessity or State expediency, or confined to experts and persons of skill and craft. The department was unable to execute the law as soon as it was promulgated without deranging all branches of the service and seriously crippling the operations of the armies in the field.

The dependence of those armies upon the departments of supply for efficiency and vigour is too intimate to allow of any abrupt or incautious disturbance of their operations. The reduction in their service to the standard required by the Act of Congress was, however, progressing regularly in such mode as to assure against any shock or arrest to essential operations. But the urgency of the field service, the thinning of our own ranks under the casualties and sufferings of the campaign, and above all the call of the enemy for five hundred thousand recruits, and the extraordinary efforts they were making to assemble overpowering hosts on every field, but especially before and for the capture of our capital, demanded that all available means should be promptly employed to increase the number and efficiency of our army. It became necessary not only to expedite the removal to the army of those whom the act referred to had proposed to withdraw from employment in the administrative branches of the service, but also to extend the call to all others liable to conscription for active service. The late legislation of Congress, while subjecting classes before exempt to service, had given a large discretion of detail, and had manifested a desire for the liberal allowance of such with a view to maintain the agriculture, manufactures, and industrial operations of the country. This discretion had been used as far as seemed at the time compatible with the demand of the active service, and had withheld for these important ends considerable numbers not exempts from our armies.

It has been, in view of the force being mustered against us, deemed necessary to revoke all such details, and to enforce rigidly the laws of conscription limited to men capable only of light duty, and to reserves employment in the department of the public service, and thus to liberate for the field all liable to such duty, except skilled artisans, experts, and men of science, and a few others actually indispensable for the maintenance and supply of the armies, by subjecting all others rigidly and promptly to the obligations of active service which the law imposes. It is believed very considerable reinforcements of the most effective material are being afforded to our armies; in addition to which the law allowing the acquisition by impressment, if necessary, of 20,000 able-bodied male slaves for employment with the armies as teamsters, cooks, and the like, is being enforced, and the substitution of such will allow the recall to the ranks of many valuable men who have heretofore been detailed for such incidental service. The reserves, too, consisting of those between seventeen and eighteen and those between forty-five and fifty years of age, have been organised under a command for each State, and where the State is invaded have been called into active service; they have been found an efficient force to supply guards to cities and public works and for the large number of prisoners in our hands, and also as defenders of bridges, roads, and important points, and have thus liberated for the field many soldiers who must otherwise have been withdrawn from the active armies. On several occasions, too, portions of them have been thrown with the armies in the field as active auxiliaries. So far, wherever tried, they have exhibited the characteristic valour and aptitude of our people for military life, and have compared well with their veteran comrades in constancy and conduct.

These various measures, sanctioned by existing legislation, must materially increase and reinvigorate our depleted armies; but it is not to be disguised that they must still leave those armies relatively weak to encounter the hosts being summoned by the enemy for subjugation. Signs of exhaustion and despair of success were, until some late unhappy reverse to our arms, plainly manifested by our malignant foes; and this is probably the last grand effort their means or resolution will allow for their war of aggression and conquest. It should be met and overcome by the early and full command of all our men and means, and for this additional legislation is required. It is my deliberate conviction, more than once expressed in former reports, that the policy of granting exemptions to those capable of military service is unwise, and that all men between the ages of eighteen and forty-five capable of bearing arms should, without distinction of occupation or profession, be subjected to service and called to the field. The few indispensable exceptions for the needs of society and the supply of the army might be readily and more conveniently provided by details. Exemptions by classes necessarily cover many not actually demanded by society for the needs that on the average may have given plausibility to the exceptions; and such exceptions, besides inducing invidious feelings and dissatisfaction, compel a discrimination in the call for service which both delays and measurably defeats its full accomplishment.

It is, therefore, urgently recommended that all exemptions, except of officers actually essential to the conduct of the Confederate and State Governments, be abolished, and all of the military age, physically capable, without distinction or discrimination, be at once devoted to the sacred duty of defending their country in the field. They would probably constitute as large a draft for continuous service in the field as the interests of society would allow; but it is not doubted that, with the aid of our slaves, those beyond and below the ages prescribed for active service, with the large number of those fit only for light duty, and the partially disabled by service, would suffice adequately to maintain necessary production and supply both for the armies and the people.

EMPLOYMENT OF SLAVES.

With a view to the increase of our armies in the field, the policy has been suggested, and has attracted some public attention, of enlisting our negro slaves as soldiers. No compunction could be felt in so using them; for, deeply as the whites of the South are interested in repelling the invasion and for ever liberating themselves from the association or thraldom of our enemies, the negroes of the South are even more vitally concerned. With the whites it is a question of nationality, of honour, and property; with the negroes, in its dread issues in no distant future, it is the question of their existence as a race. The friendship of a people so selfish, cruel, and remorseless as our foes, would be to the unhappy negro more fatal than to us their enmity. In contact with them, under their pretended freedom before the law, which, in operation on an inferior race, is but a license to greed and oppression; exposed to all the vices, without the providence, of the civilised man, they must soon, in the language of a leader among their professed friends, 'be trampled out as a sickly exotic,' or wither away amid the blighting influence of debauchery, pauperism, crime, and disease.

They have, besides the homes they value, the families they love, and the masters they respect and depend on, to defend and protect against the savagery and devastation of the enemy. No fear is entertained of their fidelity, for the feelings as the interests of the great mass of the negroes have been conclusively manifested to be with their protectors and masters. Neither is it doubted that, under the leadership of those whites to whom they have been habituated and in whom they have confidence, they would exhibit more steadfastness and courage than they will ever attain as soldiers of the enemy. If any added incentive were required from the supposed love of freedom natural to man, it might be readily afforded by the assurance of emancipation to all who conducted themselves with fidelity and courage during the war. For any such action it would, of course, require the concurring legislation of each State from the slave population of which the negro soldiers had been drawn, because to the States belongs exclusively the determination of the relations which their coloured population, or any part of them, shall hold.

It is not doubted, however, should it be deemed expedient so to employ and reward slaves enlisted as soldiers, that the necessary legislation would be accorded, for there is no sacrifice of property or minor interests which would not be made by either our States or people to assure final separation from our hateful foes and the achievement of our liberty and independence. While it is encouraging to know this resource for further and future efforts at our command, my own judgment does not yet either perceive the necessity or approve the policy of employing slaves in the higher duties of soldiers; they are confessedly inferior in all respects to our white citizens in the qualifications of the soldier, and I have thought we have within the military age as large a proportion of our whole population as will be required or can be advantageously employed in active military operations. If, then, the negro be employed in the war, the inferior is preferred to the superior agent for the work. In such a war as this, waged against foes bent, with malignant persistence, on our destruction, and for all that man holds priceless, the most vital work is that of the soldier, and for it wisdom and duty require the most fitting workmen. The superior instrumentalities should be preferred. It will not do, in my opinion, to risk our liberties and safety on the negro while the white man may be called to the sacred duty of defence. For the present it seems best to leave the subordinate labours of society to the negro, and to impose its highest, as now existing, on the superior class.

RESERVES.

Reserves might remain as now constituted for service throughout each State, but in addition it would seem expedient that all other white males capable of bearing arms in even local service should be organised and armed ready to maintain the police of the country and to resist within the limits of their counties or some districts contiguous thereto the actual raids or invasion of the enemy. No serious interruption would thus be caused to their industrial avocations or their relations to society, and yet a greater degree of security and confidence, and a universal sentiment of patriotic self-devotion, would be secured. In the war waged by our malignant foes, who aim not merely at our national existence, but at the institutions of our social system, at the property and means of sustenance of all, and contemplate nothing less than desolation to the country, and expulsion or extinction of its inhabitants, all, of whatever age, have both interest and duty compelling to stand to arms in defence, according to the measure of their ability. The country should be as one great camp, and the whole people arranged in the most efficient military organisations, compatible with the maintenance of the necessary works and productions of society, for unflinching resistance to the utmost extremity. The subjugation of a brave people so organised and resolved is an utter impossibility.

THE CAVALRY.

Some measures of legislation are believed to be expedient to maintain the number and increase the efficiency of the cavalry in the field. The policy of requiring the men to furnish their own horses was at all times doubtful, as, while affording apparently an inducement to greater care of the animal, it interferes with discipline and impairs efficiency. It also causes, almost of necessity, the dismounting for long periods of those who, having lost horses, are unable to furnish them speedily, or at all, and the absence often on protracted furloughs of the men who have sustained such losses to procure other horses. Under the weariness of protracted service, and the eager longing for return home, which at times possess even the best of soldiers, this chance of a furlough is said to more than counteract the interest of ownership in the horse, and to constitute a premium on neglect or the allowance of casualties to disable their armies. A worse consequence, perhaps, is the tendency and temptation of the system to induce plundering and irregular modes of supplying themselves by the men. Those mounted are aware of the constant liability to the loss of their animals, and of the difficulty and expense of replacing them, and are under constant inducements to obtain reserve horses or means of purchasing them. Those dismounted are even more strongly stimulated by the inconveniences of their position and the danger of being transferred to less acceptable branches of the service to provide themselves even by illegitimate means.

These inducements are all enhanced by the limited class of casualties for which the value of the horse lost is repaid under the present law, and the delays and embarrassments encountered in affording proof and obtaining payment. Horses are paid for, too, only at the valuations assessed at the time they are taken into service, and with the fluctuations in the value of our currency and the enhancement of price resulting from the increasing scarcity of the proper horses, the value repaid is generally grossly inadequate. If the present system is to continue, it is indispensable that there should be a wider range to the casualties in which the value is repaid, more liberality in the assessment of value, and greater facilities for prompt payment. The class of men who constitute our cavalry, while among the most spirited and active of our citizens, are yet generally, from previous independent habits of life, most difficult to discipline and subject to subordination. Entering immediately on service, they have enjoyed few opportunities of previous drill or training; and from the detached and often irregular service in which they are frequently employed, they are much removed from the restraints and responsibilities of large commands.

They are but too apt, therefore, while individually gallant and enterprising, to be wanting in organisation, in discipline, and in the efficiency and reliability which should belong to trained troops. Our cavalry have performed many achievements of valour and utility, but they have also on occasions of great importance shown want of vigilance or constancy, and caused disaster. These defects are believed to spring not from deficiencies in the men, but in the system of selection and of training. It is believed it would be wiser that the cavalry should gradually be constituted of men picked from the trained and veteran soldiers for their peculiar qualifications, and that these should be mounted and equipped at public expense. It might be made a penalty for the loss of their horses through neglect, or any other than the inevitable casualties of war, that the man should be returned to infantry service. This would probably be found more efficient than under the present system private ownership has proved to obviate neglect and secure due attention of the animals, while it would remove all inducements from self-interest to undue caution for escape under the legitimate hazards of war. There would be the certainty, too, that the men were trained and disciplined and habituated to fight as infantry, which, in many instances, our cavalry, from the nature of the country or the like tactics of the enemy, are compelled to do. It is not doubted that in this way the superiority of our cavalry over that of the enemy could be permanently established.

CONSOLIDATION OF ORGANISATION.

It has been more than once heretofore urged by the Department that to maintain the number and efficiency of our army organisations, it was essential there should be some power of reducing and consolidating them. The depletion of many of the organisations during the late wasting and bloody campaign has made this more than ever manifest. It is impossible adequately to recruit many of the reduced regiments and companies, especially those from the distant and Trans-Mississippi States, and not a few are so thinned in their ranks as to cause despondency and inefficiency. There is necessarily, too, an undue proportion of officers to men, which adds to the expense, while weakening the force of the army. The evil is often so glaring that a remedy is obliged in some way to be applied. This is done at the expense of subsequent embarrassments and confusion of legal rights, by the temporary union, by the authority of the general in the field, of fragmentary companies or regiments; or, more legally, though indirectly, under the sanction of the department, by the disbandment of some depleted organisations and the assignment, as by conscription, of the men to some other. In such case, however, there is no chance of selecting the best officers of both organisations; but there is the injustice of depriving all the officers, however meritorious, of the one disbanded, of their commissions. It would evidently be much more just and beneficial to the service that the power should exist to consolidate the two and retain the best officers of each. It is recommended that the power be granted.

COURTS FOR RESERVES.

It has been mentioned that for the organisation and control of the reserves a commander has been assigned in each State. They constitute a peculiar auxiliary force, which yet cannot, it is thought, be justly deemed an independent army. Hence an embarrassment results which demands the correction of legislation. They are not entitled to order and review the proceedings of courts martial; nor, if a military court, as is authorised by law for each State, should be appointed, could they have it attached to their commands or review its decisions. As the reserves are necessarily rather deficient in order and training, the restraint and influence of such tribunals are specially necessary for their control and subordination. It is probably not necessary to give any military court or revision of the decision of any established for the States respectively, as the power to appoint and revise the proceedings of courts martial would suffice. Courts might then be constituted, to sit permanently, of disabled or invalid officers.

CONFEDERATE CAPTIVES.

The condition of our gallant soldiers in the hands of the enemy continues to engage the solicitude and interest of the department. The number of the captives on each side has been greatly swelled by the vicissitudes of the present fearful campaign, though the disproportion heretofore existing against us has been by our superior successes greatly reduced, if not entirely overcome. It has been the constant desire and effort of the department to effect exchange on any principle of equity, and the opportunity has never been lost to make this known to the enemy, and to obtain his concurrence. The obligations of the cartel and the faith pledged to its observance have been repeatedly invoked, but in vain. To such demands intimations were conveyed that the enemy would only agree to an exchange of man for man. So long as the enemy held, as they claimed, a superiority in the number of captives, it was seen that this mode of exchange would leave a surplus of our captive soldiers in their hands, without for the time any adequate check on the inhumanity and cruelty they have been ever prone to exhibit towards such captives. Still, as the preponderance of numbers steadily diminished, confidence increased that the prospect of speedy captures would soon enable us to check or average their malignity. This consideration in aid of the powerful incentives, even more of humanity and gratitude than of interest, that urged any practical effort for the relief and release of our imprisoned soldiers, induced us to overlook alike our just rights under the cartel and apprehensions of the probable ill-treatment of the surplus that might remain in the power of our vindictive foes, and to propose exchange on the very terms intimated as acceptable, man for man.

The offer only afforded another illustration of the hypocrisy, faithlessness, and inhumanity of the enemy, for it was soon made apparent that their professed willingness was but a pretext and a blind; and while they expected the plan would not be acquiesced in, to conceal their own determination to make no general exchange, they have here and there consented to partial exchanges, generally effected between commanders in the field; but the Government appears to have deliberately adopted the remorseless and inhuman policy of enforcing the captivity, with all its attendant sufferings, of the prisoners on both sides during the war. They pay thus impliedly to our gallant soldiers the tribute of admitted superiority, while they exhibit to the unhappy victims from their army their own ingratitude, perfidy, and cruelty. One of their favourite commanders has not even hesitated to avow, with utter disregard of the claims of their captive soldiers on their consideration and protection, as the terms of service of many had expired, they were not to be regarded as subjects of equal exchange. It likewise appears that as they gloat over the idea of being able, by their blockade and devastation, to starve to submission a people whom they cannot subdue by arms, they calculate, in utter indifference to the sufferings that may be entailed on their own captive soldiers, on the supplies which must be furnished them, as an effective drain on our limited resources. Could we, indeed, be so straitened as they delude themselves into believing, how fearful must they expect to be the privations and sufferings of their soldiers in our hands, since they could not expect us to starve our gallant soldiers or people to nourish the malignant invaders who had sought to inflict on us the worst ills of war and famine!

These captives would of course be the first unhappy victims of the famine which the barbarous warfare of their Government may cause. While no such suffering has yet been entailed on them, but on the contrary they have, through the humanity of our Government, been provided as our own soldiers, yet such privations as they have had to share with them have been exaggerated by the enemy, in part from their delusive conceptions of our straitened condition, but more from the diligent invention of false tales, and have been made the pretext of wanton privations to our soldiers in their hands. They compel suffering to their own soldiers by their malignant outrages against civilised warfare, and then find in such excuse for visiting cruelty and starvation on our soldiers, to whom it is not pretended they could not easily afford all the comforts and subsistence due to captives in war. The ineffable baseness of such a course exceeds even its inhumanity, and for either it would be difficult to find a parallel in the history of civilised, much less Christian nations.

It is gratifying to be able to state that since the foregoing was written a prospect has been afforded of ameliorating the condition of our captive soldiers. When all overtures to the government of our enemies seemed vain, General Lee was instructed to make directly to General Grant a proposition that, without releasing either government from the obligation of affording due provision to its captives, each should have the right of furnishing to its own prisoners in the possession of the other, under the direction of officers among them to be paroled for the purpose, such additional supplies of necessary articles as it might deem expedient to send. This was accepted, doubtless through the influence of the commanding general of the Federal armies, who, however profuse of the lives of his men in battle, could but have sympathy and interest for the imprisoned soldier. It is indicative of the remorseless policy of the hostile government that such concessions to the claims of humanity should have been made sooner by the stern soldier in the field than by their statesmen in the cabinet. As the liberty is afforded by the agreement, with commendable liberality, that supplies may be purchased in Northern cities or sent to our soldiers in captivity directly from foreign ports, there can be but little delay or difficulty in affording them all reasonable supplies for the alleviation of their unhappy state. This arrangement will be as gratifying to our government and people as it is conformable to humanity and wise policy. The report of our agent of exchange is submitted in connection with this subject. It will display the past course and present state of negotiations for exchange.

BUREAU OPERATIONS.

The operations of the several administrative bureaus of the department have been conducted with zeal, ability, and success, reflecting great credit on their several heads. They have had grievous difficulties and embarrassments to encounter from a depreciating currency, deficiencies of labour and materials, and straitened means of transportation and distribution. In addition, they have been constrained by the stringent legislation of Congress to relinquish their most active and experienced agents and employés, and substitute them from the more infirm and aged classes. It was not practicable to do this immediately without serious arrest of all the essential operations of production and supply for the army, but the obligation has been steadily observed, and as the exigencies of the campaign made recruitment of our armies necessary, its execution has been hastened and enforced to the furthest point compatible with the preservation and continuance of indispensable works. Interferences of this kind are inevitably so prejudicial and disturbing, that it is hoped a well-devised and permanent system of providing and retaining in continuous employment a sufficient number of artisans, experts, and labourers for all essential operations, may be devised and established. Great misapprehension, it is believed, has prevailed in the public mind, both as to the number and class of persons who have constituted the agents and employés of the several bureaus; and much unmerited odium and individiousness have been excited by the erroneous supposition that these bureaus have afforded a refuge and a shield from the legitimate claims of military service. The aim has been steadily enjoined, and, it is not doubted, in the main has been strictly observed, of engaging and retaining as few as possible of military age, and, with rare exceptions, it is confidently believed the men now employed are rendering more efficient service to the cause than they could even do in the field.

It should be thoroughly understood that only in the last necessity will they again be summoned or disturbed. The best vindication to these bureaus is afforded by the results attained under all the impediments and embarrassments they have had to encounter. All essential supplies have been afforded, and neither manufacture nor production has so far materially diminished, notwithstanding the invasions and barbarous ravages of the enemy in many most important fields of operation. The army has been subsisted, clothed, and provided in adequate measure, and there has never been deficiency of transportation, munitions, or supplies for all important operations.

THE INDIAN NATIONS.

Owing to the absence of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, on a visit, in discharge of his duties, to the Trans-Mississippi Department, his usual report cannot be submitted. Letters received from him by the department give in the main satisfactory representations of the feeling and condition of the Indian nations. From other sources, too, intelligence has been received of gallant services which have been rendered by their warriors during the present campaign, and there is every reason to believe that at no time has prevailed among the nations a stronger feeling of amity and connection with the Confederate States.

ESTIMATES, IMPRESSMENT LAWS, ETC.

Attention is invited to the accompanying estimates for the six months commencing January 1, 1865, which, although large in the existing state of the currency, are not to exceed the demands of the service. After the full exposition made in my last report of the embarrassments and obstructions experienced from the disordered condition of our currency, the impracticability of purchases without impressment, and the deficient means of transportation and distribution, it is not deemed necessary to repeat them. Attention, however, is specially invoked to them, as they continue with increased and increasing stringency, and remedial legislation, in some important particulars, is very desirable. The impressment acts require revision and amendment. There are not sufficient provisions against the removal of property after notice of impressment, nor against its concealment before or after; nor is the course prescribed in case of the refusal of the owner to appoint appraisers as contemplated by law. The law is, in brief, without adequate sanctions to insure respect and enforcement. Special provision should be made for the impressment of iron from railroads.

In order to maintain the more important roads, and sometimes to construct others demanded by imperious military considerations, it is absolutely necessary to withdraw from local or branch roads their rails and equipments. Although such necessity may be manifest and acknowledged by all, it is rare the proprietors of the special road, whose property is thus sought to be appropriated, are prepared to acquiesce in its selection for the sacrifice. Each local corporation finds abundant reasons for further delay or special exemption in its own case, and on them bases justification of refusal to sell, and the interposition of all possible legal obstructions to seizure by impressment. The machinery of the act is ill adapted to the settlement of the questions that arise on such impressments, and pretexts are readily found by the corporations for obtaining injunctions and suspending all action on the proverbially tedious proceedings of a suit in chancery. Local influences combine, too, to thwart and delay action, and more than once the gravest consequences to the Confederacy have been risked by inability at the juncture to overcome such impediments and command the required rails. The impressment of slaves, too, should be regulated so as to secure uniformity in collection and to relieve the authorities from dependence on the State agencies. These agencies do not generally operate with promptitude and efficiency, and sometimes prove frustrative or abortive. Appointments have been made under the Act of Congress, approved June 14, 1864, 'providing for the establishment and payment of claims for a certain description of property taken or informally impressed for the use of the army.' In many instances the agents selected have refused to accept, and it has been impracticable to secure others competent in consequence of the wholly inadequate compensation offered, which will pay a fraction only of the expenses to be actually incurred. It is not probable the law can be executed by the period prescribed, the 1st of January next, and it should be continued with a more equitable remuneration to the agents.

REFUGEES.

During the last year a few persons have gone to the United States without permission from the Confederate authorities. Some of these have no design hostile to the Confederacy, but others leave as informers and as enemies. In some cases the act is treasonable, in others more venial. A law is necessary to punish the cases which do not amount to treason under existing laws.

An appropriation was made in February last for the payment for loss of slaves who have been impressed by the Confederate authorities or under State laws for the use of the Confederate Government, and while engaged in labouring on the public defences have escaped to the enemy or died or contracted diseases which have after their discharge resulted fatally. The Act of Congress did not provide for the mode of ascertaining these losses and for the withdrawal of the money from the Treasury. Besides the slaves impressed there is a class of slaves who were received by contract, and others under the Act of Congress of the 17th of February last, by the consent of the owner, upon the condition that the Confederate Government should indemnify for loss, in cases similar to those mentioned in the appropriation bill above quoted.

I recommend that an act be passed for the adjustment of all these claims, and that the mode of adjustment be prescribed.

USE OF NEGROES BY THE ENEMY.

In view of the more numerous uses to which negroes are being put in connection with our armies, as well as of the proposition already considered of employing them as troops, it seems not inappropriate to examine the legislation and policy of our enemies in reference to the recruitment of their armies from the race, and especially from our negro States. In July 1862, the Congress of the United States passed their acts: 'To suppress insurrection, to punish treason and rebellion, to seize and confiscate the property of rebels, and for other purposes.' The traitors, under this act, are all those concerned in the war between the United States and the Confederate States. The persons attainted, and whose property is confiscated, are those who hold an office of honour or trust or agency under the Confederate Government, or any of the States, or in any municipality, or who may be in any wise engaged or concerned in the armed rebellion to the authority of the United States. The liberation of the slaves was to be a consequence of their conviction, and the slaves of all such persons who might escape or desert or might be captured, or who might fall within the places occupied by the arms of the United States, were, by the Act of Congress, liberated. The President was authorised to employ as many persons of African descent as he might deem necessary and proper for the suppression of the rebellion, and to organise and use them as he judged best for the public welfare.

This Act of Congress was followed by the proclamations of the President of the United States of September 22, 1862, and of January 1, 1863, in the last of which he ordered and declared that 'all persons held as slaves in designated States and parts of States are and henceforward should be free,' and 'that the Executive Government of the United States, including the military and naval authorities, will recognise and maintain their freedom.' The enlistment of a large number of slaves within the Confederate States into the service of the United States followed upon these acts. It was justly regarded by the Confederate Government as a departure from the usages of nations, and an abandonment of the rules of civilised warfare. In the better times of the United States their Executive Government had stigmatised conduct similar, but far more venial, 'as a warfare disclaiming all moral influence and inflicting an outrage upon social order, and giving a shock to the very elements of humanity.' 'All belligerent nations,' it declared, 'can form alliances with the savage, the African, and the bloodhound; but what civilised nation has selected those auxiliaries in its hostilities?' If there were any legal proposition that had the unanimous consent of that people, it was that the Federal Government had no power to abolish slavery in any of the States. The proclamation of their President does not proceed from any authority derived from the Constitution, but upon the assumed power to extend martial law over the territory of the United States and the Confederate States.

And the usurpation even extends beyond this, for martial law has reference to military operations and military locations. Its authority is temporary, abnormal, and deals with the events of a season; but this is an imperial edict, determining arbitrarily upon civil, social, and domestic institutions and relations for all time. For a term subsequent to the independence of the United States, negro slavery was recognised among all the United States as a valid relation, and its commercial population participated in the profits of the African slave trade under the laws of the Union within the present century. The ratio upon which representation in one branch of their Congress and direct taxes are apportioned, is adjusted upon a recognition of the existence of a race of bondsmen within the limits of the Union. Their highest judicial tribunal has determined that slavery and the slave trade are not contrary to the law of nations, and that the voluntary removal of slaves by a master to a State where slavery does not exist does not prevent the renewal of the relation between master and slave upon their return to the State of their origin or domicile. The diplomatic correspondence and the solemn treaties of the United States show reclamation for escaping slaves abducted in time of war and of peace, and the recognition of those claims by a foreign Power, and the payment of an indemnity for the use of the masters to the Federal Government.

At this time the Constitution of the United States contains a stipulation for the return of slaves escaping to one State from their owner in another State, upon his claim. The principle that a slave withdrawn from his master in war or peace, by desertion, capture, or other act not sanctioned by the law of the State or the will of the master, does not change his condition within the State to which he belongs or prevent the right of the master from attaching upon his recapture, is not an exceptional one. The municipal laws of one State have no more authority or recognition within the limits of another than it is compatible with the laws or policy of that State to allow, and it would be contrary to the universal usage and practice of nations for one nation to permit another, and that other an enemy, to abrogate, impair, or modify relations between classes or individuals of her population, in time of war, by any change in their existence, forced or voluntary. The principle of the jus postliminium in regard to persons, such as slaves, serfs, villains, deserters, or other persons to whom it is in anywise applicable, has been uniformly applied on the continent of Europe, and, as to slaves, was the law of Athens and of Rome, and from their jurisprudence has passed into the laws of European nations.

The enlistment of slaves as a part of the army of the United States had but a single object. The Act of Congress and proclamations which authorised it were formed to destroy political government and civil society in the Confederate States. By declaring all officers and agents of Confederate State and municipal governments to be outlaws, incapable of holding or transferring property, and subject to ignominious banishment, and declaring slaves to be emancipated and suitable for service in their armies, they sought an entire overthrow of their social order, and determined this should be a war of massacres and confusions, and not the highest trial of right between the people. It had become a principle among Christian sovereigns, that, however they might prosecute their quarrels and debates by arms and acts of hostility, and though they might seek the ruin and overthrow of the forces of the State, yet they would so direct their passions as to preserve the life and good name of each other. But from the beginning our enemy has prosecuted the war with murderous design to take the life and to destroy the fame of the people of the Confederate States. The crimes which determined the colonies to separate from Great Britain, and to denounce her king as a tyrant unworthy to rule a free people, are those which have been committed against us, under circumstances of tenfold atrociousness, in the existing war, by our enemy. He has plundered our seas, ravaged our coasts, burnt our towns, and destroyed the lives of our people.

He is at this time transporting large armies of foreign mercenaries to complete the work of death and devastation and tyranny already begun with circumstances of cruelty and perfidy scarcely paralleled in the most barbarous ages. He has excited domestic insurrections among us. Private property is wantonly destroyed; female honour outraged; whole districts of unarmed and unresisting population are ravaged and laid waste; old men, helpless women, weak and feeble children, the infirm and superannuated slave population, have been exposed to starvation and misery by the systematic, cruel, and persevering effort to destroy the food and raiment of an entire people. A war conducted on such principles, with such objects, and by such alliances, involved necessarily the abandonment of all laws, usages, conventions, mitigating influences, or humanising considerations and restraints. The enemy who adopts such a system proclaims in advance his desire, as well as his design, that the war shall become one for mutual extermination. In a contest with such an enemy, the Confederacy may exercise a very liberal discretion in the employment of any agencies or instrumentalities that are within their reach for the public defence. Should, therefore, either policy or necessity dictate it, the enlistment of slaves or any other population as auxiliaries would be entirely justified by the atrocities that we have suffered. It would be impossible to find any ally so unrestrained as the enemy against whom he would be employed.

Respectfully submitted,

JAMES A. SEDDON, Secretary of War.

The estimates submitted by the various departments for the support of the government for the six months from January 1 to July 1, 1865, are as follows:—

Legislative	$375,000
Executive office	47,845
Treasury Department	4,626,350
War Department	402,912,206
Navy Department	14,005,134

Civil and miscellaneous	$97,871,664
War Department	612,260,280
Customs	247,309
Navy Department	33,785,865
Total	$744,165,118

The expenditures were estimated by my predecessor for the three months from 1st April to 1st July at $162,000,000. At this rate the expenditures for the six months should have been $324,000.000

To this amount must be added the debts then stated to be in arrear, which do not appear to have been reduced, the actual expenditure being $284,251,386	75,000,000
Deduct amount paid	284,251,386
Balance	$114,748,614
Add the estimated expenditures from October 1st to January 1st, 1865	162,000,000
This exhibits a total of yet to be charged against existing appropriations.	$276,748,614

This amount deducted from the balance of appropriations undrawn, viz. $744,165,118, leaves the following amount from past appropriations applicable to the expenditure of the six months from the 1st of January to the 1st of July, 1865, $467,416,504.

The preceding table of the public debt, derived from the books of the Register, presents an aggregate of $1,147,970,208. The following summary includes the results of the taxation and funding of the old issues, which do not yet appear on the books of the Register, and exhibits the state of the debt with more precision:—

Funded debt, October 1		$539,340,090
Bonds, four per cent., to be issued for the old currency funded, viz.:
East of the Mississippi	$250,000,000
West of the Mississippi	30,000,000
		280,000,000
Total		819,340,090
Deduct amount of four per cent. bonds, receivable in payment of taxes		81,000,000
Total of funded debt		738,340,090
Unfunded debt:—
Treasury notes outstanding	$324,233,918
Deduct amount funded in Trans-Mississippi Department	30,000,000
Total	$294,233,918
Deduct tax 33⅓ per cent.	98,077,973
		196,155,945
Treasury notes, under act Feb. 17, 1864		283,880,150
Total		$1,218,376,185
This sum is liable to a further reduction for the following items of debt included in the Register's accounts, but still in the Treasury, viz.:—
Treasury notes (new issue)	$22,053,200
Bonds, 6 per cent., $500,000,000 loan	27,564,150
Bonds, 8 per cent., $100,000,000 loan	3,000,000
Certificates of indebtedness	17,270,900
Call certificates, 4 per cent.	22,106,840
		91,995,090
Total debt October 1, 1864		$1,126,381,095

A table of the public debt on April 1, 1864, prepared on the same principle, shows it to have been as follows:—

Funded debt	$523,530,670
Bonds, 4 per cent., for currency funded	280,000,000
Total funded debt, April 1	803,530,670

UNFUNDED DEBT.

Treasury notes, amount outstanding by the Register's accounts	$505,792,103
Deduct amount funded in Trans-Mississippi Department	30,000,000
Total	$475,792,103
Deduct tax of 33⅓ per cent.	158,597,368
		317,194,735
Total debt, April 1, 1864		$1,120,725,405

—which, compared with the sum of debt similarly ascertained on the 1st October, $1,218,376,185, shows an augmentation of $97,650,780 in the six months from 1st April to 1st October 1864.

This addition to our indebtedness is smaller than might have been apprehended, yet is greater than if the currency had risen in value, and thereby the expenditures had been reduced, and the large amount of taxes paid had contributed exclusively to the relief of the Treasury.

The foreign debt, consisting of a single item, is omitted; the whole amount, being under £2,200,000, is adequately provided for by the cotton owned by the government, even at sixpence per pound, the quantity being about 250,000 bales.

The expenditure of the current quarter, it is assumed, will be met from the following resources, viz.:—

Treasury notes—amount unexpended of the proportion applicable to the payment of expenditures	$80,000,000
Taxes—amount to be received for the last quarter of 1864, estimated at	35,000,000
Bonds, certificates of indebtedness, and loans on hypothecation of bonds	47,000,000
Total	$162,000,000

The certificates of indebtedness, provided by the act of 17th February, 1864, did not prove as favourite an investment as was anticipated, and the amount of these securities, taken in payment by public creditors up to 1st October, is $2,000,000 only. From the sale of bonds and loans on hypothecation of bonds, about $45,000,000 was raised, and from the new issue of Treasury notes $283,000,000.

The large and rapid issue of Treasury notes is the more to be regretted from the failure of the measures relied upon to sustain their value and reduce expenditures. The new notes are received by the public at a value scarcely any higher than the old, and, as a consequence, the expenses have not declined.

GOLD VALUE OF CONFEDERATE CURRENCY.

The currency demands the immediate and the gravest consideration of Congress. Unless a uniform and stable value can be given to the Treasury notes, the effort to carry on the war through their instrumentality must of necessity be abandoned. Acquiescence in its deplorable depreciation is to court the ruin to which it leads. One hundred and thirty-five dollars in currency, the price obtained for one hundred dollars in six per cent. bonds, is equal to six dollars only in specie; and to sell the bonds at this rate is in reality to dispose of them at ninety-four per cent. discount; or, in other words, to give a bond for one hundred dollars in consideration of the loan of six dollars.

There is not a man of property in the country who would not prefer any fair measure of taxation rather than procure a temporary and treacherous prosperity by the sale of mortgages on his estate at this ruinous rate.

The depreciation of the currency, proceeding from redundancy and the want of confidence in its ultimate redemption, can only be corrected by measures that shall both diminish its volume and sustain the public confidence. The measures adopted by Congress to reduce the currency did not combine these essential elements of success. Those who had taken the old notes, relying on the good faith of the government, on finding them suddenly deprived of one-third of their nominal value, became alarmed, and received the new notes under strong apprehensions of a repetition of the measure. At the time, too, that the currency act provided for a circulation exceeding four hundred millions of dollars, it circumscribed and reduced the demand for the notes by making the four per cent. bonds receivable in the payment of taxes. By the 1st day of August $170,000,000 of the new notes had already been issued, and less than $10,000,000 sufficed for the payment of the taxes collected at that date. Depreciation commenced at once, and proceeded at so rapid a rate that by the 1st day of October gold was selling at twenty-five dollars for one.

The necessity of providing a speedy and efficient remedy for this condition of things is obvious. The bonds have to be sold for this currency; the taxes must be collected in it, and hence all the means of the government for the purchase of supplies will consist of this medium. Admitting that the amount which may be raised from these sources is nominally equal to the estimated expenditures, there is yet no security against such a further decline in the value of the notes as will disappoint present calculations, and add enormously to the accumulation of the public debt. The time, therefore, seems to have arrived when Congress should take measures to restore and sustain the currency, or make provision for its honourable redemption, and resort to the use of specie and bank notes. The adoption of the last alternative, it is feared, would produce great embarrassment in the community, and the impossibility of obtaining an adequate supply of specie and bank notes for the wants of the government would create the necessity for a system of universal impressments, followed by incalculable suffering and distress.

PLANS OF IMPROVING THE CURRENCY.

That the government must be supplied with sufficient means to carry on the war all are agreed. Our enemy offers us no terms short of unconditional surrender of life, liberty and property, and no choice is left us, even if we were disposed to hesitate, which we are not, but to continue the war. The adoption, therefore, of a permanent and efficient system of finance is indispensable to the full development and unconstrained use of our resources. The return to specie payments being for the present impracticable, the enquiry is whether it is possible to restore and maintain the value of the Treasury notes as a currency. The accomplishment of this end is of such vast importance that it is, of all others, that to which the resources of the country should be devoted and applied. Were it possible to anticipate the productions of future years of peace, and convert them into money for immediate use, the expediency of resorting to such a measure could not be doubted. May not a near approach to it be made by devoting a portion of those future productions to the purpose of imparting to the Treasury notes a high and stable value? I submit that this may be done, and respectfully propose a plan for its accomplishment.

It is an act pledging the faith of the government against the issue of Treasury notes beyond the amount authorised by the act of 17th February, 1864; exempting the notes from taxation, providing for the application of twenty per cent. of the taxes annually to the reduction of that amount until peace be declared or the outstanding sum be reduced to $150,000,000; continuing the tax in kind after the war, and appropriating an ascertained proportion thereof annually to the redemption or payment of the circulation, until the whole shall be retired.

I propose that the redemption shall be made from the tithes of cotton, wheat and corn, at prices fixed by the act—namely, cotton at fifty cents per pound, wheat at four dollars per bushel, and corn at two dollars per bushel; that the notes be received after the war, from all persons liable to the tax in kind, in commutation of their tithes; and that the Secretary of the Treasury be authorised to issue certificates in exchange for Treasury notes bearing six per cent. interest, secured and redeemable in the same manner and on the same terms as the notes themselves, free from taxation, and receivable after the war in payment of the tax in kind; and that all notes received into the Treasury for these certificates be cancelled.

The effect of this measure would be that, at present prices, the entire population would be interested in exchanging their productions for Treasury notes. They would constitute not only a safe currency, but a profitable investment, for in the ratio of ten dollars for one, as compared with specie, the produce obtained in payment at the close of the war would cost the following prices, viz. cotton five cents per pound, wheat forty cents per bushel, and corn twenty cents. These nominally low prices would not operate to the prejudice of the agriculturist, for his tax, being in kind, would neither be increased nor diminished by the price. It is true he would have a collateral interest in common with tax-payers generally (for of course all interests will be taxed) in the redemption of the notes at a moderate rate. In this respect his interest would be protected by the prices stipulated by the act, which are not too low for a time of peace. But if they were, a full compensation would accrue to the tax-payer in the immediate enhancement of the notes and consequent reduction of expenses. And the producer would find a complete indemnity in the sale of a bushel of corn now at four dollars, and the application of the money to the payment of a tax hereafter of two bushels.

In suggesting the three articles of cotton, wheat, and corn, as a specific pledge for the redemption of the currency, no immunity from their full proportion of taxation is intended to be implied, in respect of other objects of the tax in kind, or any subjects of taxation whatsoever. These are only assigned to this particular office or function because of their peculiar adaptation thereto.

The following is an estimate of the resources to be thus applied, viz. :—Wheat, twenty-five million bushels; Indian corn, two hundred million bushels; and cotton, two million bales. A tax of ten per cent. would yield as follows:—

Wheat, two million five hundred thousand bushels, at four dollars	$10,000,000
Indian corn, twenty million bushels, at two dollars	40,000,000
Cotton, two hundred thousand bales, at two hundred dollars per bale	40,000,000
Total	$90,000,000

This amount applied annually would redeem the notes outstanding in four or five years. The credit due to this estimate may be inferred from the following summary of the crops of the Confederate States before the war, taken from the United States census of 1860: —

COTTON ESTIMATED AT FOUR HUNDRED POUNDS PER BALE AND FIFTY CENTS PER POUND; WHEAT AT FOUR DOLLARS PER BUSHEL, AND CORN AT TWO DOLLARS PER BUSHEL.

The leading details of this plan or measure to reassure the public of the safety of the currency, and the redemption of it in full, will consist of the ratio in which the selected staples should be combined, and of the provision necessary to equalise the value of the postponed and preceding instalments. The combination of the staples, as recommended in this report, is 1-9 of wheat, 4-9 of corn, and 4-9 of cotton. The scheme recommended in another place, for the purpose of harmonising the value of the successive instalments, is the substitution of certificates bearing interest for the currency set apart by the holders in commutation of the tax or to purchase the tithes. After the most careful investigation, I am satisfied that the measure may be successfully reduced to practice.

Under the operation of this system, a sure appreciation of the currency may confidently be expected. All will discern the advantage to arise from the acquisition of Treasury notes at present prices, and even foreign capital may be expected to absorb a part, for, at the rate of ten dollars for one dollar of specie, the cost of cotton would be reduced to five cents per pound. Confidence may be expected to return; for those who dread repudiation, and those who would regard the return to specie payments with equal alarm, would both be encouraged and assured. In imparting increased value and security to the Treasury notes, greater reliance in the value of the funded debt would be inspired, for the expenditures would be reduced, and the accumulation of debt be retarded.

The currency debt being provided for, the total remainder, to wit: the funded debt, would be as already stated	$738,340,090
And if to this sum be added the amount of bonds to be sold before the 1st January, which may be estimated at about	40,000,000
The total sum of interest bearing debt on the 1st of January, 1865, will be . . .	$778,340,090

The value of the real and personal property in the Confederate States, in 1860, according to the United States census, taken at specie value, was	$5,202,166,107

Notwithstanding the waste and desolation of the war, and the amount of property in the enemy's lines, the subjects of taxation under the act of 17th February 1864, according to the returns made to the commissioners by the assessors, under the act of 19th August 1861, is as follows:—

Property employed in agriculture—
Specie value . . .	$2,900,758,777
Currency valued at $5 for $1.		$14,503,793,890
Other property—
Specie value . . .	1,450,379,379
Currency valued at $7 for $1.		10,152,655,653
Specie value . . .	$4,351,138,156
Currency value		$24,656,449,543

There is an element of our national wealth, taken singly, that exhibits, in a striking view, the amplitude of our resources to meet our wants. I refer to the great staple of cotton. The net proceeds of one bale exported and sold in England at the present price is about two hundred dollars in gold; and, at the rate of ten dollars in currency for one dollar in gold, this is equal to two thousand dollars, and to four billions of dollars for the two millions of bales estimated to be still in the country—a sum more than five times as great as the funded debt. The impossibility of realising the full benefit of this resource under existing circumstances is admitted; but the statement exhibits the abundance of our means, and every effort should be made to apply this great element of wealth and power to the purpose of arresting the progress of depreciation and retarding the accumulation of debt.

I propose an additional duty of five cents per pound on the exportation of cotton and tobacco, and the duplication of the duties on imports; payment to be made in coupons of the five hundred million loan, sterling exchange and specie, as now provided by law. The price of cotton in Liverpool being about sixty cents per pound, the deduction of five cents for the tax would hardly have an appreciable effect upon its value in currency. The duty would fall chiefly on the foreign consumer, or be taken from the profits of the exporter; and an important financial advantage would be obtained at a moderate expense to the country. The increased duty on imports would be a small tax on this lucrative trade. If paid by the importer, it would be free from all objection; and if by the consumer, his ability to bear it is abundantly proven by the high price paid for goods. These measures would enhance the value and enlarge the demand for the five hundred million loan.

The expenditures for the six months, from the 1st of January to the 1st of July, 1865, with an improved currency, may be safely estimated at a maximum of $300,000,000; and for the twelve months at	$600,000,000
To this amount must be added for the redemption of notes, as proposed, the sum of . . .	60,000,000
And for the estimated amount of floating debt .	114,000,000
Total	$774,000,000

To meet these demands upon the Treasury, I propose the following scheme of taxation and loans, viz. :—

1. Taxation, including the tax in kind . .	$360,000,000
2. Sale of bonds of the five hundred million loan and certificates of indebtedness . . .	409,000,000
3. Import and export dues, and miscellaneous receipts	5,000,000

To raise the amount proposed by taxation I recommend the repeal of so much of the Act amending the Act of 17th February, 1864, as will leave the property and income-tax in full operation, without the abatements now allowed—viz. : section 1, paragraph 1, of the Amendatory Act of 14th June, 1864, which provides that the value of the tax in kind shall be deducted from the ad valorem tax on agricultural property; and section 8, paragraph 2, of the same act, which provides that the property-tax shall be deducted from the income-tax. By this change the desired amount of revenue will be secured, and the prominent inequalities of taxation, now the subject of complaint, will be redressed.

The tax in kind being ten per cent., and its value in currency $145,000,000, it follows that the productions taxed amounted in value to $1,450,000,000; and the assessed value of the property from which these productions are derived being $2,900,758,778, it is apparent that the gross income of $1,450,000,000,000 is equal to fifty per cent. of the assessed value of the property. Hence, an agricultural estate of the value of $100,000, subject to an ad valorem tax of $5,000, yielded a gross income of $50,000. The tithe of this income ($5,000) paid the property-tax, and left undiminished $45,000 of income. This result was the consequence of valuing the property for taxation in specie, and the productions received in payment of the tax in currency. Had the property been valued in the medium in which the tax was payable, the assessment would have been at least $500,000 and the tax $25,000, or had the articles received in kind been valued, as the property was—in specie—the payment would not have exceeded $2,000, and $3,000 more of tax would have been received in currency.

The inequality of taxation that resulted is made conspicuous by a comparison with investments made in government securities. The same sum of $100,000 in eight per cent. bonds, yielding $8,000 per annum interest, paid $5,000 tax, and left a clear income of only $3,000. Capital invested in banking presents a contrast equally striking. One of the banks in Richmond, which is referred to as an example only, on a capital of $2,336,000 paid $424,400 taxes, the specie being assessed at eighteen times the value of 1860; and the amount distributed among the stockholders as income was $268,640. On $100,000 consequently, thus invested, the tax was $18,000 and the income $11,500. These inequalities gave rise to grave complaints, while any amount of taxation equitably distributed would doubtless be cheerfully met.

The collection of a large sum in taxes is essential to the reform of the currency, and the country is in a condition the most favourable to bear the burthen. The abundance of money and high price of every species of property and supplies would render the payment easy and free from embarrassment. The Treasury will derive little aid from this source in the present year. The tax on the currency brought no revenue, operating only as a reduction of the circulation. The other taxes, with comparatively little exception, will be received in four per cent. bonds. The taxes upon property and income respectively are to some extent nominal only, the ad valorem tax on property engaged in agriculture being discharged by the credit of the tax in kind, and the income tax on other property diminished by the whole sum of the ad valorem tax. These abatements and the payments in four per cent. bonds result in reducing the revenue from taxation (exclusive of the soldiers' tax) to about $40,000,000.

REPORT OF THE COMMISSIONER OF TAXES.

THE accompanying able report of the Commissioner of Taxes is referred to for much valuable and interesting information on this important subject.

Computing the property of the country at the present estimated value, the following is the existing rate of taxation, viz. :—

Value of real and personal property in currency, rated at five to seven times the valuation of 1860 . .	$24,656,449,551
Total amount of taxes, including the tax in kind and the soldiers' tax	287,000,000 which is at the rate of one and one-sixth per cent.

With this estimate of the resources of the Confederacy, the taxes proposed for the ensuing year cannot be deemed excessive. The sum of $360,000,000, reduced into specie at twenty dollars for one dollar, is only $18,000,000, and this amount, applied to the values of 1860, viz. : $4,351,138,157, is at the rate of less than one half of one per cent. And if the calculation is made in currency, viz. $360,000,000, upon an assessment of $24,656,449,551, it would amount to one and a half per cent. And when it is remembered that with the payment of the taxes quarterly, a measure which I strongly recommend, less than one fourth of the currency will suffice for the quarter's tax, and the amount collected in any one quarter will be restored to the circulation before another becomes payable, it is apparent that the resources of the country are ample to meet the proposed increase of taxes.

It may be objected that the several measures combined will unduly reduce the circulation, and expose the country to the evils of a declining and insufficient currency. The reply to this objection is, that the evils predicated are, to some extent, inseparable from the reduction of the currency and the improvement of its value. Any measures that are successful in effecting the desired reform must, of necessity, be followed by the trials that attend upon such a transition. If Congress does not interpose, and by some such measures as I have ventured to recommend restore the currency gradually, judiciously, and by means of voluntary action, it will assuredly rectify itself by some violent and disastrous convulsion.

The developments attending the execution of the Currency Act of February 17, 1864, reveal clearly that the great body of the circulation is held in moderate sums by persons of limited means in all classes of the population. The deposits held by the banks, large as they are in the aggregate, proved to be the accumulations of individual depositors in all parts of the country. The report of the depositaries appointed for funding the old notes show that soldiers, soldiers' families and the poor generally, have been the heaviest sufferers by the tax on the currency and its depreciation. In view of the large stake of the poorer classes of society in the currency, the responsibility of fixing the value and establishing the security of the notes, assumes the gravity of a sacred duty. The soldier, and all who are forced to the immediate use of their money, are without the chance of redress for the loss they sustain by the depreciation, whereas the capitalist has it in his power to indemnify himself, and even reap a profit by investing in public bonds.

The measures proposed may be expected to correct this inequality, and give to those who claim our sympathy a mortgage upon our future supplies for bread at fair prices, and when the war is over the country will enjoy the satisfaction of having protected its defenders from want.

If the proposed reform should be followed by a general and large decline in prices, the result would be hailed with the liveliest satisfaction, except by those whose imprudent investments have contributed to the derangement we desire to correct. No improvement of the currency can be expected that will not be attended by an immediate decline of prices. It will, therefore, be idle to say that the reform of the currency is desired, if we are willing that existing prices should be continued, and to shrink from measures that will be attended by the results indicated, is to oppose the reform of the currency. The time for hesitation is past, and one of two alternatives must be adopted. Measures should be taken without delay to revive confidence in the treasury notes and uphold their value, or a tax payable in specie and the notes of solvent banks be resorted to. In the most favourable light in which these notes can be regarded, the purchasing quality does not exceed one to seven or eight, as compared with specie; and the bonds are even lower in value, being sold at the rate of one hundred dollars in bonds of six dollars in specie. To continue such exchanges, if, indeed, for any length of time it were possible, would be ruinous. But my conviction is, that it is impossible to persevere, and, unless prompt and decided measures of reform are adopted, the progress of depreciation will be accelerated, and our embarrassments become insurmountable. I would therefore earnestly urge upon Congress the necessity of acting with despatch, and by the adoption of vigorous and decided measures, restore the value of the currency and avert the calamity with which we are threatened.

To remove apprehensions of our ability to bear with convenience the increased taxation recommended, it will suffice to call attention to the amount of taxes paid this year:

The total amount of taxes is estimated at.....	$374,188,414
But from this sum must be deducted the credit given for the tax in kind and the income tax, viz.	128,787,245
Leaving as the amount of taxes actually paid.....	$245,401,169

To this amount must be added the tax on Treasury notes of thirty-three and a third per cent.; and as the four per cent. bonds have declined in value to $66·66 per $100, the tax, in effect, included the whole sum of issues, except in so far as the bonds were used at par in the payment of taxes, viz.:—

Total issue	$797,792,000
Less estimated amount of four per cent. bonds receivable in payment of taxes	89,000,000
Total	$708,792,000
$708,792,000 at thirty-three and a third per cent.	$286,264,000
Sum of taxation actually borne by the people in 1864	481,665,169

Of this sum there was received in aid of the Treasury, viz.:—

Tax in kind, valued at	$145,527,431
Tax paid in currency	40,000,000
Total	$185,527,431
It is now proposed to raise $360,000,000, which will bring into the Treasury an excess over last year of	174,472,569

While the sum of taxation to be met by the people will be $121,665,169 less than last year.

I would respectfully recommend that all government bonds and stocks, and loans of every description to the government, be declared free from taxation, except upon the income derived therefrom; and that the income tax be at the same rate and subject to the same conditions as other income taxes. The policy of this measure is obvious. Under existing laws, except in the case of the five hundred million loan and the certificates of indebtedness, the income derived from government securities is nearly all taken back in the form of taxation. One effect is to drive the bonds abroad and create a foreign debt that will be found oppressive on the return of peace, and another is to raise a preference for other investments over government securities. Many investments yield a larger income than simple interest, and are capable of bearing the tax, but the interest on government loans being limited, and not susceptible of augmentation, the tax of five per cent. absorbs nearly the entire income. In the case of the four per cent. bonds, the whole would be taken; and when it is remembered that this rate of interest is low, and that the loan was in a measure compulsory, this class of public creditors seem particularly entitled to the consideration of Congress. Tender regard for the just claims of those who, confiding in the honour and good faith of the government, responded to its call for pecuniary aid will be attended by no loss, since they who deal the most honourably with the creditor invariably borrow on the best and most economical terms.

I would particularly call attention to a class of creditors now lending their money to the Treasury at four per cent. interest, on the hypothecation of the six per cent. non-taxable bonds. It is obviously the interest of the government to exempt these loans from taxation, in like manner with the bonds they represent.

THE BANK TAX.

The tax also upon the banks deserves, in a particular manner, the careful consideration of Congress. It would be a conspicuous wrong to constrain these institutions to wind up their affairs, and a serious loss, both to the public and the government, to deprive the country of the support to be drawn from the concentrated capital they possess. This, I think, must eventually be the effect of the present tax if continued, and I recommend a modification of the law, such, in my opinion, as will give the desired relief and leave the revenue undiminished. The assets of the banks represent the following interests:—

1. The capital belonging to the stockholders.
2. The surplus fund also belonging to the stockholders.
3. The deposits belonging to their customers.
4. The outstanding circulation belonging to the bill-holders.

The following plan of taxation is proposed:—

1. That the ad valorem tax be laid upon the sum of the capital and surplus profits; being the total property of the stockholders expressed in currency.

2. That deposits be free from taxation, as consisting of Treasury notes only, a tax upon which reacts upon the government.

3. That a tax of twenty-five per cent. be laid upon the notes of the bank, payable in specie and Treasury notes, the former in the proportion that the specie held by the bank bears to the sum of the outstanding notes, provided that all billholders presenting their notes at the bank and making affidavit that the notes were, on the day of the passage of the act, the property of loyal citizens or aliens in amity with the Confederate States, shall be taxed five per cent. only, and in the same proportions as to specie and Treasury notes, and that it be made the duty of the bank to record the notes thus presented, with the names of the persons holding the same, and to collect and pay the tax and to report to the proper officer for sequestration, as in the hands of the enemy, all notes not presented for record and taxation under the provisions of the act.

The circulation of the banks on 1st of January, 1859, was as follows, and there is no reason to suppose that it is now any less:—

Virginia	$10,349,342
North Carolina	6,202,626
Georgia	11,687,582
South Carolina	9,170,333
Alabama	6,651,117
Louisiana	9,094.009
Mississippi	169,409
Tennessee	6,472,822
Total	$59,797,240

If limited to the five first-named States, the tax would still operate on a sum of forty-three million dollars; and if the returns shall exhibit a smaller amount than this, the residue would be brought under sequestration, and contribute more largely than the tax to the relief of the Treasury.

The courts having decided that, under the act of the 15th of February, 1862, section twenty-seven, the four per cent. bonds issued under the act of 17th February 1864, to reduce the currency, are receivable in payment of property sold under the sequestration laws, I would respectfully call the attention of Congress to the subject. This cannot have been the intention; and as no other bonds are thus applied but such as are under par, I recommend the repeal of that provision of the law.

I would also direct the attention of Congress to the seven-thirty notes. The payment of interest is attended with the risk of frauds, and the regulations adopted for the security of the Treasury are found inconvenient to the public. For these reasons it is desirable to change the form of these obligations, and I recommend that authority be given to issue six per cent. coupon bonds in exchange for the notes. This measure would effect a saving in interest of one million three hundred thousand dollars annually, which sum capitalised, is equal to a reduction of nearly twenty million dollars of the principal of the debt.

In the act of June 14, 1864, to increase the compensation of the heads of the several executive departments, and other officers and clerks of the government, the terms used have been decided not to include the Commissioner of Taxes, and the heads of the other bureaus of the Treasury Department. It is not supposed to have been the intention of Congress to deny these officers the relief extended to others, and I suggest the early passage of an act to bring them within the meaning and entitle them to the benefits of the act of 1st June.

The third section of the act 'to organise forces to serve during the war,' approved February 17, 1864, authorises the Secretary of the Treasury to issue bonds for the payment of the bounty provided by the act, but omits to fix a time for payment of the bonds; and I respectfully recommend that the act be amended in that particular.

THE TRANS-MISSISSIPPI AGENCIES.

I have the honour to report that the agency of the Treasury in the trans-Mississippi Department has been organised and put in operation, and after a protracted delay occasioned by the difficulty of communication. The same cause has retarded the receipts therefrom of statements exhibiting the result of the funding and of its other operations. Supplies of the new issue of Treasury notes, of bonds and certificates of indebtedness, have been sent to that department, and there is every ground to believe that order and efficiency will soon take place, and the difficulties and embarrassments hitherto experienced there be removed.

The reports of the chiefs of the Produce Loan Bureau and of the Treasury Note Bureau will be submitted to Congress in a separate communication.

The Youngest Government in America.

ON the 5th of March next there will be three Governments on the continent of America, none of which existed three years ago. On that day the Confederate States will be rather more than three years old; the Empire of Mexico will be about one year old; and the new Federation, of which Mr. ABRAHAM LINCOLN has been elected the first President, will be just one day old. We propose to comment on this fact, and to point out the obligation it imposes on the Governments of Europe.

The three new Governments, besides juvenility, have another feature in common. They have all been created or ratified by a popular vote, and so emphatically teach us the oft-repeated lesson, that universal suffrage does not necessarily imply a republican form of government; that it does not guarantee a free government; that it is not the letter of a Constitution, but the spirit of the people, which gives birth to and sustains liberty. Besides analogies, there are differences between these Governments which deserve attention. In Mexico the form of government has been changed. In the Federal States the old name and the old form have been retained, but the character of the government has been completely revolutionised. The Confederate States have taken a new name, but retained the old form and the old principles. The Empire of Mexico was founded in the hope of replacing anarchy and misery by order and prosperity. The object of the Northern Federation is to conquer the South; the mission of the Confederates is to defend their hereditary rights and freedom. Or, to quote the words of Earl RUSSELL: 'The North is fighting for empire, and the South for independence!' The Empire of Mexico was established by the aid of that great military Power which assisted the British Colonies of North America in compelling the mother-country to recognise them as thirteen sovereign States. The Northern Federation has been ratified by the votes of the majority of the Northern people. The Confederacy represents the unanimous will of the Southern people. Mexico, though not involved in war, has a heavy debt, the legacy of a long period of political strife and degeneracy. The North, though the markets of the world have been opened to her to exchange her products for gold, is already in the throes of national bankruptcy; her debt is enormous, and her Government issues are not worth 50 per cent. of their nominal value. The debt of the South is not half that of the North, whilst her currency is vastly more depreciated; but then she has been shut out from commerce, and she has a stock of produce on hand worth more than the amount of her debt twice told. The stability of neither Mexico nor the Northern Federation has been tested by invasion, though we doubt not both could offer a successful resistance. The Confederacy has been tested by four years of invasion on a gigantic scale, and no one who has eyes to see and ears to hear, will deny that no young nationality was ever before called upon to endure such a fiery ordeal, or that any nation could have made a more heroic and—thank God!—a more successful defence. It was but yesterday that the Union, itself not older than some living men, was dissolved. Suppose four years ago, when the election of a sectional President warned the sovereign States of the South that they must leave the Union or become the creatures of a Northern faction, that some part of what has since occurred had been revealed—suppose it had been told the Confederates that their right of secession would be denied by Europe—that their ports would be blockaded, and that they would be cut off from all the supplies they so much needed—that the North, blinded by covetousness and malignity, would conscript upwards of 2,000,000 men for the purpose of subjugating the South—that the North would recruit her armies from Ireland and Germany—that the North would spend 400,000,000*l.* sterling for the prosecution of the war—what, we ask, would have been the effect of such a revelation? It would not have prevented secession, but the most sanguine friend of the South, the most fervent believer in the strength of patriotic devotion and in the might of right, could not have supposed, could hardly have dared to pray, that the North would make such small progress as she has done. About ultimate triumph there could have been no doubt, but it would have seemed inevitable that nearly all the great cities of the South must have fallen and have been in the military possession of the invader. How different is the actual result! Except New Orleans none of the greater towns have been captured. In the Confederate Capitol, but a day's journey from Washington, the Second Session of the Second Congress of the Confederate States is now assembled. We will not ask if Mexico could so triumphantly have resisted such an invasion, but we say, without fear of contradiction, that had the North been thrown upon her own resources as the South has been, with the same odds against her and the like armies invading her—we say that it is altogether without the limits of probability that her resistance would have been so successful. No wonder that the great man at the head of the Confederate Government, and the great captains who lead the Confederate armies, should be calm in the hour of adversity and humble in the hour of victory, feeling that God has been their shield, and that the Lord of Hosts has confounded their enemies.

We have said that on the 5th of March next the Federation of which Mr. LINCOLN has been elected the first President will be but one day old, and a little reflection will show that this assertion is true, and not a mere figure of speech.

Why is the Confederacy called a new Government? Some of the sovereign States which compose it are as old as the oldest States in the Northern Federation, and the newest States in the South are not so new as some of the States in the North. The State Governments of the South have not undergone so many changes since 1860 as the State Governments of the North. The Confederate Congress contains fewer new legislators than the Federal Congress. So far as constitutionalism is concerned, while there have been many important and radical changes in the North, there have been but few, indeed no fundamental, changes in the South. But we shall be told that the South seceded from the North. That is true, but it is also true that the North has seceded from the South. What does Southern secession mean? That the South determined upon having a central government in the election of which the North should have no part. Will not the North, on and after the 4th of March next, have a government in the election of which the South has taken no part? Did not the Federal Congress enact that the Southern States should not be allowed to vote in the Presidential election of 1864? Surely this is an act of secession of the North from the South as formal and solemn as the secession of the South from the North. We admit that the North declares that it intends to attempt to conquer the South. What of that? Suppose the South declared that it intended to attempt the conquest of the North, would that justify us in refusing to acknowledge the new Northern Federation? Should we therefore have to recall our Minister from Washington on the 4th of next March?

We presume the theory on which European Governments have hitherto refused to recognise the Confederate States is that Mr. LINCOLN was elected by a majority of the States both North and South, but such an argument will have no application after the 4th of March next. The Southern States are not the hereditary dominions of Mr. LINCOLN. The Southern States do not belong to Mr. LINCOLN by right of conquest, and he is not their elected ruler. There is no subterfuge, there is no sophistry, by which European Governments can pretend that the Government which will be inaugurated in Washington on the 4th of March next is either de jure or de facto the Government of the South. Mr. LINCOLN may say that he intends to restore the Union by force of arms—that he is going to reconcile the South by slaying her sons, by maltreating her daughters, and by burning her homes. But this has nothing to do with the question. We have to deal with the present, not the future. If Mr. LINCOLN should succeed—if the men of the South should be exterminated, and the lands of the South come into Northern possession—then indeed we should have to recognise in Mr. LINCOLN the sovereign of the South. But meantime, though Mr. LINCOLN does not rule over the South, there is a Southern Government. The question then for Europe to decide is this—whether on the 4th of March next she will refuse to recognise the Confederate Government, and so declare that there is no Government in the South—that is, that the South is in the position of uninhabited land, and that she is a lawful prize for those who first get possession.

Notes on Events of the Week.

AMERICA.

THE movement of the Federal General Sherman's army in two columns upon Macon and Augusta has excited a greater degree of interest than any previous enterprise of the war, both on account of the novelty and boldness of the undertaking and the consequences that are likely to flow from it. It is one of those desperate ventures that success alone can justify. Nothing can be more certain than that such a step was never meditated by General Sherman or the Cabinet at Washington, but that it was made absolutely necessary by the activities of Generals Hood and Beauregard in Sherman's rear. When the latter expelled the inhabitants of Atlanta from their homes, the barbarous act was expressly stated to have been done that Atlanta might be held as a base of future operations, a point d'appui, a permanent military possession of the United States—an excuse which, wholly insufficient at the time, becomes absolutely ridiculous now that we see Atlanta burned and abandoned, and the man who was to have held it marching off to establish himself elsewhere. Either Sherman did or did not intend to retain Atlanta. If he did, it is clear that his recent bold movement was not voluntary, but compulsory. If he did not, it was something worse than criminal to have exiled its citizens. From our last advices we cannot be quite sure how far he has pushed his way towards Macon or Augusta. Rumours of the destruction of Milledgeville and the capture of Macon were in circulation in Savannah, but on November 21 neither of these towns had fallen into his hands. No other intelligence than such as comes from Southern papers had been received from Sherman at New York since his departure from Atlanta, and President Lincoln will have another opportunity of indulging in his little joke of last spring, when he said that Grant, in crossing the Rapidan and seeking a new base on the Pamunkey and James Rivers, was like the fellow at the circus who climbed the pole and pulled the pole up after him. So far as Sherman had advanced, it would appear that his devastation of the country had been more than usually thorough and satisfactory to his Government and people; and even a London journal, in the interests of the Yankees, declares, with evident pleasure, that, 'assuming as true what is alleged of the burning of Jonesborough, Griffin, Stone Mountain, Hillsborough, Monticello, and Clinton, we can, with tolerable accuracy, trace Sherman's course by the light of his conflagrations.' It is not worth while to expend ink and sentiment, however, on the barbarity of the Yankee generals. The recital of their fiendish crimes has ceased to excite horror in ceasing to excite surprise, and the atrocities of Sherman in his march through Georgia are lost in the interest that is felt as to the dénouement. Among military men such a move as that of Sherman cannot fail of condemnation, though success, as we have said, may give it sanction. During the war in the Peninsula, in the autumn of 1808, Joseph submitted to Napoleon a projet of quitting the line of the Ebro, and collecting a force of 50,000 men, with which to move compactly across the country to Madrid. He was to carry his supplies with him and strike 'wherever he could find subsistence and an enemy,' and he remarked that, until the Grand Army had arrived at Burgos, his position in Spain would be precisely similar to Napoleon's in Egypt, that of a seventy-four at sea. The great master of the art of war answered his brother in some very curt but forcible observations. 'To change one's line of operations,' said he, 'is an operation which only a man of genius ought to attempt. To lose one's line of operations is an operation so dangerous that to be guilty of it is a crime. At this instant to rush into Spain without any organised centre of magazines, with hostile armies in one's flanks and in one's rear, would be an attempt without precedent in the history of the world. If, before Madrid were taken and depots of subsistence for eight or ten days and of ammunition were provided, this army were beaten, what would become of it? Where would it rally? Where would it send its wounded? Whence would it draw its supplies? For it is provided only for its current wants. Nothing more need be said. Those who dare to recommend such a step would be the first to lose their heads as soon as the results began to show its absurdity. According to the laws of war, every general who loses his line of communication deserves death.' Unquestionably Sherman cannot be commended by such as accept the maxims of Napoleon, and it is undeniable that his failure will be ruin, hopeless and irremediable. Not Leotard, when, before the breathless multitude of the amphitheatre, he releases his hold upon the handle of one flying cord to catch another, would be more sure of destruction should he fail to grasp it, than Sherman should he meet repulse before Augusta and Macon. A day's delay, the least accident, the slightest contretemps, anything 'not laid down in the bills,' will be fatal to him; and his ruin may, and probably will, be the utter breakdown of the Washington Government in the continuance of the war. On the other hand, should Sherman prove entirely successful, and thus put forward a claim to originality in war, the results, supposing they involved the loss of Georgia to the Confederacy, would be serious, but by no means conclusive of the contest. The Confederacy would yet live, and the military conquest of the South would have but commenced. In this temper we await the arrival of the next steamer from America, by which we shall doubtless be fully informed of the catastrophe.

THE inaction of the armies on the James was broken, on the night of the 17th ult., by an attack upon a portion of Butler's lines by a force of Confederates under General Pickett. The Federals were forced to fall back with the loss, according to General Lee's report, of one colonel, two captains, two lieutenants, and 113 men in prisoners. Next day the enemy made desperate but unsuccessful attempts to retake the lost position. With the exception of the above, the 'situation' is unchanged in Virginia. There are reports of the Confederates mining extensively in front of Petersburg, and of preparations by General Grant, who, it is said, has been reinforced by troops from Sheridan's army, for an early attack along the lines of Richmond and Petersburg, the fleet cooperating by a movement up the James. General Lee is also said to be receiving reinforcements from his lieutenant's army in the Valley, but a reconnaissance by Sheridan's cavalry, on the 22nd, found Early in strong position at Rood's Hill, where the reconnoitring force was met and repulsed. The weakening of Early is very likely mere gossip from Washington.

THE Confederate army of South-western Virginia has not only cleared that region of every hostile force, but is now carrying the war into the enemy's strongholds. Since his victory at Saltville, General Breckenridge has been steadily and victoriously driving the enemy, with the single exception of a surprise suffered by one of his brigade commanders some weeks ago. Of the fight at Bull's Gap on the 14th ult., General Breckenridge reports that his cavalry, under Generals Basil Duke and Vaughan, attacked the enemy under General Gillem, routed them, and captured several hundred prisoners, 10 stands of colours, 6 pieces of artillery, 50 loaded wagons, and a large number of small arms. Breckenridge pursued and again attacked the enemy at Strawberry Plains, eighteen miles from Knoxville, where it is said he added 850 prisoners and 150 wagons to his trophies of Bull's Gap. Gillem retreated within the fortifications of Knoxville under cover of night. Latest advices report General Breckenridge within six miles of Cumberland Gap on the 21st ult., when heavy skirmishing was going on.

New York advices of the 26th ult. state that General Hood was advancing from Wayneston upon Pulaski, from which the Federals had retired, falling back upon Columbia, where an engagement was expected. The retreat of the enemy is in the direction of Nashville, to which point he is likely to retire eventually, owing to the great strength of its fortifications. The above-mentioned places are, as the reader will doubtless understand, in Tennessee. General Beauregard was at Corinth on the 18th, and a rumour comes from the South that he was sending troops to Georgia vid Selma, Montgomery, Alabama, and Columbus, Georgia. The whole force under Beauregard's orders is estimated at 65,000 men.

WE publish in another column the joint resolutions introduced in the Upper House of the Confederate Congress, on Friday, November 18, by Mr. Henry, Senator from the State of Tennessee, and ordered to be printed. If anything were wanting to confirm the belief of Europe in the unalterable determination of the Southern people to win their national independence, it would be found in these lofty resolutions. They breathe the spirit of that indomitable will and energy which animates every class of the population of the Confederate States.

VICE-PRESIDENT STEPHENS has written a letter to the Hon. T. J. Semmes, Senator from Louisiana, which is published in the Richmond papers, in which he declares that he has never favoured the call of a Convention of the States to negotiate for peace, unless the proposal for such a convention should come from the Federal Government; that his views with regard to the alternative presented to the South of independence or subjugation have never undergone a change; and that he will stand by the State of Georgia to the end. We have never doubted the loyalty of Vice-President Stephens, but we think he must himself see at this time the impropriety of having written such a letter as his former one, which bore the very natural construction of placing him in antagonism with the Confederate Government, of which he is a part. Those who were fully acquainted with Mr. Stephens's sentiments were aware that his design was to play into the hands of the Northern Democrats, even at the risk of ambiguity of language. We hope we have had the last of these querulous and questionable letters from prominent Southern men. Sherman's recent move through Georgia was probably determined by the suggestion of Mr. Stephens's former letter that there was a peace party in the State; and the smoking desolation that has been left in the track of Sherman's army cannot be repaired by subsequent letters correcting misapprehensions of its meaning.

LIEUTENANT-GOVERNOR JACOBS, of Kentucky, has been arrested by the Federal authorities, and, without the form of a trial or the pretence of an accusation, has been banished from his home beyond the Confederate lines. This outrage is even more flagrant than the arrest and banishment of Mr. Vallandigham, to whom something like a trial was accorded; but then we must remember that in the meantime Mr. Lincoln has been reelected President of the United States, and given a power absolutely despotic. Lieutenant-Governor Jacobs, at the time of his seizure by the officers of Lincoln, was temporarily sojourning at Buffalo, in the State of New York, with his wife, all unconscious of danger, but suddenly a provost-guard invaded his lodgings, searched the private correspondence of both, and carried him off a prisoner to be sent across the frontier. A committee of gentlemen of Kentucky arrived in Washington on November 20, to remonstrate with the President concerning this arbitrary act, but failed to obtain any satisfaction with regard to it.

PRESIDENT LINCOLN has formally proclaimed that the ports of Norfolk (Virginia), Pensacola, and Fernandina (Florida), are open to the commerce of the world, the United States having been for so long a time in military possession of these points as to justify the raising of the blockade in their favour. When we consider that Norfolk, Pensacola, and Fernandina, cut off from the whole Southern country, have nothing whatever to export, and that the only merchandise to be carried thither must be supplies for the Yankee garrisons and the small resident populations, President Lincoln's proclamation seems to be of the smallest possible importance, and will not even have the effect of materially increasing the mercantile marine for the benefit of the Confederate cruisers, who are the terror of the seas to all Yankee shipowners.

St. Paul, Minnesota, Nov. 14, 1864.

'Captain Fisk has arrived here. He reports having killed a number of Indians with bullets, and one hundred men, women, and children with hard tack, saturated with strychnine.'

We are reluctant to give full credence to this telegram, and reproduce it only as what is printed for fact in the news columns of the papers of the United States, without any apparent suspicion that it would excite abhorrence in the mind of any reader. And yet it ought not to be rejected simply on account of its enormity. Sherman, Paine, Turchin, and many other Federal generals have already resorted to means of destruction as diabolical as strychnine, and it may yet be made an ally of the Yankees in their hostilities against the South, without disturbing to any great extent the moral sentiment of Europe.

THE Federal General Curtis publishes a despatch from the headquarters of the 'Army of the Border,' Camp, Arkansas, under date of November 8, in which, with characteristic Yankee effrontery, he congratulates the people of Missouri that 'we are now rid of 20,000 or 30,000 half-starved bushwhackers and half-starved vagabonds,' who have gone off with General Price in his retreat; but at the very same moment, it is at least significant that a telegram to the New York Herald complains that 'a gang under Dick Berryman' is making the Unionists of Missouri exceedingly uncomfortable, while 'the remnants of those lately commanded by Bill Anderson, who has been killed, are, under the lead of his brother, still prowling through North Missouri,' and 'in addition to all these horrors, there is a report current that another rebel army under Kirby Smith is about to invade the State from Arkansas.' So it would seem that the Unionists of Missouri, who constitute a very small minority of the inhabitants outside the corporate limits of the city of St. Louis, are not yet entirely at their ease in respect of the 'bushwhackers' and 'vagabonds.' As for the 'half-starved' condition of the latter, as represented by the gallant General Curtis, it will suffice to say that General Price carried with him from Missouri enormous trains laden with flour, grain, and provisions of every description, besides driving off cattle enough to subsist his army for years, and greatly recruiting that army with Missouri volunteers. The Administration newspapers of St. Louis bitterly reproached General Rosecrans for allowing General Price to roam through Missouri at his pleasure, and one journal tells us that there were no less than eight major-generals and fourteen brigadier-generals who were 'after' Price, but could never catch him, videlicet—Major-Generals Rosecrans, Pleasanton, Smith, M'Dowell, Curtis, Blunt, Lane, Deitzler; Brigadier-Generals Brown, Sanborn, Hall, M'Neil, Coleman, Pike, Miller, Fisk, Ewing, Craig, Douglass, Woolf, Sherry, Gage.

HON. EDWARD BATES has resigned his position in Lincoln's Cabinet as Attorney-General of the United States.

ON November 26 gold was quoted in New York at 222¼, the price on the previous day being 220¼.

ENGLAND.

THE Right Hon. George William Frederic Howard, K.G., seventh Earl of Carlisle, died on Monday last at Castle Howard. He was born on April 18, 1802. His mother was sister to the late Duke of Devonshire, and so the late Earl united the blood of Howard and Cavendish. He was educated at Eton and at Christ Church, Oxford, and obtained a first class in classics. He also won the Chancellor's prize for Latin and the Newdegate prize for English verse. He was present in the suite of his uncle, the late Duke of Devonshire, at the coronation of the Emperor Nicholas. In 1826 he was elected M.P. for Morpeth. In 1835 he was appointed Chief Secretary of Ireland under the Melbourne Administration. He lost his seat for the West Riding in the Peel Parliament, and did not return to public life till 1846. In 1848 he succeeded to the peerage. Subsequently he held the offices of Chief Commissioner of Woods and Forests and of Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster. In 1855 he was appointed Viceroy of Ireland by Lord Palmerston, and resigned that office only a few months since, being succeeded by Lord Wodehouse. Lord Carlisle is succeeded by his brother, the Hon. and Rev. William George Howard. The Earl of Carlisle was neither a great statesman nor a great orator. But he was an elegant and accomplished gentleman of the highest integrity, possessed not only of fair abilities, but also of a keen sense of his duty to his country and his fellow-creatures.

THE case of the Queen v. Rumble, in the matter of the Confederate ship Rappahannock, which had been removed by certiorari into the Queen's Bench, and which was an indictment against the defendant for a breach of the Foreign Enlistment Act, came on for trial before the Lord Chief Justice Cockburn and a special jury, at Westminster, on Monday last. The Solicitor-General, Mr. Lush, Q.C., Mr. Hannen, and Mr. Vernon Harcourt, appeared for the Crown; and Mr. Bovill, Q.C., Mr. Karslake, Q.C., Mr. Serjeant Ballantine, and Mr. Macnamara, appeared for the defendant. The Solicitor-General said that this was a prosecution against the defendant for enlisting men into the service of the Confederate States, and also procuring other persons to arm and equip, or aiding in and abetting the arming and equipping, a vessel with intent that the vessel should cruise and commit hostilities against a country at amity with the Queen. The view he should submit to the Court was that any sort of equipping, whether warlike or otherwise, would satisfy the statute provided the intent existed. The defendant had been Inspector of Machinery at Sheerness, in the employment of Her Majesty, and the Crown could not, therefore, neglect the duty of prosecuting him. Evidence was given by Captain Wise of the fact that the defendant was employed in the dockyards at the time of the sale of the Victor, and also as to the state of the Victor at that time. She was sold without masts, spars, or rigging, and her gun fittings had been removed. She had only her boilers and machinery. She was delivered up to the purchasers on the 10th or 11th of November, at which time she was lying in the Medway. She was docked by order of the Admiralty and the purchasers before the sale was completed. She sailed on the night of November 24. The defendant had nothing to do with the ship officially after she was sold. Messrs. Coleman, of 28 Clement's Lane, were the purchasers. All the work done upon the ship was done by Government officials. That was a common practice at the sale of a ship. Thomas Firth, who sailed away on board the ship, deposed that the defendant paid him his first week's wages, and promised him a guinea a week and provisions while the ship remained in the river. The defendant said that he did not know where the ship was going, but declared that if witness went out in her the witness would never have occasion to work again. The defendant was frequently on board the ship, and was so on the day the ship sailed. The witness made some amusing admissions as to one O'Kelly, who seemed to be much interested in the case against the defendant, and who appeared to be very liberal in his supplies of liquor to the men who had sailed on board the Victor. James Hurford deposed that the defendant had agreed to pay him and some other men a guinea a week during the stay at Sheerness. This witness also described the voyage to Calais, the hoisting of the Confederate flag, and the interview with Captain Campbell, who took the command at Calais. He said that the defendant was continually on board, paying great attention to the repairs. He also knew O'Kelly, and had drunk at that gentleman's expense. Charles Coles, a stoker, gave similar evidence; but, to the astonishment of the Court, declared that the Government steam-tug assisted the Victor in getting out of Sheerness Harbour. Charles Newman swore that, after the news had reached England of the Victor, or Scylla, arriving in Calais, and there hoisting the Confederate flag as the ship Rappahannock, he had had an interview with the defendant, on the introduction of a Mr. Greathead; that he then told the defendant that he (witness) had been in the Federal service, and knew the American coast; that defendant then said that he was going to London to see the Confederate agent, and would drop witness a line. It appeared that Mr. Greathead was away in Malta, and that the defendant's son was also abroad. The Lord Chief Justice thought that both these witnesses ought to appear, and finally adjourned the trial till February for that purpose.

MR. J. PEEL, M.P., made the following remarks at Tamworth last week with reference to the American war:—'It is very difficult for any person to witness the struggle going on in America, and which is costing the contending parties half a million of human lives a year, without looking upon it with the most intense sorrow, and, I may say, disgust. But, painful as it is to watch the struggle, I think it is quite clear that the Government of this country, and every individual in it, is bound to abstain from taking any part which can further the interests of either one party or the other. What we have to do is to patiently wait until something shall occur to change that feeling of animosity which seems to exist and increase between the North and the South. It is impossible, I think, that any one could abstain entirely from sympathising more or less with one party or the other, or forming some opinion with regard to the good or evil intentions of the Federal Government. For my own part, I certainly, in the beginning, did sympathise most strongly with the Federals, because I believed that one of the main objects of the war was the abolition of slavery; but I confess that that delusion has long since been dispelled, and that my sober belief now is that the object of the war is no longer to liberate the slaves, but to enslave the citizens of the United States.'

DURING this week the agriculturists of England are doing their best to be Londoners, and the citizens are striving with equal vigour to exhibit themselves in the character of British farmers. The depressed state of the corn market, combined with high rents, throws slight impediments in the way of the yeoman, and lack of agricultural knowledge precludes the cockneys from attaining the object of their desires. For though every Londoner may visit the great Hall at Islington, and press the loin of every sheep and pinch the rump of every bullock, yet not the less is his imposture at once apparent to the bucolic mind. Similarly, the farmer may smoke bad cigars in Regent Street and lounge in a new hat and new gloves in the Strand, and yet never deceive a single cabman or crossing-sweeper. Nevertheless, it is highly salutary that Londoners should once a year realise the indomitable perseverance and skill that is characteristic of the British farmer; and it is equally advisable that he whose mind has dwelt on turnips and fallows, pigs and beasts, ploughs and scarifiers, for twelve months, should catch a glimpse, however transitory, of the great and to him mysterious metropolis. The Smithfield Club Cattle Show has become an institution of considerable importance, and its usefulness and the excellence of its annual exhibitions have been enormously increased by the erection of the Islington Hall. The show this year is not only equal to its predecessors, but perhaps is the best yet seen, and it is possible that the high price of meat has stimulated the farmers to even mightier exertions than heretofore. It is impossible for us to do more than give some general features. The number of entries this year is 532, or 23 more than in 1863, and 113 more than in 1862. There are nine distinct breeds of cattle, and ten distinct breeds of sheep. The breeds of cattle are the Devons, Shorthorns, Herefords, Sussex, Norfolk Polled, Scotch Horned, Scotch Polled, Irish, and Welsh. The breeds of sheep are the Leicesters, Cotswolds, and Lincolns, of the long-woolled kinds; Southdowns, Hampshire Downs, Shropshire, of the short-woolled kinds; together with the Kentish, Dorsetshire, Cheviot, and Oxfordshire. The animals are divided into classes by age and sex. The best ox of all breeds and classes, to which the silver cup was awarded, was exhibited by Mr. Walesby Kirkham, of Biscathorpe House, South Lincolnshire; the animal was of the shorthorn breed. The total number of cattle exhibited is 274. In sheep Lord Berners won the first prize for the best wether not exceeding 220 pounds in weight, and the Duke of Richmond won the first prize in Southdowns. About 30,000 persons visited the Show yesterday.

BLAIR ATHOL, by Stockwell out of Blink Bonny, the winner of the Epsom Derby and the Doncaster St. Leger, has been sold by Mr. I'Anson to Mr. John Jackson, the well-known bookmaker, for the extraordinary sum of 7,500 guineas, the largest price ever yet given for any English racehorse.

INDIA.

Sir John Lawrence arrived at Calcutta on November 1 from the Punjaub. The Government of India has decided on charging the expenses of the Bhootan expedition to the province of Bengal. The force was to advance about the middle of the present month.

All the Western chiefs and khans have determined to punish the Ameer of Cabul for his treachery to Afzul Khan. They have given him a month's time in which to restore his brother. The Ameer has refused all reply to their deputations.

In the battle at Huzrat Sooltan between the Russians and Kokanees, the latter lost 4,000 killed and wounded and 2,000 prisoners. The Russians had captured twenty-one cities, and had fired eighteen of them. They were advancing on Tashkund and Kokan.

The telegraph is in working order between Bushire and Teheran. Ten days' work remains to be done between Bagdad and Teheran, and the wires cannot be joined till the boundary question has been settled. A system of sowars was being organised between Kasr Sheeren and Khanakin (twenty miles), and only four hours would be lost in transmission. St. Petersburg is, however, in telegraphic communication with Teheran.

THE CONTINENT.

FRANCE.

THE appeal of the Thirteen against the judgment declaring them guilty of forming an illegal association of more than twenty members was continued on the 30th ult. and the three following days. The master speech for the defence was made by M. Berryer, who was retained for M. Ferry. This distinguished advocate repudiated entirely every view of the question but the political, and established the fact that, however well veiled, the prosecution was actuated entirely by political motives. He first argued that neither the penal code of 1810 nor the law of 1834 forbade the temporary association of electoral committees, and next he challenged the prosecution to prove in this case the association of more than twenty persons. Then he explained the real motives of the prosecution. His client, M. Ferry, had been one of the authors of the 'Electoral Handbook;' that was, of course, a capital sin. But to this offence he had added yet another, by the publication of a book called 'The Electoral Struggle,' which brought to light all the abuses and frauds which had been perpetrated during the election. M. Berryer then pointed out that it was not until MM. Garnier-Pagès, Carnot, Jules Favre, and Havin, all members of the opposition, had been returned as deputies, that this prosecution broke out. He reminded the court that, forty years before, an inscription was to be read on the walls of the edifice in which he was speaking, which said that 'the court was the minister of justice, not the tool of a Government.' His peroration elicited a burst of applause from the audience, whereon the President ordered the hall to be cleared of all unprovided with seats. M. Dufaure then spoke in defence of M. Durier. He showed that electoral committees had been allowed under the Restoration, under Louis-Philippe, and under the Republic of 1848; he cited of the latter time two associations, one called the Electoral Union, the other the Napoleonian Committee. He maintained that there was a signal difference between a réunion such as that held in the house of M. Garnier-Pagès and an association such as is contemplated as illegal by the penal code. He pointed out that central committees were allowed to direct elections in England. The Procureur-Général, M. de Marnas, for the prosecution, said that he could not condescend to refute the childish argument that thirteen persons could not be prosecuted for a crime which required the participation of at least twenty-one persons. He urged that the coalition of men of the most opposite political parties was of so alarming a nature as to justify the Government in taking effectual measures to dissolve it. He saw no necessity for instructing the French people in their duties and privileges. They were quite intelligent enough to understand what was as clear as the sun at noon, that the Empire was glorious abroad and prosperous at home. M. Berryer replied to the Procureur-Général, and said that the coalition, of which the Government was so greatly afraid, aimed at no political object, but only at the emancipation of individual opinion. He himself had no sympathy with the republican opinions of the committee in whose defence he was engaged, but he was earnestly and individually interested in the preservation of the liberty of thought which that committee represented. He was proud of the independence of the French bar, and had maintained it through a long life; but he was now fearful that, if this prosecution were to be successful, that independence would be the next object of attack. The court was asked to make a new law under the pretence of giving a decree, a law declaring electoral committees illegal, in spite of the immunity which they had enjoyed in France during the last seventy years. The Government had not scrupled to use every possible means of affecting the elections in its own favour. He cited some of the most singular from M. Ferry's book on the Electoral Struggle. Government committees also had been formed. If counter-committees were declared illegal, the right of universal suffrage would be destroyed, and France, the apostle of liberty on the Continent, would be a laughing-stock to its neighbours. The prosecution were trying to force the court into a bad path, and to extort from it false interpretations of law; the law was to be tortured in order to torture men. Another reply from M. Dufaure, and a general summing up from the Procureur-Général on the one hand, and M. Jules Favre on the other, concluded the proceedings. The court deferred its judgment to Wednesday, the 7th instant. On that day the court affirmed the decision of the court below.

M. Mocquard, private secretary to the Emperor, is dangerously ill; he has been visited by the Emperor himself, who had a long interview with him. There is but little chance of his recovery. His loss will be greatly felt, as he was His Majesty's closest confidant.

The students of the quartier latin have greeted the foundation of a Chair of Political Economy in the University of Paris in a very uproarious fashion; M. Batbie, the Professor, on entering the hall to give his inaugural lecture, found it crammed with a tumultuous assembly, who saluted him with such a continuous chorus of applause that he was forced to give up his lecture. This at, least, is one account of the affair. Another story is that the students fancied that M. Duruy, the Minister of Instruction, was present, and took the opportunity of giving him a bit of their minds by shouting, 'Down with Duruy!' Then, to prove to the Professor that the demonstration was not directed against him, they conducted him home in a triumphal procession of some 700 or 800 in number. Another attempt of a like sort was made on the resumption of M. Batbie's lecture on the 2nd instant; but the juvenile enthusiasm of the students was most prosaically repressed by the apparition of the sergents-de-ville, who arrested some of the most riotous. M. Duruy himself seems to consider the uproar to have been made on his account; for an edict has appeared from his pen ordering that the political economy class shall be made a part of the third and fourth year studies, and that no freshmen shall be admitted to the lectures—a rap on the knuckles for the fervid youths. M. Duruy has lately sent in a report to the Emperor upon the university curriculum, and the draft of a decree for its reformation. It can scarcely be this which has excited the students against him, as it proposes to relieve them of a great burden. Up to the present time each student was supposed to bring to each successive examination a knowledge, not only of certain fresh subjects, but of all the details of every subject which he had before studied, so that the final examination cumulated, so to speak, the whole learning of his university career. The standard was also too high, and the candidates for honours were few. M. Duruy now orders the standard to be lowered, so that all youths who have received a proper education may, if they choose, take a bachelor's degree; a candidate may also demand to be examined in one modern language. The examination for a degree is for the future to be held in the third year studies only. A prizeman in litteris humanioribus or in sciences will not be required to pass a further examination for his degree in the subjects in which he has taken a prize, if he can pass a satisfactory examination in the other subjects required: thus a mathematical prizeman need only pass in classics, and a classical prizeman in mathematics. Our University readers will recognise in this the system which is followed out in a modified form in both our Universities.

ITALY.

The discussions in the Senate on the bill for the transfer of the capital continue. Signor Ricotti opposed the bill on the ground that the Government had better remain in Turin until the last battle for Venetia was fought out; he also expressed some suspicions that France coveted a portion of the Italian territory. General della Marmora replied that the possession of Venice was no advantage to Austria, and the retention of that country only the result of her vanity; he doubtless meant to imply that Austria would soon see her own interests more clearly, and would give up her useless province to the ardent desires of the Italian nation. He repudiated the suspicions of France expressed by Signor Ricotti in the strongest terms. The Duke Cesarini Sforza spoke against the bill, saying, 'If the bill annuls the former declaration of the House in favour of Rome, I reject it as an Italian and as a Roman; If it does not annul that declaration, it is useless and superfluous.' Signor Galvagno opposed the bill on the ground that the expenses of transfer would be 35,000,000 instead of 7,000,000 francs. He called upon Government to publish any fresh documents they might have on the subject of the Convention. The Premier declined to give any fresh papers, and reasserted that 7,000,000 francs would cover the whole cost of the transfer. Signor Massimo d'Azeglio was too ill to appear in the Senate, but sent his speech ready written out to be read to the assembly; he pointed out that the obstinacy of the Italians in demanding Rome for a capital was the chief difficulty in the way of a settlement of the question. The Catholic nations who objected to this demand would be satisfied to allow Rome to become a mere Italian city. The debate was still to continue, although objections and answers are now pretty well exhausted. It has ceased to excite even that feeble interest which was created during the debates in the Lower House while the amount of the Government majority was still unknown. A much more interesting question is raised by a bill brought forward by Signor Vacca, the Minister of Grace and Justice, for the suppression of religious corporations. He proposes to make such associations illegal, with the exception of a few to be authorised by Government. The property of the suppressed corporations is to be devoted to purposes of State, after the payment of a fixed allowance out of it to the ousted members of the fraternities. It is expected that a strong party in the House will insist upon the appropriation of this, which has up to the present time been considered sacred property, to charitable or educational purposes, so as to change as little as possible the original object for which it was given. An argument in favour of the total abolition of monasteries, instead of the restriction of their number, is found in the late history of Belgium, where, in spite of all the provisions of the civil code, the number of religious houses has risen since 1830 from 251 to 1,200, and the number of their members from 3,645 to nearly 18,000.

An official notification has been issued by General Vrismanic, military commandant in Venetia, abolishing martial law, in consequence of the dispersion of the armed bands in the district of Friuli. A court-martial will assemble at Udine for the trial of those inculpated in the movement.

We learn from Florence that the proposed transfer of the capital is producing its natural effect in a tremendous augmentation in the cost of all articles of living. House-rent is swelling up with great rapidity, and will soon, at the rate at which it is advancing, rival the sums paid in Paris. The Florentines have yet to learn that the Italian deputies are not all millionnaires, and that, after frightening away their regular foreign visitors by the exorbitance of their charges, they will scarcely repay themselves out of the pockets of their own countrymen.

A splendid discovery has lately been made in Rome of a gigantic statue of Hercules in gilt bronze, belonging to the best period of Roman art. Cavaliere Righetti, on whose estate it was disinterred, has presented it to the Pope, refusing an offer of 40,000*l.* made for it by an Italian nobleman, and a still higher bid on behalf of the French Government.

GERMANY.

This week has seen a new phase of the Slesvig-Holstein question. Notice was sent on the 29th ult. to the Courts of Hanover and Dresden to withdraw their troops of occupation from the Duchies. On the same day a communication was made by Austria and Prussia in common to an extraordinary meeting of the Federal Diet, informing that body of the treaty of peace concluded with Denmark. Divers resolutions were brought before the Diet by the representatives of Saxony and Bavaria with regard to the continuance of the Federal execution; but they were all virtually annulled by the succeeding events. Hanover replied to the Austro-Prussian communication by signifying her readiness to withdraw her troops from the Duchies. Saxony made no answer, but declared her willingness to follow the same course upon the order of the Diet. On the 5th inst. the Austrian and Prussian representatives in the Diet brought forward a motion to the effect that the Federal execution in the Duchies was now at an end. It was carried by 9 votes to 6, Saxony, Bavaria, Wurtemberg, Darmstadt, and the 12th and 13th Curiæ voting against it. Thus Prussia has at length got her own, or rather Herr von Bismarck has dragged her to the point at which he was aiming. The sudden change in the attitude of the minor Powers in Germany requires explanation. Herr von Beust, the Saxon statesman, the late representative of the Federal Diet at the Conference of London, was fortunate enough to meet in that Conference with an amount of deference and courtesy to which he was apparently unaccustomed. Presuming upon this, and imagining that it was due to the power and authority of the abstract body which he represented, he attempted to carry out in his own fatherland the peremptory conduct which had been elsewhere so successful. He bearded Prussia, and bandied words with Bismarck. He refused to obey the orders of his superior, and laughed the authority of the great North-German Power to scorn. But, alas! he was to learn the truth of the proverb, that a prophet is not without honour save in his own country. England and France had been courteous and respectful to the representative of the Federal Diet; Prussia simply ordered him to remove his troops out of the Duchies within five days, and hinted that Dresden was within easy march of the Prussian border. Hanover was frightened at the very mention of an ultimatum of this nature, and judiciously gave way; the other German States cowered in silence before the threat; thus poor Herr von Beust was left alone to get out of the scrape as best he could. His attempt to vindicate the authority of the Diet was creditable to himself; but it can only be regarded as a final proof of the inefficiency of an idea such as German unity to compete with the bayonets and needle-guns of an unscrupulous Power.

Who now takes an interest in the succession question? Who cares whether it is to be the House of Augustenburg, who exacted from the Crown of Denmark the price of the fee-simple of their contingent rights, in return for what they knew to be only a life interest in them, or the House of Oldenburg, whose real rights to the crown are about on a par with the Pope's, who once had a claim to the appointment of vacant thrones? These may be not exciting nor yet amusing questions. A new competitor, however, appears on the stage: languidus in cubitum jam se conviva reponit, when, with a due flourish of trumpets, the appearance of a dainty dish of the most sensational character is heralded. The new aspirant to the ducal throne is no other than the ingenuous and disinterested King of Prussia, the champion of German liberties. A pamphlet has been disinterred, written in the year 1846 by the German Dryasdust, so dear to Carlyle, in which the rights of the Prussian dynasty are carefully made out. King John I. of Denmark gave his daughter Elizabeth in marriage to the Elector of Brandenburg in 1502, and executed various deeds, with the consent of the Emperor Maximilian, in favour of the House of Brandenburg; in conformity with these deeds, the succession passed into that house in 1559; but by some mistake the preference was given to the younger or Oldenburg branch of the family, instead of to the principal stock. That stock, however, which has since become the reigning family of Prussia, still retains its rights, and is now prepared to maintain them. This conduct might be deemed inconsistent, considering the contemptuous manner in which national treaties of somewhat more importance than family compacts, and of rather more recent date than 1502, have been set aside. But the official papers in Prussia are not the less zealous in quoting the pamphlet so opportunely found, and adopting its conclusions as their own. The Prince of Hohenzollern, of the royal family of Prussia, is now at Vienna on a private visit to the Emperor. Nothing has transpired as yet as to the real object of his visit. It is to be observed that in spite of the general enthusiasm of the Slesvigers as reported in German organs, and in spite of an express prohibition of the Civil Commissioners, a deputation from that country has gone to Kolding to meet the King of Denmark in his progress through Jutland, and assert their Danish nationality.

The debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne has been going on in the Lower House of the Austrian Reichsrath during the past week. The first point which attracted attention was the situation of affairs in Hungary; Herr von Schmerling stated that the Government were desirous to reconcile Hungary, and expected great assistance from the moderation now prevailing in that country. He hoped to be able to convene the Hungarian Diet at an early period, but declined to bind himself to a day for its meeting. With regard to the foreign relations of Austria, Count Mensdorff-Pouilly said that Austria had avoided a great war which once seemed almost inevitable. Her task now was, first, to maintain her own rights, and secondly, to keep up, if possible, the Prussian alliance. No one could demand that Austria should adopt the initiative in bringing about a better understanding with Italy, by whom the mere existence of Austria was regarded as an aggression. Austria was willing to preserve peace, but at the same time was determined to resist her enemies, and she reckoned on the entire support both of the House and of the population. This speech was received with loud applause. In another speech, with regard to the Danish difficulty he said that there were documents which would prove to the world some day that it was not out of mere 'curiosity' that Austria had taken part in the war against Denmark. On the subject of the state of siege in Galicia the Government met with a defeat. A paragraph was proposed for the address, stating that the House expected from the Government a statement demanded by the Constitution of the causes and results of the state of siege in Galicia, and was adopted, in spite of a full statement from the Minister of Police on the subject, and a declaration that it was impossible at the present moment to raise the state of siege. The Ministry also denied the constitutional right claimed by the House to take cognisance of these matters. The question of financial reform was mentioned, and the Minister of Finance said that the measures he was about to introduce would prove the earnestness of the Government on this subject. The Czech members, who have as yet refused to appear in the House, sent in, on the 5th instant, a declaration that they resigned the post to which their constituents had elevated them. This is of course vexatious for the Government, whose liberality of temper and undoubted efforts in favour of constitutionalism might be an example to other countries, and deserve all support from their own; but it is an improvement upon the refusal to recognise the validity of the elections, which has so often been the ground of abstention of members from the Reichsrath.

SWITZERLAND.

It is believed, perhaps we ought rather to say it is hoped, that the end of the Demme and Trümpy tragedy has at last taken place. According to the last account the bodies of Dr. Demme and Mdlle. Flora Trümpy were found on the 30th ult. in an hotel at Nervi, about twelve miles east of Genoa. From a letter addressed by Dr. Demme to his father, it appears that the pair, after originally intending to drown themselves in the Lake of Geneva, had altered their minds in favour of the waters of the Mediterranean at Genoa; then a final change of determination had led them to take poison. The only remaining question for the police to discover is whether they died at the same time, or whether there is the possibility of murder having been committed as well as suicide. It has been established that the diamond ring given by Dr. Demme to Mdlle. Trümpy was one which had been lost by M. de Bragha some years ago, while he was under the medical treatment of Dr. Demme.

RUSSIA.

The Russian journals are loud in the praises of Lord Napier, the late English Ambassador, for the masterly way in which he kept his country from joining with France in a war against Russia on the Polish question. Sir Andrew Buchanan, his successor, has a difficult task before him in succeeding so great a reputation. There are rumours of a change in the Russian Ministry. M. de Reutern, the Minister of Finance, is unpopular, in consequence of the low rate of exchange, and the great rise in prices which has lately occurred. He points for his defence to the reply lately given to the same sort of complaints by the Minister of Commerce, who said that the fault lay entirely with the Russian aristocracy, who spent their whole fortunes abroad. It appears that there are now 200,000 Russian families abroad, whose annual expenditure cannot be less than 70,000,000*l.*! Another Minister who has fallen into disfavour is M. Golowaine, the Minister of Public Instruction, who has been engaged in undignified disputes with the University of Moscow and the editor of a journal in that city. No change, however, is expected to take place before the spring. A report is current that a loan of 100,000,000 (whether of francs or of roubles is not certain) will shortly be put out. It will be raised on the lottery system, and the money will be applied to the construction of railroads. European science has suffered a great loss by the death of the celebrated astronomer Dr. Struve, Director of the Observatory of Poulkowa, who died at St. Petersburg on the 11th ultimo.

GREECE.

The King took the oath to the new Constitution on the 28th ultimo, and the Assembly, having terminated its labours, has been dissolved. General enthusiasm prevails in the capital. A horrible story is told of the atrocities committed by a band of Albanian ruffians in the Turkish province of Thessaly. The band is sixty in number, with four or five chiefs. They attacked a village in the district of Pharsalia, burned three persons alive, murdered seven women with brutal violence, and mortally wounded others. The Turkish authorities are unable to give any help.

SPAIN.

The result of the elections in this country is very favourable to Government, giving to it a majority of 265 out of 349. This is not bad for a beginning; but it is noticed that in Spain government majorities have a bad way of dwindling down in a session, so that the Administration sometimes begins a campaign with everything in its favour, and finishes it barely on equal terms with the opposition. Reports are prevalent of an approaching change in the ministry. The Minister of the Interior has published a circular to the governors of provinces, explaining to them that during the elections he had determined to allow the journals the fullest freedom of speech, so that there should be no opportunity for suspecting the good faith of the Government. Now, however, everything must return to its normal and legal condition. They must now defend the principles of the Constitution, and protect the character of those in whom power has been vested by the vote of the people from the calumnies in which a defeated party is so prone to indulge. Spain is at last really anxious to reestablish her credit in Europe, and to be admitted to the markets from which she was so ignominiously expelled in 1853. A calculation has been made from which it appears that a sum of 2,000,000*l.* will satisfy all creditors. This sum is to be raised by loan, three responsible parties acting as assignees, so to speak, for the creditors, of whom Señor Salamanca will represent Spain, while an English and a French credit company will represent their respective countries.

MEXICO.

The Emperor has continued his progress through the country with the greatest success. He last visited Valladolid, the capital of Michoacan, a city which, according to all accounts, rivals most European cities in the regularity of its construction and the splendour of its public buildings. Señor Vidaurri has been favoured with an audience. This gentleman is of great influence in his country, and was chiefly instrumental in bringing over the province of Nueva Leon, over which he presides, to the side of the Imperialists. A Mexican bank is to be created. The chief capitalists have met to discuss the question, and between 5,000,000 and 6,000,000 francs were subscribed at the meeting.

SOUTH AMERICA.

By advices from Venezuela, we learn that General Antonio Guzman Blanco arrived in that country on the 3rd ultimo, and took upon himself the charge of the executive power as first constitutional nominee to the Presidency of the Republic. He formed a new cabinet on liberal principles, but with a regard to all legitimate rights. His first public act was embodied in a resolution, published by the Minister of Finance, of the highest importance to the holders of Venezuela bonds. It confirms to them all the guarantees which have already been given upon 55 per cent. of the import duties, the confirmation extending to the guarantee of all sums belonging to that 55 per cent. which were expended by the late Administration.

AFRICA.

Theodorus, King of Abyssinia, has taken prisoners Captain Cameron and some other Englishmen visiting his country for missionary purposes; he keeps them in strict confinement in a tent close to his own, chained to his most trustworthy guards. Attempts are being made to rescue them, but as yet unsuccessfully.

JAPAN.

The terms of the treaty forced out of Prince Nagato by Admiral Kuper have not been fulfilled so exactly as the severity of the lesson given to him would have led us to expect. According to the latest telegraphs he has refused to pay the indemnity agreed on. A strong feeling, however, prevails against him among his dependants, and his palace has been burnt to the ground.

PROFESSOR SMITH AND B. F. BUTLER.—No English gentleman—no man fit to be received at any English table however humble—no one not utterly lost to manhood and to honour—would interchange a word with the 'infamous' General Butler. The American papers know this; and yet they tell us that Professor Goldwin Smith is General Butler's guest. This is too bad: because it charges on the professor a degree of vileness, baseness, and want of manly feeling which would exclude him from the house of every self-respecting Englishman and doom him to the life of a social pariah. The hand that had touched that of General Butler could never be permitted to pollute by its clasp the hand of a gentleman. The guest of the coward who makes war on women and children can never be the guest of an English lady. The man so lost to honour and manhood that he could sit at the same board with the scoundrel who directed his troops to treat the ladies of New Orleans as women of the town could never be allowed to associate with Englishmen or to speak to Englishwomen. His presence in the most general gathering would be an insult to the whole party. —Standard.

BREECH-LOADING RIFLES.

To the Editor of THE INDEX.

SIR,—I desire to bring before your readers certain considerations with reference to the use of breech-loading rifles. The two great objections which it appears are made by officers who have seen service against arming troops with breech-loading rifles, are, first, that they would waste their ammunition, and might therefore be left with empty pouches at the critical point of an engagement; and, second, that, admitting the waste with the one description of arm to be not greater than with the other, yet the normal average expenditure of ammunition by each soldier would be so great as to preclude the possibility of the men carrying enough rounds for their daily use, and of the army transporting enough reserve ammunition without seriously interfering with its mobility. Considering the great success of the Prussian breech-loader in the hands of notoriously very young troops, it seems worth while to examine the value of these objections. With regard to the question of waste, it may be fairly assumed that, unless the men commence firing with breech-loaders at longer ranges than they would do if armed with muzzle-loaders, the average loss to the enemy per shot will be not less with the former than the latter; for it cannot, I think, be argued that either the fatigue consequent on the exertion of rapid loading with ramrods, or the length of time required for loading, can have the effect of making the soldier steady and deliberate in his aim. Now, practically, when two bodies of men become engaged, they go on firing at each other till one of them suffers such a loss as induces it to retire. If, then, the average damage per shot caused by the breech-loader is not less than that caused by the muzzle-loader, and the former can fire three shots to one of the latter (and this is a low estimate), it seems that the breech-loader, upon the above moderate statement of its powers, would win an engagement in one-third of the time required by the muzzle-loader for the same purpose, the number of shots required to be fired being in both cases the same.

But, it is argued, men when engaged become excited; when fire is once opened their only idea is to fire as rapidly as possible; they would begin this rapid fire while the enemy were still too distant to feel its effects, and thus empty their pouches without hurting a man, whereas their sheer inability to fire quickly if armed with muzzle-loaders would prevent such a catastrophe. Great weight must of course be attached to arguments of this kind when they are urged, as they generally are, by men who have been in action. But I believe it to be the case, that steady troops, when well in hand, do not open fire before orders are given to do so. Our English troops have over and over again been marched up to a position with sloped arms, and I cannot believe but that officers could easily check any tendency to wild firing at long ranges—especially as it would be found, unless all experience in analogous cases is to go for nothing, that the confidence generated in the men's minds when used to their weapon would be so great as to enable them calmly to withhold their fire for a much longer time than they otherwise would do, because they would feel certain that, however near the enemy came, he could most certainly be destroyed in a short time.

But again it is urged, admitting that the waste would not be greater with breech-loaders, still the soldier would actually fire away more ammunition than he would do with a muzzle-loader, and as he cannot carry more than sixty rounds, his efficiency would be diminished. In answer to this, in the first place the soldier can, if necessary, carry eighty rounds—the Prussian does so. In the second place, granting that the sixty rounds would be fired away in less time, they would do the same execution as before, and the efficiency of the soldier would not be diminished, but would, so to speak, be condensed into a smaller space of time.

The fallacy which runs through the opposite assumption seems to arise from not considering that after all—putting bayonet charges out of the question as too apocryphal to be relied on—it is, within certain limits, the number of effective bullets fired which wins the action, not the number of men on the ground. A number of bullets sufficient to turn the enemy must be fired, and if 1,000 men with breech-loaders can perform the work in two hours which it takes 1,500 men with muzzle-loaders three hours to accomplish, there is clearly a great saving effected both in 'time' and 'power.'

These considerations are also applicable to the third objection, as to an army being unable to find transport for sufficient reserves of ammunition without seriously interfering with its mobility. Enough ammunition must be carried to destroy a certain proportion of the enemy. It is true, that will bear a larger proportion to the number of men than it would do if they carried muzzle-loaders, but the effect will be that, given a fixed quantity of bullets, the number of men required to use them with effect will be greatly diminished.

No doubt, where breech-loaders are adopted as the arm of the service, some slight alterations might with advantage be introduced into the detail for serving out spare ammunition, and possibly a change of tactics from double line to single line formation would in some cases be expedient, and in many more might with safety be adopted.

A VOLUNTEER.

GRANT AS A PROPHET.—The following paragraph, taken from the New York New Summary, has been printed in the Daily News in conspicuous type:—'General Grant has paid a flying visit to New York. He is reported to have said in the course of conversation: "The Southern Confederacy is a mere shell; I know it; I am sure of it. It is a hollow shell, and Sherman will prove it to you." In answer to a question whether ninety days would bring the end, he said, "I am not a ninety-day man, but we shall see what will happen inside of a month."' We know and we are sure that Grant has been fighting on many lines all the summer and all the autumn, but he is not yet in Richmond. We do not know and we are not sure that Grant will be more successful as a prophet than he has been as a warrior. We shall know and be sure 'inside of a month.'

LETTER FROM WASHINGTON.

WASHINGTON: November 25, 1864.

GENERAL SHERMAN'S expedition from Atlanta engrosses just now the largest share of public attention. Its progress can be traced for a considerable distance; but as yet no very important results, beyond a long march into the interior of Georgia, have been reported. When Sherman prepared, on November 8, for his march, he found that he had four army corps at Atlanta, and various points along the railroad which runs to Chattanooga, as far back as Kingston. He concentrated the fifteenth and seventeenth corps at Kingston, which is about sixty miles north of Atlanta. Part of this force held the town of Rome, which is twenty miles west of Kingston. The fourteenth and twentieth corps were in Atlanta. Sherman, on November 9, issued from Kingston a general order dividing his army into two columns, and placing General Howard in command of the two corps at Kingston, and General Slocum in command of the two at Atlanta. In this order Sherman gave various directions for the expedition. A day's march was to be fifteen miles. The columns were to 'forage liberally' on the country through which they passed, and efficient foraging parties were to be organised by each corps commander, who were to levy on all sorts of eatables found anywhere on the line of march. In neighbourhoods where the progress of the army was unmolested, there was to be no destruction of dwelling-houses or mills; 'but should guerillas or bushwhackers molest our march, or should the inhabitants burn bridges, obstruct roads, or otherwise manifest local hostility, then army corps commanders should order and enforce a devastation more or less relentless according to the measure of such hostility.' Horses, mules, and wagons belonging to the inhabitants were to be seized without stint. Under these general orders the troops prepared for the expedition.

The first necessity of the movement was the evacuation of Rome. The Federal troops occupying it were marched eastward to Kingston. Orders were given to dismantle the town. The military barracks and storehouses were set on fire, and the flames soon spread to the dwelling-houses. Before the troops left, the town was burned to ashes. Not an effort was made to save any part of it, and over $1,000,000 worth of property, much of it Government stores, was destroyed. On November 11, Rome was evacuated, and on the 12th, the troops which had formed its garrison arrived at Kingston. Between Kingston and Atlanta the railroad was in good order. But notwithstanding every precaution, the guerillas managed to destroy one half of the trains that passed over it. On November 10, Sherman gave orders for the destruction of the railroad. This required five days. The rails and ties were taken up and carried to Kingston, and thence shipped northward to Chattanooga. As soon as the road was entirely destroyed, Sherman was ready to begin his expedition.

His plan was briefly this. The two corps at Atlanta were to march south to Macon, a distance of 101 miles; capture it and the town of Milledgeville, the capital of Georgia, which is situated a short distance north-east of Macon; and then, turning north-east, the expedition was to march rapidly across the State of Georgia, to Augusta, which stands on the Savannah river. The two corps at Kingston were to march directly east to Augusta. On November 15, Slocum began his march. His column moved on two parallel roads. Very little opposition was made to it, the Confederates under Iverson being apparently in weak force. On November 17, Slocum reached Jonesboro', thirty miles south of Atlanta. Several skirmishes were fought between Atlanta and Jonesboro', but they appear to have done very little towards checking Slocum's progress. On the 18th, Slocum reached Griffin, forty-three miles south of Atlanta. On the 19th, there were vague rumours of his being thirty miles north of Macon, and, on the 20th, his cavalry were reported within twenty miles of Macon. They appeared to be moving between Macon and Milledgeville, and the telegraph wires connecting these cities had been cut. Slocum, as he advanced, destroyed the railroad which runs from Atlanta to Macon. The announcement of Slocum's advance being about eighteen miles north of Macon on the 20th, five days ago, is our latest intelligence. It all comes to us through Southern channels. We have no Northern intelligence of Slocum's progress. Macon is defended by a militia force under Howell, Cobb, and Gustavus W. Smith, and there are indications that a sharp contest will be fought before the town is captured.

Sherman, at last accounts, was still at Kingston, Georgia, with the two corps commanded by Howard. It was his intention to start eastward towards Augusta as soon as couriers informed him that Slocum had marched far enough towards Macon. There was no Federal force south of Kingston. Atlanta and all the intermediate country was evacuated. Atlanta was burned; the fortifications dismantled; the people gone. It is now a desert south of Atlanta. As Slocum marched, he closed up his rear, abandoning the ground as he passed over it. He moved forward with an isolated column over a deserted country. When Sherman hears sufficient news of Slocum's progress, Kingston will be abandoned, and no doubt as barbarously destroyed as every other town in that section has been. The Federal troops there will begin a long march eastward, over an almost unknown country, to Augusta. Slocum will start from Macon for Augusta, destroying railroads as he advances. There will then be no garrisoned Federal post south of Chattanooga, and these two moving bodies of Federal troops will, for the moment, be lost, though the broad track of destruction they will leave behind them can easily be followed.

The important enquiry now is, What has become of Hood and Beauregard? The Northern newswriters know very little about them, and the Southern ones wisely refrain from printing the slightest word which will give any clue to their movements. On November 10, the Federal troops who were engaged in destroying Rome, announced that a large force of Confederates had appeared on the Coosa River, west of Rome. This, no doubt, was Hood's advance. The evacuation of Rome the next day prevented any further information. The Federal troops under Thomas, that were left by Sherman to protect Tennessee, are now at Pulaski, with outposts as far south as Athens and Decatur, in Northern Alabama. These outposts report a force of Confederates west of them at Florence and Tuscumbia. These troops are supposed to be Hood's men, but most probably are Forrest's, and, as is usual with him, he threatens a raid on Pulaski. Indeed, all along the Tennessee river south of Johnsonville he shows a most formidable array of pickets, and on the other side, he frightens the Memphis people out of their wits. It will, no doubt, be found that Hood is well on his way after Slocum. We scarcely have had time yet to hear any account of him. Such is the intelligence we have to-day of the great mystery which is puzzling every one's mind hereabout. Sherman's army, it must be remembered, is not large; he has not 50,000 men.

You have already heard of the defeat of General Gillem by General Breckenridge in East Tennessee. The letters of correspondents, giving accounts of it in detail, are just being received. The defeat was complete; the Federal officers acknowledge it. Just west of Bull's Gap, Breckenridge fell upon Gillem, under cover of night, and broke his command all to pieces. At once a stampede began which beggars description. Cavalrymen and foot-soldiers mingled with wagons and cattle in a panic-stricken flight towards Knoxville. Not a man stood up to face the pursuing Confederates. Without order or thought, all rushed towards Knoxville, and they did not halt until they got inside the defences of the town. Then it appeared that only the soldiers with two or three wagons had been saved. All the artillery was lost. Seven hundred head of cattle, fifty wagons, and thousands of small arms had been seized by the Confederates. They also captured 850 Federal prisoners. Their cavalry came up to within four miles of Knoxville, and halted there. Breckenridge then collected his command at Strawberry Plains, eighteen miles east of Knoxville, and at once began a march northward towards Cumberland Gap. This celebrated mountain pass is fifty miles north of Strawberry Plains, and stands on the boundary line between Kentucky and Tennessee. When last heard from, Breckenridge was about ten miles south of it. The Gap was held by a small Federal garrison, and Burbridge, having gathered all the Federal troops that could be spared from the various posts in Kentucky, was making forced marches to reinforce it. If Burbridge gets there before Breckenridge, the latter will not be able to capture it, as the place is naturally so strong that it can easily be defended. So far as Gillem is concerned, Breckenridge can do as he pleases; for the demoralised Federal army at Knoxville can do nothing until reinforced.

Comparative quietness reigns in the Shenandoah Valley. Sheridan has sent a great part of his force to reinforce Grant, and therefore can do very little, even if he wishes to. His headquarters are at Winchester, and the troops he has—supposed to be about 15,000 in all—are in that neighbourhood. He has recently sent one or two reconnaissances southward, which found the Confederate pickets on the south side of Cedar Creek. Early is said to be at Newmarket, in the lower end of the Valley. There is no probability of a conflict there. Both armies seem to be preparing their winter quarters, and Early, to offset Sheridan's reinforcement of Grant, has no doubt sent some troops to Lee. On November 19, a party of Confederate cavalrymen, with Moseby at their head, appeared on the road between Martinsburg and Winchester, in Sheridan's rear. They made great havoc among the supply trains, and a force of sixty-two Federal cavalrymen was sent out to drive them away. Moseby laid an ambush. The cavalry fell into the trap. Twenty-two were killed, eight were wounded, and the remaining thirty-two were taken prisoners. Two or three of the prisoners afterwards escaped and reported the affair. The guerillas in that section seem to do as they please. They recently sent an expedition across the Potomac, which came down very near to Washington, and, perfectly loaded down with booty, recrossed into Virginia, at Edward's Ferry. Nothing can stop these incursions.

There is no announcement yet of the beginning of Grant's attack upon Richmond. Being intended to coincide with some part of Sherman's movement, or perhaps being only a menace to keep Lee from sending any force to oppose Sherman, the time for it was very probably not yet come. Grant is receiving large reinforcements. He is concentrating the major part of his army on the north side of the James, near the Dutch Gap Canal. All the ironclads are now in the James below the canal, and we have rumours of its completion. The recent rains made the roads near Petersburg unfit for a movement, but the cold spell which set in two days ago has no doubt dried them. Grant paid a visit north last week, but is now back at his camp. The attack when made will no doubt be principally on the north bank.

General Banks is urged to go back to his old place at New Orleans. He has been tendered the command, and now has the proposal under consideration. No one knows, and very few care, about the condition of General Canby. West of the Mississippi nothing is doing. It is believed that a new call for a draft is imminent.

Just as I close, a report reaches us that the Richmond newspapers of Wednesday, November 23, contain an announcement that General Slocum's column has captured Macon and Milledgeville, and has burned them. The date is not given. This is what every one expected, and causes no astonishment. When the details are published it will no doubt appear that the Confederates made considerable resistance before they allowed Macon to be captured.

From the army at Petersburg it is stated that a portion of Early's command from the Valley has already appeared in front of the Federal troops on the north side of the James. A division of Sheridan's army has already reinforced Grant. The Confederates, three days ago, by a brisk manœuvre cut out and captured forty-two head of cattle from Grant's camp.

REAL HUMANITY.—Reports have been circulated through Northern papers that the Confederate Government was negotiating with the United States authorities for an exchange of cotton for blankets for the Confederate army. The truth of the matter is that Colonel Ould, our Commissioner of Exchange, authorised by the Confederate Government, made a proposition to General Grant, on the 11th instant, to send one thousand bales of cotton to New York City, provided the proceeds of their sale be appropriated to the supply of Confederate prisoners with comforts and necessaries, the sale of the cotton and the purchase of supplies to be made by Major-General Trimble, now a prisoner in Fort Warren; or, as his alternate, Brigadier-General William R. Beale, also a prisoner, who shall be paroled and allowed every facility to make an advantageous sale and outlay; the distribution to be made by a commission of Confederate officers, who are prisoners, and who are to be paroled for the purpose; the transportation to be afforded by the United States Government free, from the places of purchase to the places of distribution. General Grant replied on the 12th, and acceded to the proposition unhesitatingly. The cotton will be shipped at Mobile within the next ten days.'—Richmond Enquirer.

RETALIATION.—Colonel Mosby has addressed a letter to General Sheridan, informing him that, in retaliation for the hanging by the Federals in the streets of Front Royal of seven of his men, he, on the 6th inst., executed seven of Sheridan's soldiers, and that a system of strict retalination should be carried out hereafter. Mosby claims to have captured 700 of Sheridan's men during the present campaign, and states that hereafter all prisoners will be treated with kindness until some new act of Federal barbarity compels him to again retaliate.

LETTER FROM NEW YORK.

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

NEW YORK: November 22, 1864.

THE campaign of 1864, instead of being closed, as it was commonly thought a few weeks since to be, is assuming an aspect of extraordinary activity. Operations are suspended in the Valley of Virginia; nothing is looked for in that quarter but for the opposing forces to watch each other. A part of Sheridan's forces has been sent to Grant, which betokens another and not remote effort to take Richmond—dependent, perhaps, on the completion of the Dutch Gap Canal, through which the navy can be brought to bear its part in the attack. What is to be done before Petersburg and Richmond must be done quickly. Winter weather will soon put a stop to the movements of troops. If the rains of the last week here have extended into Virginia, the armies must be floundering in mud by this time, and the roads nearly impassable.

All eyes are turned to the movements in Middle and Northern Georgia. Sherman has commenced the daring movement which has been mysteriously threatened so long, and, with an army of more than 50,000 men, has cut himself off entirely from his former base, and, laying the country waste and destroying the roads and bridges in his rear, has marched forward, as the accounts agree in stating, towards Macon, 103 miles southeasterly from Atlanta. Macon is the converging point of several important railroads, of which the most direct is that to Savannah, distance 190 miles south-east, and is connected with Augusta on the Savannah River. There is a direct road also from Atlanta to Augusta, 171 miles. From Augusta to Charleston is 137 miles. Any further advance after reaching Macon is yet a subject of conjecture. Augusta, with its vast storehouses of cotton and manufactories of gunpowder and machinery, is thought to be the immediate object; after which Savannah or Charleston, to open a water base for supplies. It is all conjecture, but the Northern imagination is wild with the idea that this is to be the last breaking of the 'backbone' of the rebellion, the crushing operation which is to grind it into powder.

There is no regular force of Confederates to any considerable amount in the way of this advance. Both Macon and Augusta are said to be well fortified, and able to hold out against siege or assault until they can be reinforced. The Georgia troops are hanging on Sherman's rear and flanks, harassing and delaying him as much as possible, and there is a universal cry to arms throughout the State. The subject of supplies is a vital part of the question. Sherman is reported to have accumulated a very large stock to take with him, and has issued orders for foraging on the country as he goes forward. He contemplates, as the newspaper correspondents from his army write home, living on the country—that is, seizing, for the support of his army, all the stock and food within reach of his raiding party, for which purpose he has provided a large force of cavalry. They who have read the accounts sent forward by his soldiers of the universal plunder which was practised on his route to Atlanta and during his stay there, by which the inhabitants for many miles were stripped of everything their houses and farms contained, down to the last cow or chicken, and left to starve, sometimes with no better shelter than the woods, may form some idea of the fate designed for the men, women, and children of Georgia by this gigantic raid. Sherman sets out on a plan that openly contemplates a system of universal plunder, such as the same general entered upon with as loud a flourish of trumpets when he started on that famous raid from Vicksburg, and harried and plundered his way through the State of Mississippi to Meridian, in 1863. He was then glad to make his way back along the same track he had desolated: he may find even a worse fate in his attempts to reenact the same career of rapine on a wider field. He has a long road before him, in the midst of a hostile population, and the road behind him is closed. If not a complete and quick success, his effort will be the most disastrous movement of the war. It is called, now, brilliant audacity. It may be in the power of the Confederates to stamp it in the annals of the war as foolhardiness or desperation.

Success is a rare paint with which to cover crimes, but no success can redeem the character of Sherman, or his Government, from the stain of carrying on the war in Georgia with a rapacity, cruelty, and barbarity to which there is no parallel in the history of modern times, except what is made by the exploits of other Union generals on smaller fields elsewhere.

What Sherman does not order his troops do spontaneously. The love of havoc, the instinct for destruction, pervades the whole mass. It is sickening to read, even in Northern papers, which are chary of giving publicity to anything which discloses the horrors of the Northern invasion, the details of the brutality which the most innocent noncombatants suffer from the hands of thieving soldiers, who commit the grossest personal outrages without check or punishment, destroy or break up the household articles they cannot carry off, and load themselves with stolen trinkets and jewellery and clothing of women and children. There was no order given by General Sherman to burn the town of Rome when it was evacuated. The soldiers took that duty upon themselves, and gave it to the flames in indulgence, as their apologists say, of a feeling of revenge for something said to have been done there a year and a half ago under the orders of General Corse. The destruction was commenced by the firing of public buildings, barracks, and Federal property, in the course of which '1,000 bales of cotton, two flour mills, two tanneries, one salt mill, an extensive foundry, several machine shops, together with railroad depots and storehouses, four pontoon bridges,' and other bridge property and material, were destroyed. This was a sufficiently terrible story of devastation. The soldiers then took it up on their private account. What they did is thus briefly described in a letter from the scene:—'Recollecting the outrages perpetrated upon Colonel Streight by the "Romans," our troops, as soon as they learned that the town was to be abandoned and a portion of it burned, resolved to lay Rome in ashes in revenge. The roaring of the flames as they leaped from window to window, their savage tongues of fire darting high up into the heavens, and then licking the sides of the buildings, presented an awful but grand spectacle, while the mounted patrol and the infantrymen glided along through the brilliant light like the ghostly spectres of horrid war.'

This is the prospect before the people of Georgia from the advance of Sherman's army. Can you imagine a prospect more likely to consolidate the whole people into one mass of wrathful and determined men, who have not only rights to maintain and homes to defend against merciless invasion, but a burning sense of indescribable wrongs to revenge?

There is no sign of flagging in the determination of the people or State authorities of Georgia. There has been, out of the State, a good deal of speculation on the supposed peace tendencies of prominent Georgians, based on the favour with which, before the late Presidential election here, some projects were entertained there which looked for accomplishment to the hope of the success of a Northern party who would be willing to submit the whole subject of war and reunion to a convention of States negotiating together as separate sovereignties—always a fanciful hope, which the developments of Northern opinion have now utterly dissipated. The week before Sherman set out on this huge raid, and while the signs of preparation were thickening about them, the Senate of Georgia took up the subject in a series of resolutions, reaffirming those passed last year, in favour of a vigorous prosecution of the war until the independence of the Confederacy is established.

The resolutions were carried by a unanimous vote. A substitute, which vaguely contained the idea of a negotiation by sovereignties, was offered, urging the Confederate Government to make an official tender of peace to the United States, 'on the basis of the great principles of our common fathers in 1776'—which was before the adoption of any common government by confederation or constitution. It got but one vote.

The other House has given an indication of its settled opinion by the passage of bills to increase the efficiency of the army, and to put the blacks within the conscription law for the public defences.

The Confederate House of Representatives has been engaged in striking from its rolls the name of Williamson R. W. Cobb, a member elected to this Congress from one of the northern districts of Alabama, who has not appeared to take his seat. He represented for a great many years in the Federal House of Representatives a district composed of nearly the same counties as the Confederate district. It is the mountain region of North Alabama, very like the region in East Tennessee, of which it is a continuation, in the scattered population it contains. Cobb has been invincibly popular in elections since he first settled there more than thirty years ago from New England—I have no distinct recollection from which State. He made his first appearance as a pedlar of clocks, from which I infer that he was from Connecticut, the clockmaking State. It is one of those mountain districts in which General Jackson used to get overwhelming majorities for the Presidency, and where the voters thought they were voting for Jackson years after he was dead. Cobb became, of course, a Jackson man, and as such the simple people believed in him, and sent him continuously to Congress in spite, or perhaps on account, of his total want of education, training, or knowledge of public affairs. He was an insignificant member, of whose simplicity the shrewder members who managed him used to tell amusing jokes. Among his claims on the support of his constituents was his success in getting them paid by the United States for a large number of horses they had used and lost two or three times over, it was said, in the Creek war. Cobb used to importune the members to give him what he called his 'little bill' to help him in his district. Being a good-natured obliging man in his own votes for other people's bills, it happened one day, when there was a pause in the business of the House of Representatives, waiting for some report, that a joking member called out, 'Here's a good time; let's give Cobb his little bill.' The House was in the humour, and put it through without any haggling about the merits, as a good piece of fun, and a good thing for 'Cobb'—as it was, for it fixed him in his seat. He shook hands all round the House vehemently, and the next morning manifested his gratitude by sending to each of the members who voted for his little bill, a cigar, neatly done up in a wrapper, with a card of compliments. He was in grave earnest, but his constituents believed, ever after, that Cobb was the greatest man in the district and had unlimited influence in Congress.

After the secession of Alabama, Cobb apparently acquiesced and remained silent. He was not in the first Congress, but was elected to this, very probably without much enquiry into his political opinions. He never took his seat, and his disloyalty is inferred from the fact of his having passed into the Federal lines, and remained there in cordial intercourse with the enemy. He has not been reclaimed.

He is one of the three members of the Confederate Congress described in the Northern journals as friends of reconstruction. The two others, Messrs. Boyce of South Carolina, and Mr. Foote of Tennessee, will not feel complimented by the imputation or the association.

There is nothing new to add since my former letter on the subject of Cabinet changes or peace projects. What appears to be settled—at least so far as concurrent reports from sources most likely to be well informed, go—is, that Mr. Stanton is to be Chief-Justice, and that Butler will take his place in the War Department. General Canby, who took the military command in Louisiana out of the hands of General Banks, is reported dead of the wounds he received, on the deck of a gunboat on the Red River, from a guerilla shooter on the shore, and Banks will be glad to get back to that rich field again. Fessenden has been importuned to remain in the Treasury Department until the troubles about finding a successor can be adjusted; but he is said to be impracticable, except on condition that the interval be very short.

The Peace lunacy is passing away. Notwithstanding the glow of anticipated triumph from Sherman's expedition, and the renewed stories of Southern prostration and despondency, the gold market cannot be permanently forced down. There is a lack of the confidence that any military success will put a period to the war, upon which a diminution of expenses can be calculated upon, and a possible reverse would send up the premium on gold like a skyrocket—with this difference, that nobody can guess whether it would ever come down.

Signs thicken that the Florida will be given up if Brazil insists upon it; but she will be very earnestly invoked, and well paid, not to insist upon it, but to accept some other form of reparation, in addition to the apology which Mr. Seward is tasking his wits to frame.

There will be no authentic development, before the President's Message, of the administrative plan for tendering a peace project to the South, and there is no idea among thinking men that there will be any offer such as could possibly be accepted, or serve any other purpose than to help forward the Government purposes for carrying on war on the Butler plan, of occupying the country, driving out the inhabitants, and parcelling their property among the Northern soldiers.

MR. LINCOLN'S INAUGURAL.

OUR respected contemporary, Punch, has been immensely clever of late in its dealings with American affairs. In the number for last week there was an admirable cartoon of Lincoln as the American Phœnix rising from the ashes of public credit, national liberty, &c., and in the number for the present week we find that he has forestalled the omniscient Reuter, the special telegraphic correspondent of the Times, and the Telegraphic News Association, all three, in supplying us with the inaugural address of President Lincoln to be delivered on the 4th of March next. Punch's 'Ultramarine Telegraph,' like the 'Grapevine Telegraph' of the Richmond journals, beats all competitors. We give this address below, only remarking that in one sentence of the exordium the telegram has been improperly rendered. Lincoln cannot be supposed to know anything of non nobis. With this exception as to Latin, the address is in all respects genuine, and in its verisimilitude speaks for itself:—

(By Ultramarine Telegraph.)

Well, we've done it, gentlemen. Bully for us. Cowhided the Copperheads considerable. Non nobis, of course, but still I reckon we have had a hand in the glory, some. That reminds me of the Old World story about the Hand of Glory, which I take to have been the limb of a gentleman who had been justified on the gallows, and which the witches turned into a patent moderator lamp, as would lead a burglar safe into any domicile which he might wish to plunder. We ain't burglars—quite t'other; but I fancy that if Uly Grant could get hold of that kind and description of thing to help him into Richmond, he'd not be so un-Christian proud as to refuse the hand of a malefactor. (Right, right!) Well, right or left hand, that's no odds, gentlemen. (Laughter.) Now I am sovereign of the sovereign people of this great and united republic for four years next ensuing the date hereof, as I used to say when I was a lawyer. (You are! Bully for you!) Yes, gentlemen, but you must do something more than bully for me—you must fight for me, if you please, and whether you please or not. As the old joke says, there's no compulsion, only you must. Must is for the king, they say in the rotten Old World. Well, I'm king, and you shall be viceroys over me. But I tell you again, and in fact I repeat it, that there's man's work to do to beat these rebels. They may run away, no doubt. As the Irishman says, pigs may fly, but they're darned onlikely birds to do it. They must be well whipped, gentlemen, and I must trouble you for the whipcord. (You shall have it!) Rebellion is a wicked thing, gentlemen, an awful wicked thing, and the mere nomenclating thereof would make my hair stand on end, if it could be more standonender than it is. (Laughter.) Truly awful, that is when it is performed against mild, free, constitutional sway like that of the White House, but of course right and glorious when perpetrated against ferocious, cruel, bloodthirsty old tyrants like George the Third. We must punish these rebels for their own good, and to teach them the blessings of this mighty and transcendental Union. (We will, we will!) All very tall talking, gentlemen, but talking won't take Richmond. If it would and there had been six Richmonds in the field, we should long since have took them all. If Richmond would fall like Jericho, by every man blowing of his own trumpet, we've brass enough in our band for that little feat in acoustics. But when a cow sticks, as Grant does, in the mud, how then? (Great laughter.) Incontestably, gentlemen, this great and mighty nation must give her a shove on. Shove for Richmond, gentlemen. (That's the talk!) Now about these eternal blacks, you expect me to say something touching them, though I suppose we're none of us too fond of touching them, for reasons in that case made and provided, as I used to say. Well, listen. We've got them on our hands, that's a fact, and it reminds me of a nigger story. Two of these blacks met, and one had a fine new hat. 'Where you got dat hat, Sambo?' says t'other. 'Out ob a shop, nigger,' says Sambo. ''Spex so,' says t'other; 'and what might be the price ob dat hat?' 'Can't say, zackly, nigger; the shopkeeper didn't happen to be on the premises.' (Laughter.) Well, we've got the niggers, and I can't exactly say—or at least I don't think you'd like to hear—what might be the price of those articles. But we must utilise our hats, gentlemen. We must make them dig and fight, that's a fact. There's no shame in digging, I suppose. Adam digged, and he is a gentleman of older line than any of the bloated and shavish aristocracies of Europe. And as for fighting, they must feel honoured at doing that for the glorious old flag that has braved for eighty-nine years and a half, be the same little more or less, the battle and the breeze. (Cheers.) Yes, and when the rebellion's put down, we'll see what's to be done with them. Perhaps, if the naughty boys down South get uncommon contrite hearts, we may make them a little present of the blacks, not as slaves, of course, but as legal apprentices with undefined salaries determinable on misconduct. (Cheers.) Meantime, gentlemen, I won't deny that the niggers are useful in the way of moral support. They give this here war a holy character, and we can call it a crusade for freedom. A man may call his house an island if he likes, as has been said by one of those fiendish British writers who abuse our hospitality by not cracking us up. ('War with England!') Well, all in good time, gentlemen. Let our generals learn their business first. I don't blame them, mind you, that they haven't learned it yet, for when a man has kept a whiskey store, or a bar, or an oyster cellar, or an old clothes shop for years, he can't be expected, merely because he puts on a uniform, to become a Hannibal or a Napoleon, or even a Marlborough or a Wellington. Likewise, they must learn to keep reasonable sober. Friends at a distance will please accept this intimation. (Roars of laughter.) When that's done, and the rebels are whipped, and we are in want of more fighting, we'll see whether Richmond in England, where the Queen's palace of Windsor Castle is situate, lying, and being, is a harder nut to crack than Richmond nearer us. (Cheers.) Gentlemen, one thing more. Did you ever hear the story of the farmer who had been insulted by an exciseman? 'He wur so rude,' said the farmer, 'that I wur obliged to remonstrate with him.' 'And to what effect did you remonstrate?' asked a friend. 'Well, I don't know about effect, but I bent the poker so that I was obliged to get a hammer to straighten it.' Gentlemen, we must straighten this glorious Union, and the hammer is taxes. (Laughter.) You may laugh, but you must pay. I don't mean to be hard upon this mighty nation, and our friend Mr. Cobden (cheers) has already indirectly informed the besotted masses of British slaves that we intend to repudiate our greenbacks, except to the amount they may be worth in the market when redeemed. But the poker wants a deal of hammering, nevertheless, and you must pay up. You'll hear more about this from a friend of mine in the Government, so I only give you the hint, as the man said when he kicked his uncle down-stairs. (Laughter.) I believe that's about all I had to say, and this almighty Union will be conserved to shine throughout the countless ages an ineffable beacon and symbol of blessed and everlasting light and glory if you will only mind the proverb of Sancho Panza, which says, 'Pray to God devoutly, and hammer on stoutly.' (Laughter, cheers, and cries of 'Bully for you!')

BARBAROUS TREATMENT.

(From the Richmond Sentinel.)

It is seldom that one finds, in the records of base and barbarous proceedings, a story of conduct so dishonourable and atrocious as is laid to the charge of our enemies in the following letter. It is the same that was read in Congress on Monday last:—

Macon, Georgia, October 17, 1864.

Hon. Wm. G. Swan, M.C.

Dear Sir,—In regard to the capture and treatment of Colonel Jos. B. Heiskell, M.C. from Tennessee, who was captured at Rogersville, East Tennessee, I propose giving you a brief account, as well as other items which may be of use.

On the morning of August 22 a body of Federal cavalry, under command of Lieutenant-Colonel Ingleton, of the 13th Tennessee Cavalry, surprised and captured the place, with twenty-five prisoners, members of John H. Morgan's command, who had been sent down as provost-guard.

Colonel Heiskell was captured while endeavouring to make his escape, and was not recognised by his captors, or, judging from what afterwards occurred, would have been killed on the spot. Having succeeded in their plans, and comparative quiet being restored, all hands collected around the prisoners, as is usually the case, to bully and blackguard them. Several officers, coming up, recognised the colonel, being from the same section of the country, and, with pistols drawn, rushed upon him, crying, 'Here's Heiskell—kill him! kill him!' The colonel very coolly told them to shoot if they saw fit, looking his assailants full in the face; and I have no doubt but that his coolness and unconcern saved his life. It was noticed by all, even the Federal soldiers. The leader in this charge was Captain Sysmore, a notorious bushwhacker and a deserter from our army. This same fellow I saw shoot one of our men after he had surrendered to a Federal soldier and was a prisoner, killing him instantly. He met in the street a boy about fifteen years old, and asked him if he was a rebel soldier. He replied, 'No, sir, I am not.' Sysmore replied, 'No, and you never shall be,' at the same time pulling his pistol and shooting him through the arm, shattering it so that amputation was necessary. After this I lost sight of Sysmore and saw no more of him. Several of our men were murdered in like manner. We were, after a short stay in the town, moved out on the Bull's Gap Road and marched in the direction of that place, which we reached about twelve o'clock at night. From here we were marched to General Gillem's headquarters, distant about five miles, on the Greenville Road. Arriving at the general's headquarters, we were placed in the guard-house, where we remained until morning.

The General's adjutant came in next morning and inquired for Heiskell and Walker (a citizen of Rogersville, also); their hands were tied behind them, and both (H. and W.) tied together, and we were then marched to the depot to be sent to Knoxville. Arriving at the depot, we were put in charge of the notorious Captain Kirk, who proceeded to practise his barbarity also upon the colonel and Mr. Walker, by tying them back to back, so that it was impossible for either to sit, compelling them to stand up a distance of sixty miles.

On the way their hands became very much swollen and quite painful. Mr. Walker asked Captain Kirk to loosen the string, telling him that he was suffering; his answer was, 'D—n you, die; I'll not unloose it.' The colonel made no complaint, but bore it without a murmur.

We were robbed of everything we had—watches, money, hats, &c. At every station along the road Colonel Heiskell was forced at the point of the bayonet to the car door, so that the crowd outside might amuse themselves by abusing him, and thus it continued until we reached Knoxville, where the same scene was enacted, only on a grander scale. The sidewalks were thronged with negroes and citizens, who had to be kept back by the guard at the point of the bayonet. The negroes seemed wild with excitement, telling the officers to turn us over to them, and they would make short work of it. Several of the colonel's acquaintances recognised him and abused him terribly. Brownlow was for hanging him upon the spot. During all this storm of indignities the colonel remained cool and unconcerned. We were taken to the gaol for confinement, where we found a few prisoners of war and twenty-five or thirty citizens. Among them were Mr. Warren, of Blount, Hartsill, of Blount, General Reagan, of Athens, Colonel B. Cook, formerly a member of Congress, Colonel Watkins, a former member also, Dr. Harris, and Mr. Hiphur, a member of the Legislature, all to be tried for treason; also, Major Wayne Wallace, of Knoxville. Some of these gentlemen had been in gaol for three months, Major Wallace since the evacuation of East Tennessee by our forces last fall. He was first carried to Johnson's Island, and afterwards brought back for trial. Also Captains Haul and Reynolds, of the C. S. A., who had been notified that they were to be tried for treason also.

I would state, in regard to these officers, that they are high-toned gentlemen, and as brave as ever drew a sword in defence of their country. They are both willing to undergo any suffering, and bear without a murmur their oppression rather than submit. They have both been in prison nearly a year, kept for some time in solitary confinement. No officers in the army have done better service, and it seems hard that they should lie in prison apparently forgotten. Our rations consisted of three hard crackers and half a pound of beef per day. We were furnished with no cooking utensils, and had to cook our meat on sharpened sticks.

Next morning, Brownlow's Rebel Ventilator made its way into rebeldom, and Colonel Heiskell was his principal theme. You can probably imagine better than I can describe his style. He advocated 'hanging him immediately, without the benefit of a trial; his whole course had been persistent disloyalty to the United States Government, and that he should be made to expiate his crimes upon the gallows, and alongside of him his other brother rebels in gaol,' &c.

I remained in prison here three weeks. Up to the time I left no action had been taken in his case, but he was expecting to be turned over to the civil authorities for trial.

Your obedient servant,

BEN. MORGAN.

THE FEDERALS IN KENTUCKY.

(From the Louisville Journal.)

In all that has been written upon the administration of General Paine in Kentucky and Tennessee, it appears that but few of the transactions that combine to make his record so dark with infamy have been furnished to the public. Every day some new fact is brought to light, some new crime is added to the already extensive catalogue paraded before the people in public prints. We have a letter from a Union soldier, a member of an Illinois regiment, who served under General Paine at Gallatin, Tennessee, and he writes that many incidents, equally revolting to the people of a civilised age, which marked the official career of General Paine, yet remain to be published.

In July, 1863, a scout was sent out from Gallatin, in command of the Second Lieutenant of Company G, 129th Illinois Volunteer Infantry. The soldiers travelled in a south-west direction, and, about fifteen miles from the town, surrounded a citizen's house, and made the husband and father a prisoner while sitting at the dinner table. In spite of all entreaties, the soldiers carried the man some twenty yards from the house, and, by orders of the lieutenant, in the presence of his weeping wife and frightened children, shot him down, and left the corpse, weltering in its blood, stretched upon the green sward. The lieutenant then drove the wife and her three children from their pleasant home, and set the house on fire.

The building burned rapidly, and in one brief half-hour a wife was rendered a widow, and, with her fatherless babes, left without shelter—homeless wanderers, with hearts full of sorrow. As an excuse for this act, it was claimed that a soldier had been murdered in the neighbourhood some weeks before. When the facts of this transaction were reported to General Paine, he remarked: 'Served the d——d son of a b——h right. I wish that the lieutenant had killed the man he brought in as a prisoner also, so as to save me the trouble of doing so.'

Subsequent facts have proved that the citizen thus inhumanly shot down was not guilty of the crime imputed to him. General Paine approved of the outrage, as the lieutenant and his soldiers were not even reprimanded for what they had done. They claimed that they had acted under orders of General Paine, and he was alone responsible for the deed. A Union soldier, a resident of the State from which General Paine hails, Illinois, assures us that the above statement is strictly true. The simple recital of facts is a more severe comment than anything we can offer.

DISTINCT POLITICAL COMMUNITIES.—The Globe of Friday last published our observations on Earl Russell's note to the Confederate Commissioners, and added the subjoined comments. The italics are not ours but the Globe's:—"We cannot but confess that we are so far of the same opinion with our Confederate contemporary, as we hold that, whatever may be said of State-sovereignty, State-individuality at least cannot be contested. That individuality was the very basis of all the institutions of the United States. Each of those States continued independent in its whole internal regimen; and the Federal Union, by the very force of the term, comprised the people of those States, as each represented in the Federal legislative and executive agencies whose action was limited to certain common purposes. It seems to follow that States which have had no part in the election of those agencies (e.g., in the present Presidential election) have no part in the Northern Federal Union. They no longer participate in its federal organisation for common purposes. That is simply a fact. Whose fault that fact is does not seem to affect its existence. Earl Russell says—"Of the causes of the rupture Her Majesty's Government have never presumed to judge." But every Government of Europe is cognisant of the fact that the Southern States are not parties to the reelection of President Lincoln. Our Northern friends will of course say—That is their own fault—they might have been if they had chosen. But the question is this—Is it not in the nature of separate political communities that they should choose, or not choose, to act with other such political communities, according as they can, or cannot, agree with their polities? All common action of North and South has hitherto been in the nature of compromise; and when it became no longer possible to arrange terms of compromise, common action of North and South of necessity ceased. Then came the question—Had the Northern combination of individual political units (States) any right to enforce submission to its will on the Southern combination of similar units? Foreigners at least must naturally be disposed to think they had not—because they said they had not on every former occasion on which the question was to give satisfaction to foreign demands of right, or remonstrances of wrong, against individual States. For example, if a British ship putting into the port of Charleston—from stress of weather, or any other cause—had happened to have on board black sailors, British subjects, those sailors would have been instantly clapped in gaol, and kept there, till the vessel should be about to take its departure. Any remonstrance against this infraction of international law, addressed to the Federal Government, would have been met with the answer that that Government had no jurisdiction over the proceedings, however offensive to foreigners, of the State of South Carolina, at home. One does not quite see how foreigners should distinguish between the right of the several States to assume at will an attitude of independence towards all the world—and towards each other. And facts have so far justified the assumption of that attitude in the conflict still raging, that, notwithstanding Northern reiteration of the name of rebels, it has never been attempted practically to withhold the common rights accorded by the laws of war to their Southern antagonists. The war is a war between two leagues of distinctly-organised political communities.

SHERIDAN'S DEVASTATION.—A committee of seventy-two, consisting of thirty-six citizens and the same number of magistrates, appointed by the County Court of Rockingham for the purpose of making an estimate of the losses of the county by the execution of Sheridan's infamous order, have made, after a laborious investigation of the subject, the following report:—Dwelling houses burned, 30; barns burned, 450; mills burned, 31; fencing destroyed (miles), 100; bushels of wheat destroyed, 100,000; bushels of corn destroyed, 50,000; tons of hay destroyed, 6,233; cattle carried off, 1,750; horses carried off, 1,750; sheep carried off, 4,200; hogs carried off, 3,350; factories burned, 3; furnace burned, 1. In addition to which there was an immense amount of farming utensils of every description destroyed, many of them of great value, such as M'Cormick's reapers, threshing machines; also, household and kitchen furniture, money, bonds, plate, &c. The whole loss being estimated at the enormous sum of £25,000,000.—Rockingham (Virginia) Register.

THE DEATH OF CAPTAIN MEIGS.

(From the Richmond Sentinel, November 10.)

It will be remembered that General Sheridan, in one of his official despatches from the Valley, stated that Captain Meigs, of the engineer service of his army, had been 'murdered' by Confederates, and that, in resentment or retaliation, he had ordered to be burned every house within five miles of the scene of the crime. Of the justness or fitness of such a proceeding on his part, even were the allegation true on which it rested, we suppose there can be no two opinions among civilised men. Why should the poor widow, five miles from the scene, and perfectly ignorant of the transaction, and who could not by any possibility have aided or hindered it, have her roof destroyed over her head for the crime of another? How does that punish or restrain the real offender? It was matter of boasting to General Sheridan that he had ordered this barbarity; and the men-at-arms who did his bidding made themselves very facetious over the 'torchlight procession' with which they lighted up the passage of their slain comrade into the realms of shade; but the guilt thus incurred will sit heavy on his soul some day.

We have, in the above, assumed that Sheridan's passions, though diabolical, and his revenge, though brutal and misplaced, had been excited by a real outrage. We have supposed that his ill offices which fell on those whose obvious innocence and helplessness would, with a good and brave man, have been their protection, were, in fact, justly due to somebody. But what a little reflection would suggest is, in fact, true. A barbarous and malignant nature seldom waits for proof. In the court or camp of a despot a whisper or a whim stands in the place of evidence. The lives and happiness of those whom Providence has placed at the mercy of a base, bad man, are the mere sport of his passions. If Sheridan had taken any pains to know the truth, he would have discovered that the story which he avouches as the reason for his unfeeling desolation of so many homes, was wholly without foundation. His conduct rests upon no better foundation than the prompting of a blind, ignorant, heedless, and malignant passion vented against helpless and innocent women and children, and, therefore, as cowardly as it was cruel.

We propose to give a true narrative of the so-called 'murder' of Captain Meigs. We are possessed of the exact particulars from the very best source. We could give names, but we remember the sort of enemies we are dealing with, and deem it prudent to withhold them. So far from being murdered, Captain Meigs fell in gallant fight, commenced by himself, and in which he showed both skill and courage.

Three Confederate soldiers, under the lead of ——— ———, one of our bravest and most accomplished scouts, were on a reconnoissance, when they discovered the near approach of three Federals. On the instant they reined aside and awaited their arrival. They proved to be Captain Meigs and two attendants. Our soldiers immediately ordered them to surrender, each of our men confronting one of the Federals. Captain Meigs, who rode in front, was in this manner summoned by the leader of the Confederate scouts. His two followers surrendered on the word; but Captain Meigs was of a different spirit. Drawing his pistol he fired on his antagonist, inflicting a very severe, and it was supposed, a mortal wound. The ball entered the right breast and made its exit on the opposite side of the body; wounded as he was, the Confederate then delivered his fire, which proved fatal. Captain Meigs died on the instant.

Anxious on account of the wound received by their leader, and aware of their exposed position, the other two Confederates betook themselves to hasty preparations for bringing off their comrade. In the haste and confusion of the moment, one of the Federal prisoners made his escape; the other was brought off. The person of Captain Meigs was not examined for the same reason, and the opportunity of capturing the valuable papers he bore was lost. It was not until afterwards, indeed, that it was known who he was.

It will be pleasing to our readers to be informed that the wounded Confederate was safely brought within our lines, and that his condition is now very promising. It is supposed that the ball struck a rib, and made the circuit of his body, instead of a passage through. An actor in many a gallant conflict of the past, he will doubtless be soon again in service.

Captain Meigs died a soldier's death, and not without honour. It was no fault of his true aim and quick and steady hand, that his antagonist did not die instead of him. The fortune of the fight was against him, and he fell. A death otherwise honourable has been made the occasion, by a brutal officer, of cruelties to women and children, that associate the fall of Meigs with an odious infamy. Sheridan has paid him a tribute that insults his shade, and which could be grateful only to a barbarian and coward.

FEDERAL SHIPBUILDING.—The most interesting topic in naval circles just now is the complete and absolute failure of Captain Ericsson's sea-going ironclad Dictator. This vessel was to constitute the mainstay of the United States, should the nation ever become involved in a contest with any other maritime Power. Singlehanded, the Dictator was to seek out and destroy the united navies of England and France, and dominate the sea. The ludicrous height attained by the boasts in regard to the Dictator has only been equalled by the depth of humiliation into which the boasters have been plunged by the failure of that vessel to accomplish anything. She can scarcely be moved by her engines, and on her trial trip she was towed out into the harbour by tug boats, and then towed back again. All rules in regard to buoyancy heretofore observed in the building of ships have been set at defiance in the construction of the Dictator. To begin, a mistake of more than 1,000 tons was made in computing the weight of the vessel. It is now discovered that with all her armament, provisions, and coal, on board, she would be entirely submerged; that the addition of her turret would send her to the bottom instanter; and, as it is, with only half her armament, &c., her top is but 13 inches out of water. Another tremendous blunder was made in regard to her journals. They have been constructed with no greater surface than those of our ordinary 'Sound' steamers of 500-horse power, while the engines of the Dictator are of 6000-horse power. As a consequence, from the immense pressure and great friction, the journals of this remarkable ironclad soon become red-hot, even when very moderate power is put in motion; and it is believed that if the full strength of her engines were employed, in the language of one of the engineers employed in the construction of the vessel, 'her journals would melt and run like water.' In short, the Dictator (and, of course, her consort, the Puritan, which is built on the same plan) is a total failure; so that £2,000,000 have been wasted in a vain experiment. It is a painful fact for an American to acknowledge; but the truth is, we are, after three years of experimenting, fussing, and boasting, without an ironclad navy.—New York correspondent of the Standard.

TO OUR FRIENDS AND SUBSCRIBERS.

THE INDEX was established in May 1862, in the darkest hour of Confederate fortunes, by earnest friends of Southern Independence, with the distinctly expressed object of being the representative, in English journalism, of a gallant and struggling people appealing to the world not only for political, but still more for moral recognition. Since accepting this great trust, THE INDEX has unceasingly laboured, by the combined aid of English and of Southern writers, to enlarge and extend the common ground upon which two nations may cordially meet, which need only to understand each other in order to cherish the warmest mutual appreciation and lasting friendship. The chief and almost the sole difficulty has been, and is still, the callous indifference of the British Government on the one hand, and, on the other, the perplexity, to the European mind, of the unsolved and unprecedented problems involved in the management and education of four millions of the African race, intermingled with a population of the highest Caucasian type. This difficulty could be met only by a liberal fairness to every shade of honest opinion, by an inflexible adherence to truth under all circumstances, and by a bold avowal of convictions, even though ill received. THE INDEX does not claim to be neutral, but it claims to be independent in the highest sense of that word. It is because it must reflect and appeal to, at one and the same time, the public opinion of two countries as yet only imperfectly acquainted, that this somewhat unusual self-description is called for.

Thanks to arrangements now in successful operation, by which the Letters of regular Correspondents and Newspapers from all parts of the Confederate States are received within from twenty-five to thirty days from their date, THE INDEX is always enabled to present the very Latest Direct News from the South, as well as a faithful reflex of the tone and spirit of the Southern Press.

All communications intended for publication should invariably be addressed to 'the Editor of THE INDEX, 291 Strand, W.C.,' and unless authenticated by a responsible name, can receive no attention.

Neutral Vessels and Belligerent Cruisers.

No belligerent Power has ever experienced such embarrassment in the exercise of her rights as against neutral Powers as the Confederate States, and none has avoided with equal success acts which could have given any just cause of offence. The career of the Confederate cruisers on the high seas has been marked by a leniency and forbearance which have earned the acknowledgments of the British authorities, and that, too, in spite of the fact that the only obstacle to an equitable assertion of the rights of war has been created by the regulations of the British Government. The ports of this empire have been closed to the admission of vessels captured either by Federal or Confederate ships of war, and consequently the latter Power has only the alternative of burning the enemy's vessels or exacting ransom bonds. It is, indeed, quite impossible to adjust the difficulties arising from combinations of neutral and hostile property by adjudication in court, for the simple reason that sailing vessels cannot be conveyed as prize through the blockading squadron of steamships.

Now the different cases which would occur to Confederate cruisers on the high seas, and would demand decision from the commander of the capturing vessel, may be divided into four classes. The first of these, where the captured vessel sails under the enemy's flag, without cargo, or with cargo belonging exclusively to the enemy, offers no difficulty whatever. No condemnation by an Admiralty Court is necessary to vest the title to such vessel in the belligerent Government, for the capture itself gives instant title to the captors. When, therefore, the captor is unable to bring his prize into port, nothing is left to him but to destroy the enemy's vessel which he has taken, for he cannot consistently with his duty to his country permit enemy's property to sail away unmolested. He is, however, justified in preserving the captured vessel, arming her, and placing her under the command of a properly commissioned officer of his Government, to be used either as a tender or as an independent cruiser. Lord STOWELL may be cited as an authority for the first position, and the British Government, by releasing the Tuscaloosa, and by issuing orders opening British ports to Confederate prizes so converted, has admitted the truth of the second doctrine.

Under the second class may be placed the case of a vessel sailing under the enemy's flag, and carrying a cargo wholly or in part belonging to neutrals. Under ordinary circumstances this case would present no embarrassment; for the captured vessel would be taken into a port of the captors, or a neutral port, and thereupon the neutral portion of the cargo would be restored to the owners, while the ship and hostile cargo would be condemned as prize. But the Confederate cruisers are debarred from bringing prizes into their own ports by the blockade, and into neutral ports by the injunctions of neutral Powers. Hitherto, however, the difficulty thus created has been evaded by the use of ransom bonds, and it reflects the utmost credit on the Confederate Government that it has forborne to destroy the neutral cargo; for if the British authorities will not permit the belligerent to deliver the goods to a British subject, how can they complain if the goods are not delivered? Indeed, if neutral nations choose to persevere in their refusal to receive into their ports the goods of their own people, nothing will remain to the belligerent but to destroy such property whenever the prize cannot be brought into port. Even under present circumstances, if a ransom bond is refused by the captured ship, or if the proportion of neutral property on board is small compared with the value of the vessel and hostile cargo, no reasonable objection can be urged by the neutral to the destruction of the whole.

The third class embraces the case of a vessel really neutral, with a cargo wholly or in part belonging to the enemy. Now, as the law stood before the year 1856, such a vessel would have been liable to capture for the purpose of being brought into port, where the hostile cargo would be condemned as prize, and the neutral vessel with the neutral portion of the cargo would be liberated. The state of the law was, however, so far modified by the Paris declaration of 1856, that the rule now stands among European nations that 'the neutral flag covers enemy's goods, with the exception of contraband of war.' To this rule the Congress of the Confederate States gave in its adhesion on August 13, 1861, in the full faith and expectation that Great Britain and France would comply with the regulations of the Paris declaration on the subject of blockades. Inasmuch, however, as both these Powers notoriously failed to fulfil their promise, the Confederacy was clearly thereby released from the obligation contracted towards them. President DAVIS, in his message to Congress on December 7, 1863, asserted the existence of such a release; but declared, with singular magnanimity, that 'the principles established by the Paris Convention were more just, more humane, more consonant with modern civilisation, than those belligerent pretensions which great naval Powers have hitherto sought to introduce into the maritime code.' He announced, therefore, that the Government would forego its right to retract the assent given to this rule of maritime law. It is clear, then, that such vessels as come under this class can be tainted only by the presence of goods contraband of war. If the owner of the vessel has put on board contraband goods belonging to himself, he has forfeited his neutral character, and his own Government will be estopped from complaint by its proclamation against such contraband trade. In all other cases the contraband goods would, if practicable, be transhipped or destroyed, and the vessel be allowed to continue her voyage.

The fourth and last class is one possessing at the present time features of peculiar interest, inasmuch as it is well ascertained that a large number of vessels are embraced in it, and have incurred a liability to the penalties attached to the class. These are vessels ostensibly neutral but really hostile, fraudulently placed under a neutral flag, and furnished with fraudulent papers to protect them from capture. Of course, where the fraud is admitted no difficulty can arise. The real embarrassment exists where an enemy's vessel has been transferred to neutrals since the commencement of the war. All Powers except England and the United States have uniformly held transfers flagrante bello to be illegal. But the rule which obtained in the United States would doubtless be held valid by the Confederacy, and consequently bonâ fide sales would be respected. Where, however, the transfer is merely colourable—where, for example, the vessel is mortgaged or hypothecated to the enemy—her false neutrality cannot possibly save her from the treatment which she would have received had no such transfer been made. In the month of June last our columns contained a list of vessels which had undergone this peculiar process of 'whitewashing' during the year 1863. We at the same time took the pains to explain the stringency of the Merchant Shipping Act as to the declaration required from the transferee before the protection of the British flag could be obtained, and as to the penalties of perjury. We also indicated that such transactions were open to such serious suspicion, even in the absence of mortgages, that, when once the former possession of the belligerent was shown, the onus of proving innocence was thrown on the transferee. In point of fact, however, the character of these mortgaged ships is beyond question, and they should unhesitatingly be subjected to the fate of vessels hoisting the Federal flag. Of course, it is not a matter of the utmost simplicity to detect the fraud, because an English ship does not bear on her certificate of registry any statement of mortgages. The wisdom of a law changing the form of certificate in this particular can scarcely be doubted; but under existing circumstances the captor must arrive at a decision by a careful examination of every piece of evidence calculated to determine the ship's character. Her papers, the nature of her trade, the nationality of the master, the facts attending the supposed sale, and other points, must be weighed, and the vessel must be destroyed or dismissed according to the preponderance of probabilities. For these embarrassments, and the evils consequent on them, the British Government is solely to blame. So long as the ports of this empire are closed against prizes, such difficulties must exist. Let the ports be opened to all such vessels pending the decision of the Confederate Admiralty Courts, and all questions as to the conflicting rights of neutral property and Confederate ships of war will at once vanish.

The War.

GENERAL SHERMAN has staked the fate of an army of 50,000 men—perhaps the issue of the war—on about the maddest enterprise that ever was conceived in the brain of a practical soldier. A week ago we could scarcely bring ourselves to believe that he seriously entertained the intentions ascribed to him by the Northern press. By this time, if he has met with no unforeseen opposition, he has accomplished half his march, and ought certainly, if his army is ever to reach the sea, to have captured Augusta. As we learn more of his objects, and of the means by which he proposes to accomplish them, we confess we grow more and more impressed with the appositeness of the hackneyed proverb, 'Quos Deus vult perdere prius dementat.' He has undertaken a march of at least 250 miles through an enemy's country, with a force of less than 50,000 men, and perhaps a week's supplies. Before he has travelled thirty miles from Atlanta he begins his work of devastation. Wherever there is a town to be destroyed, it is given to destruction by his distinct orders. A great flame of fire marks his progress southward, and spreads every 100 miles before him the news of his approach, with famine and ruin in his track. It is plainly not conquest, then, on which this Federal general is intent; it is simply a desperate gigantic raid perpetrated on a peaceful population and helpless communities, and withal a retreat planned with a greater brutality of design and barbarism in execution than has disgraced any modern army. We say a retreat advisedly, for SHERMAN'S object has been ridiculously misrepresented both in America and in this country. There are writers who have pictured him establishing a new base at Augusta, occupying the Georgia Central Railway as he held the Chattanooga and Atlanta line with a chain of forts, and thus splitting the Confederacy in two. Others have landed him safely in Charleston, and marched him thence through the Carolinas to reinforce GRANT'S army for the final attack upon Richmond. We venture, however, to say that, if SHERMAN succeeds in destroying Augusta and getting off safely to his gunboats on the shore of the Atlantic, he will have done all that he hoped to do, and think himself lucky. For there cannot be a doubt that this southward movement was forced upon him. For six weeks or two months large bodies of Confederate cavalry had been playing havoc with his trains, and had not only subsisted on his supplies, but sent off the surplus stores to Confederate depôts. The winter was approaching, which would materially increase the difficulty of transport. Above all, HOOD and BEAUREGARD and FORREST, with an army of at least 60,000 veteran soldiers, had taken up a position threatening equally Nashville, his base, and the whole line of railway thence to Atlanta, whilst the Georgian militia were concentrating for an attack upon Atlanta. SHERMAN saw the impossibility of holding the town for which he had spent 50,000 lives. But he had not the courage to own his failure and face the storm of indignation and disgust with which a retrograde movement would have been greeted by the whole North. The thriving towns and rich farms of Georgia offered a splendid prize. HOOD'S army, the defence of the State, was out of reach. He might yet redeem his failure in Yankee eyes by a big raid. He might find his way to the sea with but the miserable remnant of his army; but, at any rate, he would be able to point to a State rendered desolate, to thousands of Southern women and children rendered homeless, to blazing towns and shattered homesteads; and the brutal savagery of the Yankee would condone the loss of an army in fiendish glee over the sufferings of the people of Georgia. We refuse to regard this expedition as a grand conception. To us it savours of the Malay running a muck, or of the Red Indian, with warwhoop and paint and tomahawk, swooping down upon some weak settlement of the earlier colonists. That it will end in a disaster unparalleled during the present war, we have good reason to expect.

Up to the present time the news received from Georgia is very contradictory. But we gather from it that SHERMAN had started, with his army marching in two columns, the one on Macon, the other on Augusta, burning everything on his road, and subsisting on the country. Accounts differ as to the day of his departure from Atlanta, but on the 21st ult. he was still eighteen miles from Macon, and Milledgeville had not been captured. Now Macon is a very strongly fortified town. When the fate of Atlanta was in question, the tenure of Macon became a matter of importance to the South, and very strong works of defence were constructed. When SHERMAN started from Atlanta, IVERSON was close upon him with his cavalry, and COBB with a strong force of Georgian militia. The Northern press speaks slightingly of the militia; but it was this very militia which put such an ignoble end to STONEMAN'S raid, and, on more than one occasion subsequently, elicited the special commendation of HOOD for its determined bearing in the field. Macon can be reinforced from Mobile with good artillerymen, and easily provisioned. We know what earthworks will do; and we are inclined to think that Macon will not fall, and that SHERMAN will prefer to give it a wide berth, and push rapidly on to Augusta. But if Macon do not fall, then it will be the base of operations against SHERMAN'S army, and may be the means of its destruction. For, supposing SHERMAN to push on to Augusta, he will be followed by the Macon force, and, even if his march to Augusta be totally free from opposition, there, at any rate, he will be placed between two fires. It is not to be supposed that LEE has left the great powder factory of the South-west unprotected; or that that important town will be surrendered without a battle. If it were necessary, BRECKINRIDGE'S forces, now masters of Tennessee, could be transported almost directly to South Carolina, and anticipate SHERMAN'S arrival by a fortnight. Then there is the whole reserve militia force of South Carolina, Florida, Alabama, and Georgia, now mobilised, and directed against SHERMAN'S army, which one failure at Macon, or a week's delay before Augusta, would inevitably consign to destruction. For the worst has to be endured when the first half of the journey has been accomplished, and when half the towns in Georgia lie in charred ruins. Once past Augusta, the rich country which has fed the Federal soldiers is left behind. From Augusta to Beaufort or Charleston, SHERMAN'S army must carry its supplies. Its route lies through endless marshes, where 100 negroes well employed would delay it for a month. But from Augusta to Savannah the road runs through 120 miles of desolate pine forest, where neither man nor beast can find subsistence. Possibly a hope may be entertained that Admiral PORTER'S fleet will effect a powerful diversion in SHERMAN'S favour, but the season is not propitious for naval operations, and, in all probability, the Federal General will have to fight his way through unaided. If Georgia is true to herself, if her sons carry out the instructions of her senators, and of BEAUREGARD, and of the Richmond authorities—if instead of waiting for the destroying hand of the invader they themselves employ the torch—if they will burn bridges, fell timber, and break up roads—we may yet chronicle the greatest triumph of the Confederacy during the present year.

Nor is the aspect of affairs uncheering in other quarters. Tennessee seems in a fair way of recovering her freedom. In Middle Tennessee, the Federal armies are retiring before HOOD. In Eastern Tennessee, BRECKINRIDGE'S notorious columns have shut up the invader within the defences of Knoxville, after making heavy captures of material. In fact, the recent victory of BRECKINRIDGE is a most important success. If he should be able to recover possession of Cumberland Gap, then Knoxville must fall, and with it Chattanooga, and thus the whole of Eastern Tennessee relapse into the hands of the Confederates. It is possible that the Confederate authorities may leave the defence of the Cotton States to the garrisons and regiments already in those States, aided by small reinforcements from LEE'S and BEAUREGARD'S forces, and continue to prosecute the war for the recovery of Tennessee on a grand scale. No amount of damage that SHERMAN can hope to effect would balance the loss of Tennessee to the Federals; nor will any Confederate success so materially affect public opinion on this side of the Atlantic as its recovery by the South. We should not grudge SHERMAN'S escape, if we could hear that the Confederate flag was once more flying over Nashville. But we do not despair of the destruction of SHERMAN'S army, and the reoccupation of Nashville, if the men of the Cotton States will fight for their own firesides as they have fought side by side with the best blood of Virginia for the homes of the 'Old Dominion.'

The Constitution of Acadia.

THE Constitution of the proposed Confederation of British America has been made public, and does great credit to the good sense, moderation, statesmanship, and political philosophy of its framers. We shall not enter into any detailed criticism of the Constitution, but shall sketch in general terms the features which distinguish it from previous federal constitutions, and from that of the United States in particular.

First, then, as to the relations of the Federation to the mother-country. In regard to these, the Convention has indeed shown itself jealous; but it has been jealous to preserve the connection of the new State with England, and the prerogatives of the Crown, rather than to prevent encroachments on colonial independence, which are never likely to be attempted unless the manifest necessity of the colonies themselves should demand the parental interference of the Imperial authority. Everywhere the prerogative of the Sovereign is carefully excepted; the right of disallowing colonial enactments preserved; the supremacy of the mother-country and its right to make any regulations touching the international position and dealings of the Federal State duly acknowledged. The QUEEN appoints the Viceroy, and nominates the members of the Legislative Council—the Upper House of Parliament; and the authority of the Imperial Government over the colonial confederation will be quite as full and complete as that now exercised over the separate colonies.

Secondly, as regards the relative duties and authority of the Federal Parliament. In this respect the distinction which exists between a State composed of confederated provinces and a confederacy of independent States is very clearly marked. The Federal Assembly is not a Congress, but a Parliament. The people of the colonies are represented in the Lower House, under regulations almost exactly the same as those which determine the representation of the people of the States in the House at Washington. But the Upper Chamber does not consist of representatives of the colonies in their corporate (we cannot here say sovereign) capacity, but of councillors apportioned to each in fixed numbers, and appointed by the Crown, under the great seal of the Federal or general Government, for life. The first councillors are to be chosen from the existing Legislative Councils (themselves appointed by the Crown). The powers of the Parliament extend over a far wider range than those of the American Congress. It is, in fact, sovereign, subject to the sovereignty of Great Britain; it has the making of the criminal law; the regulation of a very large portion of the civil code; the power of levying excise and customs duties, except with regard to a few specified exports; the power of regulating trade and commerce; the coinage; banks; navigable waters; fisheries; military and naval services; postal service; the right of raising money in any way it pleases; and a number of other specified rights. The local legislatures have power over education, property and civil rights (which in England differ in different districts), and other matters, generally such as in England are left to municipal or county regulation. In all subjects not exclusively reserved for local consideration, the laws of Parliament overrule those of the local legislature, and—the most marked distinction between this Constitution and that of the United States—all powers not reserved to the local legislatures belong to the Federal Parliament. It is distinctly the intention of the Acadian Constitution to make the Parliament supreme, and place in its hands the real government of the whole country, its internal as well as its external interests and relations, as it was the intention of the United States Constitution to confine the power of Congress within the narrowest limits that would suffice for the proper transaction of the business strictly common to all the States. And thus the terms 'central' and 'general,' which are inapplicable, in times when the Constitution is in force, to the Government at Washington, are frequently applied in the Constitution itself to that which is to have its seat at Ottawa. The central Government has the appointment of the judges of the superior courts, and of the governors (to be called lieutenant-governors) of the 'provinces.' It will be seen, therefore, that while there is, properly speaking, no sovereign power resident anywhere within the colonies, the actual sovereign power resting in the last resort with Great Britain, yet the Federal Government will, in point of fact, exercise all the functions of sovereignty within the limits of the State, subject to no important exception but this, that it cannot alter the constitutions of the provinces, nor deprive them of any powers reserved to them by the Constitution. But these are hardly greater than those enjoyed by English counties. There can be no question, in a conflict between the central and local authorities, which has the right to the obedience of individuals. The head of the local Government is himself the subordinate of the Viceroy, removable by him at pleasure (with the sole restriction that the cause of removal must be stated in writing), and the prerogative of rendering an act criminal and punishable rests with the central power. In fine, the provinces retain no authority that could be withdrawn from them without awakening the jealousy of the French inhabitants of Lower Canada and alarming them for the safety of their peculiar institutions, and it can hardly be doubted that the tendency of Acadian politics will be towards a concentration of power in the hands of the central Parliament (which, sitting for five years, has a more secure hold and a greater independence than Congress), and the restriction of the local legislatures to merely local business, such as in England is transacted by municipal councils, quarter sessions, and vestries.

The position of the Viceroy is strictly analogous, except in his subjection to the Crown, to that of the QUEEN of ENGLAND, and totally different from that of the President of the United States. He is independent of the people, for they can neither curtail nor prolong his term of power, and he derives his authority not from them, but from the Crown. Instead of an elective chief magistrate chosen every four years by popular vote, after a contest throwing the whole country into violent agitation, Acadia will receive the head of her Government from England, with no more excitement than may be caused by his progress by rail to the seat of government, and his appearance before the people of his capital. Instead of losing him just when he has acquired experience in the business of government, she may retain him as long as the Crown pleases to keep him in office. He will generally be far superior in personal character and capacity to recent Presidents of the United States, for no Government would dare to appoint to such an office any but a statesman of the first rank, like those who have been selected for the Governor-Generalship of India. But his personal fitness will not be so momentous a question as that of the President. He will wield far less personal power. He must act through Ministers, and these Ministers will be responsible to Parliament, and must resign when their policy is no longer satisfactory to the representatives of the people. Thus the direct and immediate control over the Executive Government, which is wanting in the United States, will exist in Acadia exactly as it does in England; and in nearly all essential matters the Acadian subject will enjoy the benefit of a Constitution similar to that which the wisdom and experience of ages have adapted to the wants of the mother-country, with somewhat less of that centralisation of power which has of late gone rather further than the spirit of the Constitution warrants, and which, while degrading the dignity of the local authorities, has grievously overburdened the hard-worked House of Commons. Under such a system, it will be the fault of the people themselves if their political condition be not prosperous and progressive; and we trust that the experience of the United States, which has enabled them to steer clear of many errors in framing their Constitution, will teach them to avoid in its working those faults of violence, overbearing acts, and unreasonable demands, contempt of the rights of a minority, and disregard for laws obnoxious to public opinion, as well as that declension into absolute democracy, which have brought to ruin the work of the Convention of 1787.

The Report of the War Department.

THE Report of the Confederate SECRETARY of WAR, published in our last number, ought to go far towards dispelling the delusions of those who have been induced by recent Northern outbursts of exultation, menace, and triumph, to imagine that the South is really reduced to extremities, and that the rebellion, which has been on its last legs ever since the fall of Vicksburg, is at length driven to its last ditch, and dying there rather in sheer desperation than in any hope of being able to make a successful stand. The State papers of the Confederate Government have never been marked by that tone of expectant glorification, that tendency to boast of victories about to be won, and of traps from which the enemy cannot escape, that habit of fixing a certain and speedy date for the accomplishment of the national hopes and the termination of the war, which are so remarkably prominent in every Northern document. The Confederate Ministers have frankly avowed disasters, and called for new efforts to redress them; they have spoken of victories, not so much to raise the spirits of a people whom no reverses seem to daunt, as to call for fresh strength to improve the successes achieved and maintain the ground already won.

They have never adopted, in calamity, that tone of whining despondency which from time to time replaces the vainglorious boasting of Federal officials, nor yet that anticipatory self-glorification which, according to ancient superstition, provokes disaster at the hands of an insulted Destiny. Consequently, the utterances of the Government at Richmond have been received in Europe with a ready credence and respect which subsequent evidence has always justified. The Report above mentioned, therefore, will have an effect on English opinion not generally exercised by any Federal assertions of resources accumulated or successes won.

Its tone is hopeful and resolute without being boastful; it manifests satisfaction and gratitude for what has been achieved without boastfulness or premature triumph. In a very brief sketch of the results of this year's campaigns it sets in their true light before the public the relative positions of the belligerents at the beginning and at present; and will go far to satisfy all who are not blinded by prejudice to the plainest facts that the prospects of the South are more hopeful at this moment than they have been at any period since the battle of Gettysburg. The election which has just concluded, the rapid depreciation of the currency, and the growing despondency of the Northern people, prompted the Federal Government to make unusual exertions in order to commence the campaign in every quarter with energy and with effect; and never were their armies more numerous, better equipped, better supplied, or led by generals more thoroughly trusted by the President and the people, than in the spring of this year. In every direction they pressed forward eagerly, urged on not only by their own hopes, but by the political necessities of their Government. What has been the result? After long, desperate, and most costly fighting, Sherman reached Atlanta. Meanwhile Alabama and Mississippi, portions of which were formerly in Federal hands, have been almost cleared of their invaders. Great part of Tennessee has been recovered by the Confederates; they have regained a hold on Kentucky, and they recently overran great part of Missouri, recruiting their forces and carrying off supplies. In these States they are stronger than they have been since the fall of Fort Donnelson. West of the Mississippi, they have completely recovered their ground. The great expedition which left New Orleans to ravage and subdue Louisiana, has returned, crushed and cut to pieces, to shelter itself under protection of the gunboats; and the Confederates are masters of nearly all the territory of the State. In Texas some few Federal soldiers remain—as prisoners of war. In Arkansas the invaders hold only a few fortified posts. Thus, the Confederates have recovered the whole West, which, according to the boasts of Northern organs, was but lately lost to them for ever. They have regained their ascendency in Tennessee; they have freed the Gulf States from the enemy; they have repulsed him at Mobile; and all that he has gained is the empty shell of Atlanta, and as much of the soil of Georgia as may be covered by his camp.

In Virginia the campaign was opened by a treble attack. Butler marched from the Peninsula, was beaten, and shut up in his intrenchments. Grant marched directly on the Confederate capital, and was beaten in a series of battles, which cost him some 50,000 or 60,000 men; and, finally, by a flank march, he succeeded in joining Butler. They still lie in front of Petersburg, without being a whit nearer to the capture either of that city or of Richmond than when they first appeared before it. The third force was defeated in the Shenandoah Valley; and the conquerors entered Maryland, appeared before Washington, burnt Chambersburg, and retired unmolested. General Early's subsequent defeats have resulted in no real advantage to the Federals, and are likely ere long to be repaired; while the fiendish devastation of the Valley testifies as much to the despair as to the fury of the invader. Such are the results of the campaigns of 1864, undertaken with greater and better disciplined forces, with better resources, and more thorough preparation than the North ever before brought to bear, and ending in complete failure and in losses perfectly incalculable. Virginia alone can hardly have cost her invaders, in this single year, less than 100,000 men.

To carry on a successful struggle against an enemy who has an enormous population at his back, now degraded and coerced into a submission which may make even conscription possible, who claims to have armed 200,000 negroes, and who has drawn large numbers of recruits from the countries of the Old World, the South has need of extraordinary efforts. This war has been marked by a frightful expenditure of human life; and, though the losses of the South have been comparatively small, they have seriously thinned her ranks. She has need of all her strength, and, in order to bring it to bear, the Secretary proposes to Congress the abolition of all exemptions, with a view to place in the field the whole white male population between eighteen and forty-five capable of bearing arms. What proportion of these may be wanted elsewhere than in the field may be detailed for special services after these have been provided for as far as possible by the men of non-military age. Lads from seventeen to eighteen, and men from forty-five to fifty, are to form reserves for local service, while going on with their ordinary occupations. In brief, the country is to be made a camp, and the nation an army. Both the President and the Secretary deprecate the idea of arming the slaves, save in a last resource, but propose to levy 20,000 or 40,000 able-bodied negroes for services in camp and garrison, as teamsters, sappers and miners, and so forth, and promise them emancipation as the reward of good and loyal service. Of the right to employ the slaves as soldiers against an enemy who has not shrunk from the diabolical atrocity of exciting servile insurrection, as well as of the propriety of arming them in the last resource, rather than expose them to the fate which awaits them if they should fall into Yankee hands, neither Mr. Davis nor Mr. Seddon entertains any doubt; but while white men remain in sufficient numbers, humanitarian reasons forbid the employment of the negroes as actual soldiers.

Of the conduct of the war by the enemy, Mr. Seddon speaks in terms of indignant abhorrence. But the only violation of the laws of civilised war to which he thinks it necessary to make detailed reference regards the exchange of prisoners. At first it was stipulated that prisoners should be paroled till exchanged; and while the South had a majority of captives this rule was faithfully observed. The balance turned in favour of the North; and then the Federal Government declared that it would only exchange man for man. This would have left some thousands of Confederate prisoners at the mercy of an enemy whose habitual practice it is to shoot prisoners in cold blood when he wishes to avenge a surprise or a disaster; and the Confederates at first refused. Afterwards, moved by the sufferings inflicted on their captive soldiers, they consented; and then the Federal Government evaded the question of a general exchange altogether. It will not give up a Confederate soldier for an Irish or German mercenary; nor does it care to recover prisoners whose term of enlistment has expired. Meantime, the Confederates held prisoners in the North have been treated with studied barbarity. Not only have they not been supplied with proper food, clothing, and shelter, but they have been refused permission to purchase them. The pretext made was an allegation that Northern prisoners at the South were subjected to similar hardship; and this at a time when Federal organs were exulting in the idea that the maintenance of these prisoners must be a heavy drain on Southern resources! It was well known to the North that their captive soldiers were treated as well as Confederate soldiers; and that whatever privations they might suffer were attributable solely to the devastations practised by the invading armies and the rigours of the blockade. But no argument and no exposure would ever have shamed Mr. Lincoln into truth or humanity. General Grant, reckless as he is of his soldiers' lives, has some of the feelings of a soldier; and a negotiation between him and General Lee, commenced by the latter, has resulted in an agreement that each party shall be at liberty to supply the wants of its soldiers prisoners in the hands of the other. This will be good news to those who showed their kindly feeling towards their Southern brethren at the Liverpool Bazaar, and who may well have feared lest Federal cruelty should deprive the sufferers of the intended benefit. Concessions to humanity have been rare indeed on the part of Northern commanders; and this one good act of General Grant's ought not to pass unregarded amid the multitude of cruel and cowardly crimes which have made the Federal service a reproach and a byword throughout Christendom.

A Very Hard Shell.—The assumption of the North seems to be—to use their own simile—that the Southern Confederation is like an egg, possessing, indeed, a hard shell, but when this is once passed soft and penetrable. Experience has given us more proof of the truth of the first than of the second of these assumptions. There is no doubt that on whatever side it has been attacked, with the single exception of New Orleans, the Confederacy has been proved to have an exceedingly hard shell, much more resembling the armour of a tortoise than the thin covering of an egg. But this proof of one-half the metaphor can by no means be taken to establish the other half. When General Banks invaded the State of Louisiana an army sprang up as if out of the earth to resist him, and he was driven back upon his communications with disaster and defeat. Texas, Arkansas, Missouri, Virginia south of Richmond, and North Carolina, have all been found equally impervious. It is assumed that the old and high-spirited State of Georgia is made of softer stuff. Time will show; but at present, at least, analogy is all against it.—The Times.

Reviews.

THE SERIALS FOR DECEMBER.*

Blackwood contains a sketch of the Confederate States and of the army of General Lee, on which it would be difficult to lavish too much praise. The writer is always vivacious, keenly observant of events, and his pictures of life and character are just. The 'Cavalry Officer' to whom we owe 'A Visit to the Cities and Camps of the Confederate States, 1863-64,' arrived in the Southern States in May 1863, marched with General Lee to the field of Gettysburg, and was subsequently present at the bombardment of Charleston and at the fight of Chicamauga. He left the South in April last, and afterwards visited the Northern States. The present number is confined to the campaign which terminated at Gettysburg, and the narrative is as it were supplementary to the charming book published last year by Colonel Fremantle; but that which is to come will be yet more attractive, because the history will not have been preceded by any effort of a similar nature. It would be superfluous here to go again over the familiar ground of Lee's invasion, by any attempt at a description of the military operations. But the sketch brings out a few points of great importance with reference to the condition of the Confederacy, which may be noted with advantage. Every child knows by heart the atrocities committed by the Northern soldiery in the enemy's country, and the mind is sick and weary of Sheridan's devastations of fertile valleys, of Sherman's destructions of cities, and of the more awful crimes of the Northern officers, who have taken special delight in murders in cold blood. Our 'Cavalry Officer,' in a conversation with Mr. Benjamin, elicited a shrewd comment on the point from the sagacious Secretary of State:—

'If they had behaved differently,' Mr. Benjamin remarked—'if they had come against us observing strict discipline, protecting women and children, respecting private property, and proclaiming as their only object the putting down of armed resistance to the Federal Government, we should have found it perhaps more difficult to prevail against them. But they could not help showing their cruelty and rapacity; they could not dissemble their true nature, which is the real cause of this war. If they had been capable of acting otherwise, they would not have been Yankees, and we should never have quarrelled with them.'

How Southern men behave in Yankeeland is admirably told. At Chambersburg our author obtained a bed at an hotel by a liberal payment in greenbacks, and purely by virtue of the consent of the landlord; and his astonishment at the absence of coercion is such that he exclaims, 'We manage these things differently in some parts of Europe, in war times, in an enemy's country.' Then, again, the foraging parties pay for what they take, while the Inspector-General actually is found riding about seeking whom he can devour in the shape of a depredator or illegal annexer of private property. 'Indeed,' says our author, 'the good behaviour and discipline of the men of this army is surprising to me, considering the way in which the Northerners have devastated the country and wreaked their wrath on women and children in the South wherever they had an opportunity.' Again, he says, 'The troops were never quartered in any village nor allowed to enter houses on any account.' Next the evidence is most complete with regard to the treatment of prisoners in the Confederacy:—

I visited (says he) the Libby Prison at Richmond some time afterwards, and found it kept scrupulously clean and well ventilated; there was not a bad smell about the place; and, to attend upon the 900 to 1,000 officers confined there, forty negro servants were kept. At Belle Isle, in the James river, close to Richmond, there were about 8,000 prisoners living in tents, in a regular encampment, with plenty of room for exercise, any amount of water, bathing allowed in the season, and better rations than the Confederate soldiers get in the field, though nominally the same. They had been on Belle Isle six months when I went there, and I counted seventy-six graves in the island. As many have died in one day at Fort Delaware—so Captain Bois-Sieux, the Commandant of Belle Isle, informed me. During the first three months only one had died, but latterly, since the exchange of prisoners had been stopped, the men easily fell ill, grew despondent, and died. . . . After what I had seen with my own eyes at Belle Isle and the Libby Prison, and what I heard with my own ears from Southerners of their treatment as prisoners in the North, I could not help being reminded of the old Scotch proverb, 'Ill doers are ill deemers.'

The remarks on the negroes shall be summed up in two quotations:—

Colonel Faulkner assured me that though he was a large slaveholder himself, and had always lived amongst slaveholders, yet he had never in the course of his life even heard of a grown-up slave being whipped. He said, too, that a man guilty of cruelty towards his slaves would incur such odium as he would never survive.

And again:—

If any one in the South wished to make quite sure of getting into trouble, he need only abuse or ill-treat a negro; and though the 'boy' might be submissive, he would soon have every white man in the neighbourhood down upon him, and perhaps a revolver or two emptied into his body.

We shall conclude with an anecdote about Mr. Lincoln, which we might forbear to tell were it not that Mr. Edward Everett, who has been in London drawing-rooms, has ventured to affirm that Mr. Lincoln will in point of manners compare favourably with the most refined members of the diplomatic corps. When Messrs. Preston, Randolph, and Stuart, the deputies from Virginia, waited on the President of the United States, and urged him to do something to calm the irritation of the people—

'What would you have me do?' said Mr. Lincoln. 'Mr. President,' replied one of the deputation, 'I would beg you to lend me your finger and thumb for five minutes'—meaning, of course, that he wished him to write something that should allay the prevailing excitement. But Mr. Lincoln did not choose to understand him. 'My finger and thumb!' he repeated—'my finger and thumb! What would you do with them? Blow your nose?' The deputation retired in disgust, and Virginia seceded.

'Aunt Ann's Ghost Story' has but one defect. It is just a little too tantalising. If the wretched man who preferred to act ghost for a long period of years to a quiet residence at the bottom of a mine in Siberia had been discovered fully as to lineage, crimes, and penalties, there would have been, in addition to a specimen of excellent writing, a fine theme for the exposure of the action of the Russian executive. To such a temptation every one but Aunt Ann has yielded; but perhaps, as she was the wife of an officer of the Imperial Guard, her loyalty to the Sclave prevailed over the love of book-making innate in humanity.

Cornelius O'Dowd is more savage than usual. He hits out in a style that must create a new enemy at every word, choosing rather to lose his friend than his joke. The first shot is fired at the Scientific Congressites, whose idea of a long vacation is to swarm upon Bath or Tunbridge Wells, and prose to rooms full of green-veiled goddesses. As for Mrs. O'Dowd, what with her comparisons of her husband to a young giant with a Mastodon at his heels, her lamentations on the probable scarcity of coal in A.D. 16000, and her speculations on the first man in despite of the claim of Mr. O'Dowd to that position in her eyes, we understand the indignation of that gentleman for the persons whom he coolly styles 'outrageous humbugs.' Next, the parsons come in for a 'whipping,' or rather a peculiar section of them, and that not the high-and-dry divines of the old English quality. Afterwards the Emperor of the French is abused in a manner highly calculated to recoil with increased force on the calumniator. Banting, the butt of all wits, and the Palmerstonian Conservatives consume the remaining fire of Mr. O'Dowd's invectives.

The Public Schools Report is honoured by a concluding notice, embracing Winchester and Shrewsbury. Tony Butler has arrived at Part XV., and My latest Excursion' tourist carries us through the Austrian and Bavarian Alps. The tourist gets himself into uncomfortable complications in the geographical line, and the confusion is not diminished by a comparison of every mountain, town, or river with a Scotch representative.

'Armadale' in the Cornhill is even more sensational than the first number promised, and the irresistible force of destiny operates with increased energy. 'Allan Armadale' No. 1 in the second generation is hidden away with his mother in a remote village in Somersetshire, as far away from Barbadoes as possible. Nevertheless 'Allan Armadale' No. 2, bearing the euphonious title of Osias Midwinter, in the second generation is impelled to visit the village. The mother above mentioned has the most awful presentiments about Osias, towards whom her son Allan No. 1 conceives a violent attachment. Time passes, Osias leaves Somersetshire, and the Fates seem more gentle. But a mysterious woman in black and red turns up, and kills poor Mrs. Armadale outright with fear. Allan Armadale No. 1 stood next after Arthur Blanchard, Henry Blanchard, and a son of the last, as heir to the Thorpe Ambrose estates, value 8,000*l.* The woman in black and red jumps off a steamboat into the Thames, Arthur Blanchard jumps in after her, both are pulled out safe, the woman is put into a charitable institution and runs away, Arthur is put into a cab and dies of cold. The news is sent to Henry Blanchard and his son at Milan. They start for England, and are lost in the Alps. Allan Armadale No. 1 comes into possession of the big property. Osias and Allan go out yachting. Allan's tutor, Mr. Brock, is driven wild with suspicious dread of Osias. Midwinter confesses, by the production of the Wildbad letter, that he is Allan Armadale No. 2, and the curtain falls.

The article on the Bars of France and England, hung on the peg of M. Berryer's visit to London, is full of information, and the comparative position of the counsel in Westminster Hall and the avocats of the Palais de Justice is drawn with great truth. 'A Convict's Views of Penal Discipline' is a very queer affair. A perusal of the article gives the idea that, for a calm, serene, unvexed, and even pleasurable existence, there is nothing like penal servitude for twenty-one years, and that, too, not because convicts are too well treated, but for precisely the reason that a merchant likes his desk, or an attorney his abstracts of title—namely, because he is accustomed to them. The particular convict divides criminals into two classes—respectable men, who have committed some offence against the law for the first time in their lives; and professional thieves, born and brought up to the trade. For the first class he recommends short terms in model prisons; for the second class the only hope of reformation is the following plan:—Find a large tract of land, favourably situated for agriculture, and make arrangements as for a colony of poor emigrants. Send thither with all possible despatch, with no intervening term of imprisonment, your exile; keep him to his district; let him till his plot, paying you rent; set him to work directly, and never let him go home to England again. In fact, let him be free, but not at large, and, in course of time, let him bring over his wife, or get one if he can.

The Cornhill has also a pleasing sketch of Mr. John Leech, with some admirable illustrations, and a memoir of Giovanni Battista Niccolini. 'Wives and Daughters' is continued.

The ornament of Macmillan is the letter of the Rev. Frederick Denison Maurice to a colonial clergyman. The argument in favour of the present administration of ecclesiastical justice, as against Dr. Pusey's proposition of an ecclesiastical court of appeal, is based on an able summary of the struggles by which the supremacy of any ecclesiastical system, Romanist, Lutheran, Calvinistical, or Anglican, has been averted, while additional force is drawn from a consideration of the admitted faults of a combination of the lawgiver and the law administrator. Dr. Pusey's bid for a hustings cry which should pledge the Parliamentary candidates to 'the protection of the faith' is deservedly the object of a reprobation.

All the agencies (says Mr. Maurice) of a contested election, all the furious passions of the different parties of the land, all their most grovelling interests, are to be invoked for the purpose of exalting what is called the spiritual power above the secular. All questions concerning the improvement of the dwellings of the people, concerning their education, concerning the well-being of the myriads in India and in our colonies, are to be treated as nothing; the one question asked of every candidate is to be —'Sir, will you, or will you not, vote for the abolition of the present Court of Appeal in questions of doctrine?' . . . . Dr. Pusey says, 'It is a question of immortal souls.' It is, indeed! The souls of candidates, which may be made knavish and hypocritical by these engagements—the souls of electors, which may be drawn into drunkenness and ferocity, now as in former days, by the shriek of 'The Church in danger'—I believe no man is able to estimate. The whole system of pledges I hold to be an unconstitutional, immoral, godless one.

'Dead Men whom I have known' contains sketches of Dr. Chalmers, Dr. David Welsh, Wilson, the Professor of Moral Philosophy, Sir William Hamilton, and Jameson, the Mineralogist.

There are continuations of 'A Son of the Soil,' of 'The Hillyars and the Burtons' by Henry Kingsley, with two essays, one on the 'Influence of an Historical Idea,' apropos of Lord Stanley's inane wonder that the Italians should love and desire Rome, and the other by Lord Hobart on 'Intervention, Material and Moral.'

Fraser leads off with a very readable article on the present condition of Ireland. The processions on the 8th of August last in Dublin, instituted avowedly to inaugurate a monument to O'Connell, in reality to make a Catholic demonstration, the speeches made on that occasion by the Lord Mayor of Dublin and a Catholic archbishop, together with the riots in Belfast, induce the suspicion that the old days of agitation and public ruin are returning. The idea is confirmed by some statistical illustrations:—

For the first time since the Great Famine, the area of cultivation has diminished, production has been much reduced, and the value of its annual returns has fallen off in a like proportion. Over the whole of Ireland 5,970,139 acres were under crops in 1860; in 1863 there were only 5,666,179. The cereal produce of the first of these years was estimated at 10,953,613 quarters, of the last 8,705,338; nor does the difference measure the loss, as prices have fallen during the interval. So, too, the entire live stock of Ireland was valued in 1860 at 33,885,097*l.*; two years afterwards it had sunk to 31,204,325*l.* These losses have been estimated at an average of 9,000,000*l.* for three years, or 27,000,000*l.* in the whole; and their effects of course have reached all classes. Rents are paid with difficulty, or have fallen; land commands a lower price in the market; the commerce of the country is contracted; large sums, calculated at several millions, have been withdrawn from various deposits, in order to meet all kinds of engagements; there has been a great increase of insolvencies; and emigration has been suddenly stimulated. Nor have the poorer classes escaped, although they have suffered less in proportion. The number of persons relieved in 1860 was 179,514, and in 1862, 291,149, the population being 5,700,000; the criminal convictions of the first of these years were 3,531 cases, against 4,401 in the second; and the average of wages has, perhaps, decreased, though assuredly not to a great extent, throughout most of the labouring classes.

Yet hope is entertained that the evil symptoms are but the effect of four bad harvests, and will disappear with the return of kind seasons and full barns. The rotten condition of a society consisting of a population of cottiers, a mass of helpless pauperism, and an insolvent aristocracy of landlords, combined with agricultural misfortunes in the production of the crisis of 1846. Matters are widely different now:—

Those who recollect the Ireland of 1846 will appreciate this in its full significance. 16,000,000*l.* was the highest sum at which the failure of the potato was estimated at that disastrous period, while the losses of Ireland from 1860 to 1864 have been calculated at 27,000,000*l.* Yet the losses of 1846 produced a revolution in society without a parallel in modern history; those which Ireland has just experienced, although severe, have not been crushing, and doubtless will be easily got over.

It is proposed, among other reforms, to lighten the taxation, to accomplish the enjoyment of a larger expenditure of public money in Ireland, to abolish the Viceroyalty and the Established Church.

A review of 'Kaye's History of the Indian Mutiny' and 'Notes on Diplomacy and Diplomatic History' form the serious and practical portion of Fraser, while 'The Drama in Paris' and a review of Victor Hugo's Shakespeare supply the literary side. There is also an amusing article on 'Curiosities of the Patent Offices.'

The number concludes with a sharp replication to Mr. Christie's pretentious list of the Cambridge 'Apostles.' Fraser had spoken disparagingly of the action of that society as a body upon the intellectual history of England. Thereupon Mr. Christie in Macmillan's Magazine burst out with a gorgeous list of grand names taken from the roll of the society, including one which he took care to foist in of a young gentleman of some promise, who certainly as yet has not earned the title to rank with Macaulay, Hallam, and Gladstone, and demanded how, in the face of such a legion of luminaries, Fraser dare despise the Twelve. The answer is twofold. First, the denial of the merit of a society is not a denial of the merits of individuals who have once belonged to it. Second, societies of the style of the 'Apostles' tend to induce affectation, conceit, exclusiveness, and all other evils incidental to caste on a small scale. We await with some anxiety the rejoinder of the ex-Minister to Brazil.

A LINCOLNITE MANIFESTATION.

To the Editor of THE INDEX.

BRISTOL: December 5, 1864.

SIR,—The city of Bristol contains from half a score to half a hundred individuals who look upon Mr. Lincoln as the principal benefactor of the human race, and the Northern Government as the representative on earth of the highest principles of liberty, morality, and order. Elated with the success at the poll of the object of their worship, these few but active persons, having organised themselves into a General Committee of Universal Peace and Emancipation, determined to celebrate the auspicious election of the President of the once United States to the Presidency of the new Government of the Northern States, which is to come into existence on March 4, 1865. One Mr. Handel Cosham, whose very name breathed harmony and concord, was the leading spirit in the chorus of the messengers of goodwill. The Broadmead Rooms—which, by the way, are capable of holding no less than 3,000 persons—were hired by these ambitious spirits, doubtless under the idea that a 'spread-eagle' suitable to the occasion could not be performed in a more confined space. Unfortunately, it occurred to the mind of certain people, whom, probably, Mr. Handel Cosham would class as 'certain lewd fellows of the baser sort,' that it were a thousand pities that so large a vacuum should exist; and as there were but a half-score or half-hundred Federals whose presence might be expected, it only remained to gather Confederates and Neutrals to the number of 2,950. Loyal citizens would naturally be desirous that the Broadmead Rooms should be seen to advantage on so grand an occasion, and no good man of Bristol could object to the congregation, however much he might have wished for an addition to the numbers of either party. Handel Cosham and Co., with a shrewdness worthy of the nation which they admired, had foreseen the possibility of an admixture of the base and servile element, and had hit upon the device of charging a small sum, payable in coin, and not in greenbacks, for admission to the scene of the Lincolnite manifestation. Unfortunately, however, the people of Bristol judged that the fun would be well worth a few coppers, and came in unparalleled multitudes. About half an hour after the opening of the doors, the band of brethren, headed by Handel Cosham as bâtonnier, ascended the platform, and were received with an outburst of vocal music which partook of the character of the Southern yell of battle. Thereupon one George Powell, who rejoices in the sobriquet of 'The Working Man,' advanced to the front and proceeded to pronounce the word 'Gentlemen.' Immediately a furious shout was raised, cheers were echoed and reechoed for President Davis, while vehement groaning for 'Abe Lincoln' was heard. As the voices fell, the word 'Gentlemen' was again uttered. This time the talisman evoked a terrific cry of 'Stonewall Jackson for ever!' At length, after proposing in dumb show a chairman in the person of Algernon Warren, Esq., 'The Working Man' subsided, and up rose one Harris; but what he said no man can possibly know. Then the chairman raised aloft a placard, and at this sign 2,000 voices struck up 'We won't go home till morning,' the instrumental music being supplied by the clapping of hands and the beating of feet. At last the thought seemed to prevail that there had been talk enough, and that the time had arrived for action. Suddenly some 500 joined in a serried mass, and, with a tall grenadier at their head, prepared to carry the platform by assault. The word was given, and, with one shout of triumph, the position was scaled. Then a burly man, a second Daniel Lambert—a publican, too, and hater of teetotallers—advanced to Mr. Handel Cosham, who received the monster meekly, and demanded the coppers paid by him for admission, on the ground that he had come for the Handel oration and had not got it. Then the voices of the enemy sang 'I wish I was in Dixie,' gave cheers for General Lee, and howled out a parody on 'John Brown,' the burden of which was, 'Hang Abe Lincoln to a sour apple-tree.' Then one man proposed a vote of thanks to President Davis, with a vote of censure on the Cosham section, while others actually proceeded to make speeches in favour of the South. The shutting off of the gas brought the glorious manifestation to a sudden end, and night closed on the demoralised ranks of the half-hundred.

CALL OF THE GEORGIANS TO ARMS.—The following is General Beauregard's call on the people of Georgia:—'Corinth, November 18: To the people of Georgia: Arise for the defence of your native soil. Rally round our patriotic Governor and gallant soldiers. Obstruct and destroy all the roads in Sherman's front, flank, and rear, and his army will soon starve in your midst. Be confident, be resolute, trust in an overruling Providence, and success will soon crown your efforts. I hasten to join you in the defence of your homes and firesides.—(Signed) G. T. BEAUREGARD.'—The following address to the Georgians had also been issued:—'Richmond, November 19.—To the People of Georgia: We have had a special conference with President Davis and the Secretary of War, and we are able to assure you that they have done, and are still doing, all that can be done to meet the emergency that presses upon you. Let every man fly to arms. Remove negroes, horses, cattle, and provisions, from Sherman's army, and burn all you cannot carry. Burn all the bridges, and block up the roads in his route. Assail the invader in the front, flank, and rear by night, and by day let him have no rest.—Signed by Julian Hartridge, Mark Blandford, J. A. Reynolds, General N. Luster, and others.' Senator Hill, of Georgia, had likewise issued the following address to the people of the State:—'Richmond, Virginia, Nov. 18.—To the people of Georgia: You have now the best opportunity ever presented to you to destroy the enemy. Put everything at the disposal of our general, remove all provisions from the path of the invaders, and put all obstructions you can in his way. Every citizen with his gun, and every negro with his axe and spade, can do the work of a good soldier. You can destroy the enemy by retarding his march. Georgians, be firm, act promptly, and fear not. (Signed) D. H. HILL.—I most cordially approve of the above, JAS. A. SEDDON, Secretary of War.'

THE CONFEDERATE CAUSE IN FRANCE.

FROM A CONFEDERATE CORRESPONDENT.

PARIS: December 7.

THE rumours of peace which have been circulated in the North by certain over-credulous newsmongers have during the past week formed the subject of comment with the Paris press.

The Baron de Bazancourt, in La France, has correctly estimated this question of peace between the North and the South. He doubts if these rumours have any foundation in truth, and, even supposing such to be the case, is of opinion that any peace proposal having for its basis the return of the South to the Union would not be accepted.

The South (he remarks) has not sacrificed everything—the last dollar of its public and private fortunes, the last child in each of its families, torn from the domestic hearth to bear arms and fight; it has not accepted the complete ruin of its dearest interests, by the wreck of which it is surrounded, that it may return to the Union by walking over the many corpses of its countrymen which mark the route that must for ever separate it from the Cabinet of Washington.

According to M. de Bazancourt, there is but one way for the reestablishment of peace, and that is an appeal to the vote of the populations, of those, namely, of the South. Their wishes, freely expressed, should be respected, whether they be in favour of separation or of union.

Should this vote be against you (he says to the North), it will be in the name of the indefeasible right of the liberty of States and of citizens that it will address you; and in face of such a resolution, thus legally expressed, you will fulfil your duty as Republicans by your assent. Otherwise, be not mistaken, you will have either an interminable war or a spurious peace, based only upon violence and exhaustion.

The Nation discovers another method for remedying the present situation—that of according to the South the same representation in the Union as the North, so that it might at all times protect its interests. The Nation has referred more than once to this plan, which, however, it has not yet clearly explained. If I understand it rightly, it would consist of a sort of union formed of two distinct confederations, that of the North and that of the South. There is, perhaps, something good in this idea; it certainly furnishes the only basis on which it is possible to conceive of any conjunction being effected between them.

The Presse, whose opinions on the American question have so often varied, seems to be quite ready at the present moment to join chorus with Le Temps and L'Opinion Nationale, and to proclaim Mr. Lincoln as a great man. The chief of the executive, the Secretary of State, and even Mr. Butler, 'who has been represented as a very bugbear of tyranny, ferocity, and dishonesty,' all speak of conciliation; why, then, should not the North and South be reconciled? Where are the objections? There are none. The North states that it desires the reestablishment of the Union on the footing of perfect equality; the South may accept this 'honourably and with advantage.' But will it be said, their political convictions will then be sacrificed? All nonsense! 'Is not this a sacrifice which parties are compelled to make even in the best organised countries? If it were necessary to make war for a political programme, England herself would be in arms.'

Thus, after having for more than three years past acquainted the readers of La Presse with the various changes which this gigantic American contest has assumed; after having expressed himself in terms of the warmest and most generous sympathy toward the South; after having, with a rare penetration and insight, appreciated the skilful military operations of Lee, M. Chatard now finds that the South is fighting for a political programme!

The Pays does not believe in conciliation between the North and the South, still less in the possibility of the latter being subdued even by ruin and exhaustion. It reminds its readers that at one period of French history, the only money possessed by France was assignats; that her armies marched having neither shoes nor bread; and that in addition to this, civil war, a scourge from which the Southern States have been preserved, was tearing her breast. Nevertheless, France willed to be free, and free she became. Besides, observes Le Pays, if the South is impoverished the North is ruined; it expends more than it produces, whilst the expenditure of the South is less than its production. It is therefore useless to reckon upon the exhaustion of the South, but rather, and solely, upon Divine Providence, for the cessation of the war.

The official text of Earl Russell's reply to the Confederate Commissioners has been published in all the journals. The Patrie and La France joke on the words, 'formerly united,' applied to the American Republic, and consider the expression as highly disagreeable to the North.

From this phrase (says La France), it is evident that the English Government acknowledges that the old Union has ceased to exist. After the recent Presidential election, one cannot, in truth, arrive at any other conclusion.

The Patrie finds in this expression an additional confirmation of the argument which it has several times maintained—namely, that Mr. Lincoln had no longer any right to the title of President of the United States.

M. Aucaigne, of the Patrie, embracing the opportunity furnished him by the publication of a new edition of De Tocqueville's excellent work, 'Democracy in America,' has sought to find in this masterly production—which is, indeed, a kind of gospel on American policy—the confirmation of the ideas which he defends with such ability and energy in La Patrie. Well, after having again refreshed his powers from this inexhaustible source, after having controlled his opinions by the light of the arguments of that great thinker, he has stated, with a satisfaction of which he may well be proud, that not one of his ideas would be rejected by De Tocqueville, that that great mind had foreseen the separation of the Union, and that he acknowledged the right of the States to break the Federal compact. This article by M. Aucaigne is very interesting and full of instruction.

I would direct your attention to a very interesting and curious article; it is a political chit-chat by the witty writer of Le Courrier du Dimanche, Alfred Assolant. M. Assolant never treats political questions excepting in a jocose way; but notwithstanding his jocularity he is still very serious and thoughtful. It is he who wrote the only article expressing sympathy with the Southern cause that has ever appeared in Le Courrier du Dimanche.

The chit-chat to which I refer turns upon Mexico, and the following extract will enable you to judge whether or not this political question is rightly understood by M. Assolant.

We must not deceive ourselves. War with the United States is inevitable. At the present time Lincoln is silent, and conceals his future policy in order not to occasion a rupture with France, which would secure both the victory and the separation of the South; but as soon as peace shall be established both parties will unite themselves against the Emperor of Mexico, and this new war will probably be the pledge of their reconciliation. Think for a moment that the Yankees will have to disband an army of 700,000 or 800,000 veterans (a burden at all times dangerous for a republic); and of this immense number two or three hundred thousand, or more, have come from Europe, having in America neither wife, child, nor relations; that they possess an aptitude for war, a love for adventure, and that Mexico will afford them a prey. In a fortnight Maximilian will be dethroned by them, if, indeed, he is not dethroned by his own subjects. . . . . Provided that, after having placed him on this throne, we have not the chivalric notion of replacing him there! On that day we shall have a rough task to perform; and we may have to institute the fund, not of Public Works, but of the Consolidated Dynasties—for we shall have no end of friends to succour, not to mention the Emperor of the Aztecs.

What wit! and also, what good sense!

MANCHESTER OPERATIVES AND THE COTTON FAMINE.

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

MANCHESTER: December 7, 1864.

ON Saturday afternoon an open-air public meeting of cotton operatives, employed or unemployed, was held in Stevenson Square, for the purpose, according to the placard convening the assembly, of taking into consideration the present condition of the cotton districts, and proposing some mode of terminating the distress.

Mr. J. J. Finnigan, a person who has identified himself for many years as a representative and spokesman of his class, was called on to preside. He reminded the people that, at the commencement of the cotton crisis consequent on the American war, a meeting of Manchester operatives was held in that very square, to lay before Parliament and the country their opinions as to what would follow in the northern counties if the strife then newly begun in America was permitted to go on. Unfortunately, that struggle had been continued, and experience had only too sharply proved the correctness of their apprehensions. At the meeting referred to, he took a prominent part in the proceedings, and he exonerated at that time the British Government from any blame on account of the impending distress, for he believed it arose out of circumstances beyond their control. It was therefore the business of all classes to unite in a brotherly spirit, and attempt to mitigate the severity of that calamity. He himself, in his humble capacity, proposed some plans which were substantially adopted, one of them being the establishment of a Board of Relief to cooperate with the local Board of Guardians in the collection and distribution of charitable funds. At that time, now nearly three years ago, it was urged upon the Government to reduce the duties on manufactured goods imported to India, as an expedient, so far as it would go, for setting some of the mills at work in the cotton districts, and in that way alleviating some portion of the distress. A public meeting was called to consider that object, and he happened to be one of those who were appointed to wait on Sir Charles Wood; and he must say this of Sir Charles, that, although he withheld any such encouragement from a deputation of merchants on the same subject, to the cotton operatives he said that so soon as the time came he would take steps to reduce the taxation complained of. All things considered, it was now high time for another deputation to go to London, not to Sir Charles Wood, but to Lord Palmerston, and call upon the Government to redeem the promise made three years ago by the head of the India House Department; for if that were successfully done, it would go some way towards removing the necessity of relief committees, and restoring the cotton operatives to the position they had lost. The time had also come when some decided steps should be taken to bring about peace in that unhappy country whose dissensions were the immediate cause of the cotton famine, and the prolongation of whose war meant simply the prolongation of distress. It was quite true we had no business to concern ourselves with the internal politics of North and South, but it was equally true we were concerned with what might be called the home politics of 'bread and cheese,' and he held that to be a good argument for offering friendly counsels to the belligerent parties. We had looked on—or, as it was said, 'stood on one side'—while the two sections of our kinsmen attempted to adjust their differences, and the consequence had been four years of the most frightful warfare the world had ever beheld. He would add, however, that, among other extraordinary circumstances attending the struggle, an amount of bravery had been displayed that made us pity the wretched cause in which it was shown. The prevailing elements of the people, North and South, were Celt and Saxon, and Celt and Saxon united could never be conquered, although they might be mutually destroyed. Such, therefore, being the parties to that desperate warfare, and so fruitless and endless being the contest, he considered that the operatives of Lancashire should call for assistance from the Powers of Europe to undertake the office of mediating between the belligerents, partly as it was our duty to endeavour to stop a war that was desolating one of the fairest portions of the earth, and partly that one of the great interests of our own country might no longer remain swallowed up. (The chairman concluded his observations amid general cheering.)

Mr. J. Matthew (Manchester), in moving the first resolution, said that the present head of the India House, instead of redeeming his promise made on the 18th of July, 1862, had done the very reverse, and this notwithstanding all arguments to the contrary, for the fact had been proved that the duty on manufactured goods exported to India could have been safely removed. It was a duty they owed to themselves, their wives and families, to work for the attainment of that object until their chimneys ceased to be 'smokeless,' and until the necessity was removed for committees and boards of guardians to administer relief to unwilling paupers. While he desired peace, he did not desire it on 'any price' principles, but for the sake of his fellow-men at home and abroad. He was not the advocate either of North or of South, and the meeting, as he apprehended, had no connection with the friends of either party. He concluded by moving the following resolution:—

That this meeting memorialise Lord Palmerston for the immediate and total repeal of all duties now levied on all cotton goods and yarns imported into British India; that such memorial be signed by the chairman on behalf of such meeting; that a deputation be appointed to present the memorial to his Lordship; and that a request be made to the two members for this city, and also those for the county, to accompany such deputation and support their prayer.

Mr. K. Smith (Oldham), in seconding the motion, referred to the amount of distress now prevailing, and added that if Lord Palmerston, who, as he took it, was Sir Charles Wood's 'master,' did not 'do something for the country, the country would do something for themselves.'

The resolution was carried without opposition.

Mr. M. Grimshaw (Manchester) then moved the following resolution:—

That, in consequence of the wide-spread distress now prevailing in the cotton districts through the continuance of the war in America, this meeting is desirous that Her Majesty's Government should use their influence, along with France and other European Powers, to bring the belligerents together, in order to stop the vast destruction of life and property now going on in that unhappy country.

In support of that resolution the speaker said he was not a 'Union and Emancipation' man, nor, for the matter of that, was he a member of the Southern Independence Association. He believed that, but for so much injudicious encouragement by 'John Bright' and others, the Yankees would have discontinued the war long ago. It was also certain that, if real neutrality had been shown by our Government, the Southerners would have been in a position to have 'wrung independence' from their oppressors before now. Our own look-out was getting worse from day to day. The funds of the Manchester Committee and the Mansion-House Committee were getting rapidly exhausted. The operatives must have read the recent resolutions adopted in King Street, of a sufficiently stringent character to keep a little 'brass' in hand. But what was the meaning of that? The resolution was reasonable enough, but it meant that public charity was failing, although the need of it appeared greater and more enduring than ever. It was evident the people were tired of subscribing—a fact which was amply proved by the smallness of the funds now coming in, compared with the thousands that were so nobly given at the beginning of the distress. What, then, were they to do? If some remedy were not forthcoming, and that soon, they would not only be pauperised, but starved. If the Government would do nothing, let the people themselves send a messenger to Washington and Richmond to represent the condition of the operatives of the cotton districts, and advocate peace. He maintained the cotton operatives had a right to be heard on the question, as thousands and tens of thousands of them had been quickly reduced to a state of pauperism and starvation.

Mr. S. Mills (Rochdale), in seconding the resolution, said the meeting had nothing to do with John Bright or Goldwin Smith, who had written and spoken 'all they knew' in encouragement of the American war. He believed if the working-men of Manchester, or any other city or town in the cotton districts, were canvassed, a vast majority would be found in favour of a separation of the States and the independence of the South. He could see no other end of the war. If that was so, why not have peace at once? (A voice: 'Peace at any price?') Yes, at any price such a peace could cost. Besides, if 'peace at any price' was good in 1854, it ought to be at least as good in 1864. The present war was unjust, and therefore the sooner it was ended the better.

Prior to the motion being put, the following amendment was proposed to the meeting amid great disturbance and uproar:—

That this meeting is of opinion that the Government of this country has pursued a wise and politic course in maintaining a strict neutrality between the two belligerents now waging war in America, and it trusts that such neutrality will be maintained until the war be brought to a close.

The amendment having been seconded, was put to the meeting and declared to be lost, followed by much jeering from the crowd, and such expressions as 'Who wants to be starved?' 'Live, horse, and you'll get grass,' &c.

The resolution was accordingly carried, and the meeting peaceably dispersed.

Manifesto of the Confederate States.

MANY applications have been made for copies of the Confederate Manifesto. We therefore republish it, together with the letter of the Confederate Commissioners and Earl Russell's reply. We also publish some resolutions that have lately been introduced into the Confederate Congress.

JOINT RESOLUTIONS DECLARING THE DISPOSITIONS, PRINCIPLES, AND PURPOSES OF THE CONFEDERATE STATES IN RELATION TO THE EXISTING WAR WITH THE UNITED STATES.

Whereas: It is due to the great cause of humanity and civilisation, and especially to the heroic sacrifices of their gallant army in the field, that no means, consistent with a proper self-respect and the approved usages of nations, should be omitted by the Confederate States to enlighten the public opinion of the world with regard to the true character of the struggle in which they are engaged, and the dispositions, principles, and purposes by which they are actuated; therefore,

Resolved by the Congress of the Confederate States of America: That the following manifesto be issued in their name, and by their authority, and that the President be requested to cause copies thereof to be transmitted to our Commissioners abroad, to the end that the same may be laid before foreign Governments.

Manifesto of the Congress of the Confederate States of America relative to the existing War with the United States.

The Congress of the Confederate States of America, acknowledging their responsibility to the opinion of the civilised world, to the great law of Christian philanthropy, and to the Supreme Ruler of the Universe, for the part they have been compelled to bear in the sad spectacle of war and carnage which this continent has, for the last three years, exhibited to the eyes of afflicted humanity, deem the present a fitting occasion to declare the principles, the sentiments, and the purposes by which they have been, and are still, actuated.

They have ever deeply deplored the necessity which constrained them to take up arms in defence of their rights, and of the free institutions derived from their ancestors; and there is nothing they more ardently desire than peace, whensoever their enemy, by ceasing from the unhallowed war waged upon them, shall permit them to enjoy in peace the sheltering protection of those hereditary rights and those cherished institutions. The series of successes with which it has pleased Almighty God in so signal a manner to bless our arms on almost every point of our invaded border since the opening of the present campaign enables us to profess this desire of peace in the interest of civilisation and humanity, without danger of having our motives misinterpreted, of the declaration being ascribed to any unmanly sentiment or any mistrust of our ability fully to maintain our cause. The repeated and disastrous checks, foreshadowing ultimate discomfiture, which their gigantic army, erected against the capital of the Confederacy, has already met with, are but a continuation of the same providential successes for us. We do not refer to these successes in any spirit of vain boasting, but in humble acknowledgment of that Almighty protection which has vouchsafed and granted them.

The world must now see that eight millions of people, inhabiting so extensive a territory, with such varied resources and such numerous facilities for defence as the benignant bounty of nature has bestowed upon us, and animated with one spirit to encounter every privation and sacrifice of ease, of health, of property, of life itself, rather than be degraded from the condition of free and independent States, into which they were born, can never be conquered. Will not our adversaries themselves begin to feel that humanity has bled long enough; that tears and blood and treasure enough have been expended in a bootless undertaking, covering their own land, no less than ours, with a pall of mourning, and exposing them far more than ourselves to the catastrophe of financial exhaustion and bankruptcy, not to speak of the loss of their liberties by the despotism engendered in an aggressive warfare upon the liberties of another and kindred people? Will they be willing, by a longer perseverance in a wanton and hopeless contest, to make this continent, which they so long boasted to be the chosen abode of liberty and self-government, of peace and a higher civilisation, the theatre of the most causeless and prodigal effusion of blood which the world has ever seen, of a virtual relapse into the barbarism of the ruder ages, and of the destruction of constitutional freedom by the lawlessness of usurped power?

These are questions which our adversaries will decide for themselves. We desire to stand acquitted before the tribunal of the world, as well as in the eyes of omniscient justice, of any responsibility for the origin or prolongation of a war as contrary to the spirit of the age as to the traditions and acknowledged maxims of the political system of America.

On this Continent, whatever opinions may have prevailed elsewhere, it has ever been held and acknowledged by all parties, that government, to be lawful, must be founded on the consent of the governed. We were forced to dissolve our Federal connection with our former associates by their aggressions on the fundamental principles of our compact of union with them; and in doing so we exercised a right consecrated in the great charter of American liberty—the right of a free people, when a Government proves destructive of the ends for which it was established, to recur to the original principles, and to institute new guards for their security. The separate independence of the States, as the sovereign and coequal members of the Federal Union, had never been surrendered, and the pretension of applying to independent communities, so constituted and organised, the ordinary rules for coercing and reducing rebellious subjects to obedience was a solecism in terms, as well as an outrage on the principles of public law.

The war made upon the Confederate States was, therefore, wholly one of aggression. On our side it has been strictly defensive. Born freemen and the descendants of a gallant ancestry, we had no option but to stand up in defence of our invaded firesides, of our desecrated altars, of our violated liberties and birthright, and of the prescriptive institutions which guard and protect them. We have not interfered, nor do we wish in any manner whatever to interfere, with the internal peace and prosperity of the States arrayed in hostility against us, or with the freest development of their destinies in any form of action or line of policy they may think proper to adopt for themselves. All we ask is a like immunity for ourselves, and to be left in the undisturbed enjoyment of those inalienable rights of 'life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness,' which our common ancestors declared to be the equal heritage of all the parties to the social compact.

Let them forbear aggressions upon us, and the war is at an end. If there be questions which require adjustment by negotiation, we have ever been willing, and are still willing, to enter into communication with our adversaries in a spirit of peace, equity, and manly frankness. Strong in the persuasion of the justice of our cause, in the gallant devotion of our citizen soldiers, and of the whole body of our people, and above all in the gracious protection of Heaven, we are not afraid to avow a sincere desire for peace on terms consistent with our honour and the permanent security of our rights, and an earnest aspiration to see the world once more restored to the beneficent pursuits of industry and of mutual intercourse and exchanges so essential to its well-being, and which have been so gravely interrupted by the existence of this unnatural war in America.

But if our adversaries, or those whom they have placed in authority—deaf to the voice of reason and justice—steeled to the dictates of both prudence and humanity by a presumptuous and delusive confidence in their own numbers, or those of their black and foreign mercenaries, shall determine upon an indefinite prolongation of the contest, upon them be the responsibility of a decision so ruinous to themselves and so injurious to the interest and repose of mankind.

For ourselves, we have no fear of the result. The wildest picture ever drawn by a disordered imagination comes short of the extravagance which could dream of the conquest of eight millions of people, resolved with one mind 'to die freemen rather than live slaves,' and forewarned by the savage and exterminating spirit in which this war has been waged upon them, and by the mad avowals of its patrons and supporters, of the worse than Egyptian bondage that awaits them in the event of their subjugation. With these declarations of our dispositions, our principles, and our purposes, we commit our cause to the enlightened judgment of the world, to the sober reflection of our adversaries themselves, and to the solemn and righteous arbitrament of Heaven.

The following is the joint note addressed to the French Minister of Foreign Affairs by the diplomatic representatives of the Confederate Government abroad, transmitting an official copy of the manifesto of the Congress of the Confederate States. An identical note has been addressed to the principal Governments of Western Europe.

Paris, November 11, 1864.

To His Excellency M. Drouyn de Lhuys, Minister of Foreign Affairs.

Sir,—The undersigned Commissioners of the Confederate States of America, in pursuance of the instructions of their Government, have the honour to present to your Excellency a copy of a manifesto issued by the Congress of said States with the approval of the President, and of which the President was requested to cause copies to be transmitted to their Commissioners abroad, to the end that the same might be by them laid before foreign Governments; they at the same time communicate a copy of the preamble and resolutions of Congress accompanying said manifesto.

The dispositions, principles, and purposes by which the Confederate States have been and are still animated, are set forth in this paper with all the authority due to the solemn declarations of the legislative and executive branches of their Government, and with a clearness which leaves no room for comment or explanation. In a few sentences it is pointed out that 'all they ask is immunity from interference with their internal peace and prosperity, and to be left in the undisturbed enjoyment of their inalienable rights of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, which their common ancestry declared to be the equal heritage of all parties to the social compact. Let them forbear aggressions upon us, and the war is at an end. If there be questions which require adjustment by negotiation, they have ever been willing, and are still willing, to enter into communication with their adversaries in a spirit of equity and manly frankness, and commit their cause to the enlightened judgment of the world, to the sober reflection of their adversaries themselves, and to the solemn and righteous arbitrament of Heaven.'

The undersigned beg leave most respectfully to invite the attention of the Government of his Imperial Majesty to this frank and full explanation of the attitude and purposes of the Confederate States, and will merely remark in addition, that since the issuing of that manifesto the war has continued to be waged by our enemies with even increased ferocity, a more signal disregard of all the rules of civilised warfare, and more wanton violation of the obligations of international law.

The undersigned, having thus complied with the instructions of their Government, beg to assure your Excellency of the distinguished consideration with which they have the honour to be,

Your Excellency's most obedient servants,

(Signed) JOHN SLIDELL.
J. M. MASON.
A. DUDLEY MANN.

A similar document, with the necessary changes, has been presented to all the Cabinets of Europe (Constantinople excepted). Mr. Slidell has handed in person to M. Drouyn de Lhuys the above. Bishop Lynch will hand to the Pope the copy intended for him.

EARL RUSSELL'S REPLY.

Foreign Office: November 25, 1864.

Gentlemen,—I have had the honour to receive the copy which you have sent me of the manifesto issued by the Congress of the so-called Confederate States of America.

Her Majesty's Government deeply lament the protracted nature of the struggle between the Northern and Southern States of the formerly United Republic of North America.

Great Britain has since 1783 remained, with the exception of a short period, connected by friendly relations with both the Northern and the Southern States. Since the commencement of the civil war, which broke out in 1861, Her Majesty's Government have continued to entertain sentiments of friendship equally for the North and the South. Of the causes of the rupture Her Majesty's Government have never presumed to judge; they deplore the commencement of this sanguinary struggle, and anxiously look forward to the period of its termination. In the meantime they are convinced that they best consult the interests of peace, and respect the rights of all parties, by observing a strict and impartial neutrality. Such a neutrality Her Majesty has faithfully maintained, and will continue to maintain.

I request you, Gentlemen, to accept the assurances of the very high consideration with which

I have the honour to be, Gentlemen,
Your most obedient, humble servant,
RUSSELL.

John Slidell, Esq., J. M. Mason, Esq., and
A. Dudley Mann, Esq., &c. &c. &c.

The following resolutions were introduced in the Confederate Congress on November 18, by Mr. Henry, Senator from Tennessee:—

JOINT RESOLUTIONS DEFINING THE POSITION OF THE CONFEDERATE STATES, AND DECLARING THE DETERMINATION OF THE CONGRESS AND THE PEOPLE THEREOF TO PROSECUTE THE WAR TILL THEIR INDEPENDENCE IS ACKNOWLEDGED.

Resolved, by the Congress of the Confederate States of America: That the people of the Confederate States are endowed by their Creator with the inalienable rights of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness; that to secure these high rights governments were instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed, and, whenever any government becomes destructive of these ends, it is the right of the people to alter or abolish it, and to substitute a new government, laying its foundation on such principles and organising its powers in such form as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness; that on these principles, embodied in the Declaration of American Independence, the United Colonies, in 1776, dissolved the connection that bound them to the Government of Great Britain, and on them the Confederate States have severed the bonds of that political union which connected them with the people and the Government of the United States of America, rather than submit to the repeated injuries inflicted upon them by that people, and to the usurpations of that Government, all of which had the direct object to deprive them of their rights, rob them of property secured to them by constitutional guarantees, and to establish an absolute tyranny over these States.

Resolved: That the Confederate States appealed to arms in defence of these rights, and to establish these principles, only after they had in vain conjured the people and the Government of the United States, by all the ties of a common kindred, to discountenance and discontinue these injuries and usurpations, and after they had petitioned for redress in the most appropriate terms, and received in answer only a repetition of insults and injuries, which foreshadowed usurpations still more dangerous to liberty.

Resolved: That after nearly four years of cruel, desolating, and unnatural war, in which the people of the Confederate States have unquestionably established their capacity for self-government, and their ability to resist the attempts of the enemy to subjugate them, this Congress does not hesitate to aver its sincere desire for peace, and to that end proclaims to the world the readiness of the Government of the Confederate States to open negotiations to establish a permanent and honourable peace between the Confederate States and the United States, upon the basis of the separate independence of the former.

Resolved: That the time has come when the Confederate Congress, in the name of the people of the Confederate States, deem it proper again to proclaim to the world their unalterable determination to be free, and that they do not abate one jot of their high resolve to die freemen rather than live slaves; and further, if the people of the United States, by reelecting Abraham Lincoln, mean to tender to them four years more of war, or reunion with them on any terms, deeply deprecating the dire necessity so wantonly thrust upon them, and relying upon the justice of their cause and the gallantry of their soldiers, they accept the gage of battle, and leave the result to the righteous arbitrament of Heaven.

Resolved: That in view of the determination of the enemy to prosecute this horrid war still further, against which the Confederate States have at all times protested, and which the enemy have waged with extraordinary vigour, and which has been marked by acts of extraordinary atrocity, in violation of the usages of civilised warfare, the Congress of the Confederate States will, from this hour, dedicate themselves anew to the great cause of self-defence against the combined tyranny of the enemy. That it shall no longer be the momentary occupation of the Congress and the people of the Confederate States, but the business of their lives, to gather together the entire strength of the country in men and material of war, and put it forth, as with the will of one man, and with an unconquerable determination to defend their altars and their firesides till the last votary of freedom falls around them.

AFFAIRS FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

WEDNESDAY EVENING.

MONEY AND DISCOUNT MARKET.

THE money market has fluctuated in appearance a good deal, but the rate has not tended permanently upwards. There has been sufficient strength in quotations to show that at present no hope of a reduction exists. Hence it is now pretty well imagined that rates will remain quiet at 6¾ to 7 per cent. throughout the remainder of the year. If the terms of 6 per cent. were to rule the last fortnight in December, it would give the final liquidation of accounts a better chance, and might assist a few weak firms over impending difficulties. There is, however, little prospect of a variation, since the late remittances to Egypt and India have produced an amount of caution both in the Bank parlour and among the bankers and discounting community, indicating that they are prepared to support the quotations. The next weekly statements of the Bank of France and of the Bank of England will, it is assumed, be satisfactory; but it would not take a large drain at the present juncture to reduce the bullion to such a point, that either establishment might at a moment have to place the quotation higher. One circumstance in favour of the money market here is the gradual reduction in the value of discount on the Continent. Acting in sympathy with the late reduction in London and Paris, this tendency proves that the pressure throughout the leading cities in Europe has abated, and that events are turning in a more encouraging channel. The crisis, such as it has been, may be considered to have passed; but, although a few houses may yet, perhaps, have to succumb through exhausted resources, no general return of financial stringency is likely to be immediately experienced. On the Stock Exchange money has been more in demand at rates varying from 5 to 6 per cent.

BULLION AND SPECIE MOVEMENTS.

The bullion market is not in a very satisfactory position at the present moment, the withdrawals from the Bank being largely in excess of the amount sent in, and it is expected that further sums have yet to be taken for transhipment abroad. The amount sent in this week has been only 9,000*l.*, whilst the withdrawals have reached 310,000*l.* The arrivals of specie have been to a moderate extent only, viz. 198,402*l.*, of which 26,668*l.* was from Melbourne, and the remainder from New York; and the Borussia from the same quarter, which may be daily expected, will bring a further sum of 240,000*l.* The last packet for the East took out 114,362*l.*, of which 113,460*l.* was in silver and 892*l.* in gold. The proportions were—to India,

10,892*l.*; China and the Straits, 87,400*l.*; and Alexandria, 16,000*l.* The silver market is rather quiet, the bars brought by the last West India packet has been sold at $61\frac{5}{8}$d. per oz., being an advance on previous sales of $\frac{5}{8}$d. Mexican dollars are without change.

HOME AND FOREIGN SECURITIES.

The market for the English Funded Securities has not been particularly animated during the week, business being to a considerable extent restrained through the gold movements at the Bank, which, since the last reduction in the rate, has had the effect of inducing withdrawals on a rather more extended scale, whilst the amounts sent in are only trifling. To-day, however, there has been a slightly better feeling, and prices have slightly improved, and the market closed with firmness. In foreign securities the chief excitement has been in Spanish, in which a considerable business has been transacted, but prices have again receded in consequence of doubts being entertained as to the bona fides of the Spanish Government in carrying out the arrangements for the settlement of the debt. Greek and Mexican have also been fairly dealt in at steady quotations. The closing prices this evening were, Consols for money, $89\frac{1}{8}$ to $89\frac{1}{4}$ ex div. and for the January account, $89\frac{5}{8}$ ex div., which is a rise during the week of $\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. Exchequer bills are rather lower, being now quoted 7*s.* to 2*s.* dis. Greek stock is unaltered at $22\frac{1}{2}$ to 23. Mexican, $29\frac{3}{8}$ to $29\frac{5}{8}$, being an improvement of $\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. Spanish Passives have receded $1\frac{1}{2}$, and the Certificates $1\frac{1}{8}$ per cent., the respective prices now being $31\frac{3}{4}$ to 32, and $14\frac{1}{8}$ to $14\frac{3}{8}$. Turkish Six per Cents. of 1854 are $87\frac{1}{2}$ to $88\frac{1}{2}$, being a rise of $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., but those of 1862 have declined $\frac{1}{4}$, being now at 71 to $71\frac{1}{2}$.

AMERICAN SECURITIES.

The recent advices from New York have had the effect of slightly improving the tone of the market for American Government and railway securities. The dealings have been rather more numerous than for the last few weeks, and prices in most instances are a shade firmer. There, however, still continues a total absence of speculation. The official record of the dealings show Maryland to have been dealt in at 66; United States Six per Cents. of 1882, at 43, $42\frac{1}{2}$, 43, $43\frac{1}{4}$, and 43; Virginia State Six per Cents., at 27, $27\frac{1}{2}$, 28, 27, and $28\frac{1}{2}$; Atlantic and Great Western Railway, New York Section, first mortgage, at 72; ditto ditto Pennsylvania Section, first mortgage, at $70\frac{3}{4}$, 71, and $70\frac{3}{4}$; ditto ditto, second ditto, at 68; Erie, $100 shares, all paid, at 40; Illinois Central, $100 shares, $90 paid, at 46; ditto ditto, all paid, at 51, $51\frac{1}{2}$, 51, $51\frac{1}{4}$, $51\frac{1}{2}$, 51, $51\frac{1}{2}$, and $51\frac{1}{4}$; Michigan Central 8 per cent., at 52; and Panama Railway, second mortgage, at 102, $102\frac{1}{2}$, $102\frac{1}{4}$, and 102.

CONFEDERATE COTTON LOAN.

The market for this security has been dull during the week, and the price has declined under the influence of the accounts regarding Sherman's progress. The closing quotation is 57 to 59.

IMPORTS FROM THE CONFEDERATE STATES.

MERCANTILE SUSPENSIONS.

The following suspensions have taken place since our last number:—Messrs. Wilson, Bowles, and Co., East India and Mauritius merchants, liabilities about 250,000*l.*, the greater part of which is covered by securities; Messrs. Eyles, Evans, Hands, and Wells, liabilities about 200,000*l.*; Messrs. Hutter, Drouhet, and Co., merchants, of Gracechurch Street, liabilities about 30,000*l.*; Messrs. John Peakman and Co., of Birmingham, in the copper trade, liabilities not stated, but they are not large. Advices from Liverpool mention that a statement of the affairs of Hodgson, Mather, and Co., merchants, who recently failed, was laid before their creditors on Tuesday. The open liabilities were shown to be over 280,000*l.*, the assets under 8,000*l.*

THE COURSE OF THE PRODUCE MARKETS.

In nearly all kinds of produce transactions continue to be regulated almost entirely by the requirements of the present period, the uncertainty overhanging the money market tending to strengthen the general desire to keep operations within moderate limits as the end of the year approaches. Imports are still light, and as the clearances, both for consumption and export, are satisfactory, stocks, with very few exceptions, are not increasing materially. There is consequently nothing to induce any pressure of sales, and prices remain without much variation; but, as usually is the case in dull times, the tendency is rather downward than otherwise. The cotton market during the last few days has been somewhat unsettled, and without much activity, prices fluctuating about $\frac{1}{2}$d. per lb. Jute, which has for some time past in a great measure followed the course of the cotton market, has become dull of sale. At the auctions to-day prices were in some cases 5*s.* to 10*s.* per ton lower. Hemp is also quoted easier. Clean St. Petersburg 30*l.* to 32*l.* 10*s.*, and roping Manilla 25*l.* to 27*l.* 10*s.* per ton. Most descriptions of dye goods continue very firm, and for middling to good Honduras silver cochineal, quotations are again 1*d.* to 2*d.* per lb. higher. Shellac has declined 5*s.* to 7*s.* 6*d.* per cwt., in consequence of increased supplies. Cutch at 23*s.* to 23*s.* 6*d.* per cwt., or rather dearer. The oil trade is quiet. Linseed oil has receded to 33*s.* 6*d.* on the spot. Pale rape is not in large supply, and has advanced to 46*s.* 6*d.* and 47*s.* Sperm is quoted nominally 62*l.* to 65*l.* per tun, the lower price being for American, and the higher for colonial fishing. Petroleum meets a ready sale at the advanced price of 2*s.* 1*d.* to 2*s.* $1\frac{1}{2}$d. per gallon for American refined. In metals the business passing is limited, and quotations are in some cases barely maintained. Scotch pig iron closes 50*s.* $4\frac{1}{2}$d. cash. English pig lead common brands 20*l.* 5*s.* to 20*l.* 10*s.* Spelter 21*l.*, and Straits tin cash 92*l.* to 92*l.* 10*s.* per ton. The grain trade still progresses slowly, with scarcely any change in prices. The provision markets are rather firm. There is a demand for American bacon middles at full prices. Some very good American butters just to hand have sold readily at 112*s.* to 114*s.* per cwt. Lard is in moderate request. The imports of sugar keep steadily in advance of last year's at this time, and the relative surplus in stock is still enlarging. Prices are nearly 10*s.* lower than they were in December 1863, but have still a declining tendency. They are again 6*d.* to 1*s.* lower this week. Coffee maintains the recent advance rather firmly, but the sales have not gone off so briskly during the last day or two. In spices the only change of moment is a decline of 2*s.* to 3*s.* per cwt. for cassea lignea, which to-day sold at 79*s.* 6*d.* and 86*s.* for fourth to first quality. Large tea sales are in progress, and they have established a reduction of 1*d.* to $1\frac{1}{2}$d. per lb., on red-leaf congous. In other articles passing operations are trifling, and the variations in prices unimportant.

Liverpool, Wednesday, December 7.—Although we have had a fair amount of business transacted in cotton during the past week, the market has almost entirely lost the animation which was exhibited a week or two since. Still, there has been a slight improvement in the values from the lowest points which recently prevailed. The latest advices from New York, being silent with regard to the recently reported peace negotiations, have had the effect of slightly strengthening the market. The sales this week have amounted to 57,000 bales, of which 22,000 were taken on speculation and for export. The total sales this year to the present date have been 2,550,032 bales, and to the same period in 1863, 2,491,730 bales. There have been imported this year 2,131,497 bales; last year the quantity was 1,558,375 bales. This year the trade have taken 1,509,692 bales, and to the same period in 1863, 1,257,445 bales. The exports this year have been 525,487 bales; last year they were 441,277 bales. There have been taken on speculation this year 502,209 bales, against 737,566 bales in 1863. The estimated stocks at the present time are 383,792 bales, whilst at the corresponding period last year they were 249,582 bales. The closing quotations this afternoon were for American descriptions, $24\frac{1}{4}$d. to $26\frac{1}{4}$d., according to quality; Pernambuco, 27*d.* to $27\frac{1}{2}$d.; Maceio, $25\frac{1}{2}$d. to 26*d.*; Bahia, $25\frac{3}{4}$d. to 26*d.*; Egyptian, $16\frac{1}{4}$d. to $28\frac{3}{4}$d.; Smyrna, $21\frac{3}{4}$d. to 22*d.*; Surats, $11\frac{3}{4}$d. to 21*d.*; Madras, $18\frac{3}{4}$d. to 19*d.*; Bengal, $12\frac{1}{2}$d. to 13*d.*; Scinde, $12\frac{1}{2}$d. to 13*d.*; China, $16\frac{1}{4}$d. to $17\frac{1}{4}$d.; Japan, $17\frac{3}{4}$d. to $18\frac{1}{4}$d.

The Manchester markets during the past week have been rather more active, and prices have gradually advanced under the stimulus of the large demand for cotton at Liverpool and the subsidence of the peace rumours in America. The enhanced prices demanded, however, have tended to limit the dealings to a considerable extent. For shipping yarns there has been a good demand, and very high prices have been asked; but, under some apprehensions that money may possibly become dearer at no distant date, the full quotations have not been maintained, and at the close of the market there was some weakness exhibited. For home trade yarns there has also been a good enquiry, but the high prices asked materially checked operations. The cloth market has been looking up nearly the whole of the week. Manufacturers were compelled to ask higher prices in consequence of the state of the cotton market; but very few of the large buyers showed any inclination to respond. Consequently, only a comparatively small business has been transacted. The latest official quotations for cloths were:—$\frac{7}{8}$ Grey Printers, 7*s.* 9*d.* to 15*s.*; $\frac{9}{8}$ Grey Madapollams, 7*s.* to 10*s.*; $\frac{9}{8}$ Grey Printers, 9*s.* 9*d.* to 17*s.* 3*d.*; $\frac{5}{4}$ Grey Shirtings, 11*s.* 6*d.* to 24*s.*; Water Twist, No. 20, 1*s.* 9*d.* to 2*s.* 6*d.*; No. 30, 2*s.* 3*d.* to 2*s.* 10*d.*; No. 40, 1*s.* 10*d.* to 3*s.* 4*d.*; Mule Twist, No. 20, 1*s.* 8*d.* to 2*s.* 4*d.*; No. 30, 1*s.* 11*d.* to 2*s.* 8*d.*; No. 40, 2*s.* to 2*s.* 10*d.*; No. 50, 2*s.* 5*d.* to 3*s.*; No. 60, 2*s.* 8*d.* to 3*s.* 2*d.*; No. 70, 2*s.* 11*d.* to 3*s.* 5*d.*; No. 80, 3*s.* 1*d.* to 3*s.* 7*d.*; No. 90, 3*s.* 3*d.* to 3*s.* 9*d.*; and No. 100, 3*s.* 6*d.* to 4*s.* 1*d.*

SOUTHERN PRISONERS' RELIEF FUND.

THERE are at this time many thousands of Confederate prisoners of war confined in the various forts and camps of the Northern States. A large proportion of them are wounded or sick, and all are in a state of destitution, the accounts of which, as given in private letters and in the newspapers, present a picture of human suffering, which has scarcely a parallel in modern times. The merest necessaries of life are wanting, and frequently the wounded prisoner has no raiment save that which is stark and stiffened with his clotted blood. Horrible as war is in all its features, assuredly it has no greater horrors than the long agony of the poor captive who, when the feverish excitement of the contest is over, is left to the bitter charity of strangers and foes, without one friendly hand to soothe the pains of body or friendly voice to whisper hope and comfort to his despairing mind. These men, cut off from the assistance of their kindred or the protection of their Government, have peculiar claims on the patriotism of their countrymen in Europe, and upon Christian benevolence everywhere. They did not recklessly or from choice embrace the profession of arms, but in exchanging the comforts, and often the luxuries, of home for the toils and hardships of a soldier's life, they obeyed a stern sense of duty and the call of their country in its extremest need. An unusual proportion, also, of those that fill the ranks of the Confederate armies belong to the higher walks of life, upon whom privations, such as are endured by prisoners in the hands of the North, fall with increased severity.

The Southern Prisoners' Relief Fund is intended to mitigate some of these sufferings which cannot altogether be relieved. Within little more than a twelvemonth, nearly £3,000 have been collected and expended in relief. The managers of the Fund are assisted in their efforts by self-devoted ladies in the principal Northern cities, who visit the sufferers and give them such aid as the means at their disposal render possible. Of late the Federal Government has granted permission that this Samaritan work may be done openly. It is earnestly hoped that all Southerners residing in Europe will support the Fund to the extent of their ability, and its objects may recommend themselves to all, irrespective of country or political convictions, who sympathise with the sufferings of their fellow-men.

Contributions will be received by J. H. ASHBRIDGE, Treasurer, Walmer Buildings, Water Street, Liverpool; or in London, by HENRY HOTZE, Esq., 17 Savile Row, W.; in Paris, by H. O. BREWER, Esq., 6 Rue Circulaire; and DANIEL HUBBARD, Esq., 24 Rue Lord Byron.

ENGLAND.

FOR two centuries the inhabitants of Bristol have vainly desired that Gloucestershire and Somersetshire should be connected by a bridge across the river Avon at Clifton. In the year 1753, Mr. Alderman Visk of Bristol bequeathed to the Society of Merchant Venturers the sum of 1,000*l.* upon trust to permit that sum to accumulate at interest until it should be increased to 10,000*l.*, and then upon trust to apply the same to the building of a stone bridge across the Avon at Clifton. In the year 1830 the fund so bequeathed had grown to the sum of 8,000*l.*, and the citizens of Bristol bestirred themselves to build the long-desired bridge, using the money as a nucleus of the required fund. An Act of Parliament was obtained in May, 1830, vesting the necessary powers in the Merchant Venturers. Mr. Brunel designed a chain bridge of a single span of 700 feet, at an estimated cost of 57,000*l.* When 45,000*l.* had been spent, the towers had been completed, but no further progress had been made. That was in the year 1843, and from that date the scheme stood still from want of funds. In 1853, the powers of the old Act expired. In 1862, the Charing Cross Railway Company laid violent hands on the famous Hungerford Suspension Bridge, also the work of Brunel, with the intention of getting rid of the chains and converting the pillars into the base for the superstructure of a railway bridge. The opportunity was not lost upon the people of Bristol, and a company was formed under a new Act with a capital of 35,000*l.* for the completion of the bridge at Clifton. The chains of Hungerford Bridge were purchased for 5,000*l.* The old stone towers erected under the Act of 1830 were purchased for 2,000*l.* The work was at once commenced, and terminated successfully on the 8th December last. A suspension bridge has been erected, yielding perhaps in beauty to that across the Niagara, but exceeding in height even the work of Roebling. The Clifton Bridge is also 200 feet longer and half as high again as that across the Menai Straits, while the bridge at Fribourg yields in height to the new work by a space of 100 feet. The Clifton Bridge is 260 feet above the water. The span is 702 feet 3 inches, the width 30 feet, of which 20 feet are occupied by the carriage way. The weight of the chains between the piers is 554 tons; the weight of the roadway 440 tons. The bridge may be said to possess a surplus strength, measured by weight placed upon the platform, of about 6,000 tons. The bridge was opened with great ceremony. The Lords-Lieutenant, the magistrates and sheriffs of the counties of Gloucester and Somerset, with the clergy of the district, the Foresters, Druids, Shepherds, Friendly Societies, regular troops, Naval Reserve men, yeomanry, and volunteers, were present. The civic procession, consisting of the trades and benefit societies, marched first to the bridge; the bridge procession followed, and crossed and recrossed the bridge under salutes of artillery. Captain Huish, the Chairman of the Company, read an address setting forth the history of the undertaking from the death of Alderman Visk to the present time. Then the Bishop of Gloucester offered up prayer, and next Earl Ducie for the county of Gloucester, and the Earl of Cork for the county of Somerset, formally declared the bridge open for traffic. At night the bridge was illuminated.

THE ancient and religious foundation of King's College in the University of Cambridge, which owes its existence and its wealth to the pious liberality of King Henry VI., has undergone in its constitution a total revolution within the last eight years. Previously to the year 1856 the college consisted of seventy persons, of whom about fifty-five were entitled to the emoluments and privileges of Fellows, while the remainder were denominated scholars, and as such received from the society the costs of their education and maintenance. The College of Eton supplied students from time to time as vacancies occurred in the number of Fellows or scholars, and the persons who proceeded from Eton College to King's College were admitted Fellows of the latter society after three years of probation. The system, as organised by the combined efforts of the Royal Commission appointed under the University Act of 1856 and of the governing body of King's College, presents features in marked contrast to that which has been superseded. The college, when sufficient time has elapsed for the full inauguration of the new constitution, will consist of 48 Fellows, 24 scholars drawn from Eton College, and 24 scholars elected by examination open to all the world. Although the college has been embarrassed by the conflict of vested interests and of new claims, and has thereby incurred heavy drains upon its resources, yet the determination existed further to utilise the educational power of the society by the admission of Pensioners to the college. This step, after considerable hesitation, has now been taken, and public announcement has been made of the fact. October, 1865, is the date fixed for their first admission, and there will be an examination on 25th April next for the candidates. There will be papers in classics, mathematics, and experimental physics. Two exhibitions of 50*l.* a year, with tuition free, tenable for four years, will be awarded to the two candidates under twenty years of age who shall most distinguish themselves in the examination in mathematics and physics. It will be understood that the Pensioners will stand on the same footing with the scholars in point of education and commons, but that they will be charged with the payments for the same on the scale established in other colleges. It will not be possible for some few years to provide rooms within the precincts for the Pensioners, who will therefore lodge in the town.

THE Archbishops of Canterbury and York received on Thursday last, at Lambeth, addresses thanking their Lordships for their recent pastoral letter to the clergy and laity of their respective provinces in reference to the judgment of the Privy Council in the 'Essays and Reviews' case. The laity and clergy were well represented. The addresses acknowledged with deep gratitude the pastoral lately issued, and contained a prayer that their Graces might be enabled by Divine aid to take effectual counsel for upholding, amid the peculiar dangers of the times, the Divine authority of Holy Scripture and the integrity of the faith. The addresses were signed by 137,000 persons.

THE Earl of Carlisle was buried on Tuesday in the mausoleum in Castle Howard Park. The building contains sixty-four catacombs, eleven of which are occupied by the remains of ancestors of the Earl. The funeral was conducted without any pomp whatever. The congregation of nobility, gentry, yeomen, and tenantry, was, however, very large. The shops at Malton were closed during the day, and the bells were tolled. In York there was a similar observance of the day. The Dukes of Devonshire and Sutherland, Earl Granville, the Marquis of Hartington, Lord Taunton, Lord E. Howard, and Lord F. Howard were the principal mourners. The present Earl, the Rev. William George Howard, has long been an invalid, and has no family. The heir presumptive is Admiral Edward Howard, R.N., who has no issue, and the next heir to the Admiral is the Hon. Charles Howard, whose son, Mr. George James Howard, is married to the daughter of Lord Stanley of Alderley.

PARLIAMENT will meet on February 7 for the despatch of business.

INDIVIDUALS who do not scruple in the pursuit of their pet theories to destroy the liberty of their neighbours, occasionally manage to lose their own. To thrust upon an unwilling community a system of involuntary teetotalism, a Maine Liquor Law, or the yoke of a Tobacco Prevention clause, constitutes a method of persecution which is endurable only when it recoils on the head of the instigators. An example, not unworthy of record, has served at once as an exposition of the plans of the social reformers and as a warning to all persons who lend themselves to unjust acts for the accomplishment of specious benefits. The British Anti-Tobacco Society has issued the following placard and distributed it at the stations of the South-Western Railway:—

Rewards for the Conviction of Smokers at Railway Stations and in the Carriages.—Smokers are now exceedingly insolent. They are become an insufferable nuisance at railway stations and in the carriages, and in order to test how far it is practicable to arrest this custom we shall begin at the Waterloo, Richmond, and intervening railway stations, and shall give from this office:—1. One pound to the first person who shall convict a passenger of smoking at any of the above stations or in the carriages; 2. One pound ten shillings if the convicted party is an official, some of whom shamefully befume themselves with fumes of tobacco, and serious accidents are the natural result; 3. Two pounds if the convicted party is a railway director: 4. Ten shillings to a porter or any official who may merely aid in the conviction of an offender.

THOMAS REYNOLDS, Secretary.

British Anti-Tobacco Society's Offices,
10 Camden Square, London, N.W., November 2.

N.B. We have been instructed to offer the above rewards by gentlemen who are impelled from a sense of duty to do something for the protection of themselves and other non-smoking travellers.

On December 5, a Mr. Innes appeared at the Barnes Railway Station, and, unconscious of the foe that lay in wait for him, consumed the period of delay, which was to elapse before the train started, by indulgence in the fumes of a fragrant Havannah. The station at Barnes is unenclosed, the air drives away all odours on the instant of their creation; the smoker placed himself at the extremity of the platform, and at a distance from the only other occupant of the station. Though in point of fact he was smoking on the expanse known as Barnes Common, yet his feet pressed the flags of the station. In a moment his name and address were demanded and taken. Mr. Innes thereupon wrote to the Secretary of the Society, and received a reply to the effect that the Secretary had forwarded the letter of Mr. Innes to the gentlemen who offered the rewards, and that the following answer had been returned addressed to the Secretary aforesaid:—

Dear Sir,—The reward is offered to be given after conviction. If the offender confess his fault and pay the fine, 40*s.*, he may avoid prosecution, and the reward shall, of course, be given in addition to what may be obtained from the guilty party. The parties are thus secured against any loss of time. The present case seems clear. If the smoker will not arrange quietly, he must be prosecuted; the instant he is convicted, the complainants legally claim, and shall receive, the reward, as well as the 2*l.* to which the offender is liable by the laws of the railway company.

On receiving this delightful document, Mr. Innes put the matter in the hands of his attorney. Thereupon the latter applied to the Bow Street magistrate for a summons against Mr. T. Reynolds, whose name was appended to the handbill above set out. Mr. Morley, the attorney, said that his object in appearing was to prevent the system of annoyance against timid persons, who, shrinking from the fear of publicity, might be induced to submit to the terms proposed. Mr. Innes was not the man to comply with such demands. The summons would be against Mr. Reynolds for causing to be received, knowing the contents, a letter demanding money with menaces. The magistrate said that this sort of thing ought to be put a stop to, for the affair looked very much like a system of extortion. The summons was then granted. Mr. Innes is in a fair way of earning the title of a public benefactor.

THE case of Ellison v. Jorss came before Baron Martin and a special jury, on Saturday last, at Guildhall. The Solicitor-General and Mr. T. Jones, both of whom were counsel for the Crown in the Alexandra case, appeared for the plaintiff. The action was for a breach of contract. The defendant had agreed to send 200 or 250 tons of Manchester goods to Charleston by the Tubal Cain, but refused to execute his contract on the ground that the ship was not of the proper tonnage. Mr. Baron Martin thought that there was a contract, yet the damages would be only nominal, because the contract was an illegal one, directly opposed to the Queen's proclamation, and having a direct tendency to involve this country in war. The Solicitor-General reminded his Lordship that the plea of illegality which had been placed on the record was withdrawn. The Judge thereupon said that neither that, nor the fact of the parties choosing to treat the transaction as a matter of honour, could blind him to the nature of the contract; that, though he had a deep respect for the opinion of Mr. Justice Willes, yet on this point he had a judgment of his own. He did not think that there was any hardship in the plaintiff losing his money if he had agreed to risk the blockade. After prolonged discussion, it was agreed that a verdict should be entered for the plaintiff for 2,707*l.* 6*s.* 10*d.*, subject to a special case to be stated for the opinion of the court above. The Judge said it was worthy of observation that in this transaction not a single English name appeared except Beach, who was a Southerner and the consignee of the goods. Foreigners came over to England, and, while enjoying the freedom of this country, engaged in transactions directly tending to involve the country in war.

SCOTLAND.

The First Division of the Court of Session gave on Saturday last its decision on the petition of Major Yelverton to apply the judgment of the House of Lords. Their Lordships unanimously refused the application of the pursuer, Mrs. Theresa Longworth, or Yelverton, to suspend judgment and allow a condescence of res noviter to be received and added to the record, and applied the judgment of the House of Lords. The res noviter consisted of evidence that one Sarah Mallins, now deceased, heard Major Yelverton acknowledge the marriage; together with proof that Frederick Yelverton was under the belief that his brother, the Major, was married. After judgment was signed, the Lord Advocate stated that he should give in a note asking leave to refer to oath. The minute would be tendered in the following form:—'The pursuer in the declarator of marriage hereby refers the whole case to the oath of the defender, the said William Charles Yelverton.—(Signed) THERESA YELVERTON.' The motion will come on shortly.

AUSTRALIA.

The intelligence from Melbourne is of more than ordinary interest. The cry for protection to native industry is almost unanimous. It is argued that, with all deference to the theory of free trade in the abstract, the nascent industry of a young country must be fostered by a system of tariffs. At present Great Britain imports about twelve millions' worth of goods into the colony, and the colonists are ready with the retort that England taxes colonial produce. The cry has been utilised in the elections which have given much additional strength to the Ministry. Three demands were generally made upon the candidates: first, protection by taking the duties off tea, sugar, and coffee, and imposing them on articles of English manufacture; second, support of the Government Land Bill; and third, a reduction of the property qualification required of the members of the Upper House, by one half. The revenue for the quarter ending September 30 was in a satisfactory state; the receipts were 818,160*l.*, and the expenditure 727,813*l.* There was a considerable increase in the yield of the gold-fields, owing to the stimulus to enterprise consequent on the passing of the Limited Liability Act.

In Sydney the first question arresting the attention of Parliament is the taxation to be adopted to recruit the revenue, and the position of the Ministry is believed to be precarious. There seems to be as much abhorrence of protection in New South Wales as there is desire for the system in Victoria.

NEW ZEALAND.

Affairs in New Zealand bear a complexion of the utmost gloom. The 200 Maories captured at Rangariri, who had escaped from an island where they were under the guard of a chaplain, an interpreter, a surgeon, and one warder, have gone north and built a strong pah at a place called the Great Maha, where they have been supplied with firearms and provisions. In Tauranga, where great hopes of peace had been entertained, the natives have built a large work near the Fatal Gate Pah, and have stopped the surveyors in measuring the confiscated lands. The Taranaki campaign will shortly be commenced. The officers have been summoned for active service. Colonel Warre had seized and destroyed two pahs with slight resistance. To add to these complications, the Fox Ministry, which stood pledged to a thorough suppression of the native resistance, have tendered their resignations—the last despatches from the Secretary for the Colonies having embarrassed their relations with the Governor. Sir George Grey has refused to accept their resignations.

INDIA.

The principal topic of interest in the Indian empire is the enormous rise in the prices of the necessaries of life. It is calculated that the expense of living in the Bengal Presidency is just double what it was three years since. The evil is equally apparent in the Bombay Presidency, and is justly attributed by Sir Bartle Frere to the large importations of silver, and to the fact that cotton cultivation has, to a considerable extent, superseded the growth of cereal crops. Indeed, a famine seems imminent in Bengal and Bombay. The whole evil is in reality due to the demand for cotton, for the silver has been imported to pay for that staple. A more striking illustration of the wide-spread effects of the American war can scarcely be conceived than this imminent danger of a famine in India. The lesson may at least be of some effect upon persons who do not scruple to assert that the British empire is not seriously affected by the cotton crisis.

THE CONTINENT.

FRANCE.

Judgment was delivered on the 7th instant in the case of the thirteen; it was in favour of the Government on all the points of the appeal. The result of it is that the law on the subject of associations in France now stands as follows:—No persons can meet together for the purpose of acting in concert towards a determined or permanent object without forming an association such as requires the sanction of the Government to be legal; the existence of an illegal association may be established on general grounds, and it is not necessary to specify the individuals who form it; members of the Legislature have not ex officio an immunity from prosecution if they form part of an illegal electoral association; finally, domiciliary visits may be made by the ordinary police on the warrant of a police magistrate, in order to collect the evidence of such associations. The judgment was read in court at the first moment of its assembly on the 7th instant, and took most of the defendants by surprise. They were waiting outside, not expecting that the judges would observe so rigorous and unusual a punctuality. On attempting to enter, they found the doors closed upon them, and were not admitted until the reading of the judgment was over. The defendants have again appealed to the Cour de Cassation. It has been ably pointed out by a French journalist that there is a serious danger latent in the present judgment. It has extended the net of the law to such a width that it now takes in well-nigh every individual in the country. This, which elsewhere would be a reductio ad absurdum, and therefore harmless, may in France become a constant peril to the well-being of the citizens; for, all men being guilty in the eye of the law, the Government asserts the right of selecting some of them, and naturally its own enemies in preference to all others, to suffer the penalties of their misdeeds. It is most earnestly to be hoped that the Court of Final Appeal will repudiate so fatal a doctrine.

We regret to have to announce the death of M. Mocquard, which occurred on the 9th inst.; this event, though not unexpected, as he had been for some little time in a hopeless state, is nevertheless severely felt by the Emperor, whose confidential friend and private secretary he was, and by the members of French society. His funeral took place on the 12th inst., and was attended by a large body of ministers and persons of note. Marshal Vaillant pronounced the funeral oration over his grave on behalf of the Emperor; M. de Laguerronière also made a speech in the name of the Senate and of the press.

M. Haussmann, Prefect of the Seine, made a speech on the opening of the Municipal Council of Paris, which has attracted some attention. It is to M. Haussmann that the Parisians owe the continuous alterations which have been going on in Paris, and which may fairly be said to have wrought a transformation of the city. Much that was old, dirty, inconvenient, and unhealthy has departed: unfortunately, much that was old, historical, venerable, and picturesque has been carried away together with the filth and rubbish. Paris is full of splendid edifices and palaces for the rich, but the houses of the poor are destroyed; and the very workmen who live by the reconstruction of the town are driven to live in the remote suburbs of Batignolles and La Villette. Evil and good are singularly mixed in the system of which M. Haussmann is the creator, and his speech was therefore listened to with much interest by all parties. He congratulated the Council of Paris on the fact that they were appointed by the Emperor, not by municipal election, and generally assured the city of Paris that it was much better looked after by Imperial nominees than it would have been by its own officers. The journalists have supplemented his speech in the points where it was somewhat deficient in information by assuring the working classes that their benefit was especially consulted in the erection of the spacious squares and boulevards which have ousted their modest tenements; but it must be confessed that the advantage which they will get from them is still in futuro.

The following comparative statistics of French commerce during the last four years are interesting:—

	Francs
Imports during the first ten months of 1861 . .	2,004,453,000
,, ,, ,, 1862 . .	1,830,453,000
,, ,, ,, 1863 . .	2,021,142,000
,, ,, ,, 1864 . .	2,027,125,000

The value of cotton imported during the last year is included in the last-mentioned sum. It has risen to 353,000,000 francs; in 1861, it was 264,000,000 francs. The exports are as follows:

	Francs
1861	1,570,648,000
1862	1,815,225,000
1863	2,157,797,000
1864	2,470,032,000

This statement shows that the exports of French manufactures have made an increase of 57 per cent. during the last four years.

The French Government has exhibited lately a laudable anxiety to preserve the French cemetery at Sebastopol from the state of decay into which all the memorials of the Crimean war in that country have been allowed to fall; they have now carried on their attention to the French cemetery at Constantinople. This has been formed by collecting the French remains from the various cemeteries in which they were originally interred into one plot, called the Carré Militaire, forming part of the general Catholic Latin Cemetery. Every assistance has been given by the Turkish Government. A Catholic priest of Armenia, Don Antonio Georgiovitch, who was in attendance on the French military hospitals, supplied all the information requisite. A foundation has been made for a mortuary mass to be said for the souls of the French soldiers yearly on the morrow of the Fête Napoleon.

The great spread of commerce in France has for a long time caused the present postal arrangements to be deficient for the public requirements. The number of letters has increased from 126,000,000 in 1847 to 300,000,000 in 1864; the receipts have risen from 53,000,000 to 72,000,000 francs in the same time. In order to provide for this great increase, France has, by a decree of December 10, been divided into six grand divisions, at the head of each of which an inspector will be placed, with a salary of from 300*l.* to 400*l.* a year. The system in each of these divisions is to be thoroughly reorganised, new post-offices created, the number of the officials increased, and their salaries raised. The whole management of them will then be intrusted to the inspectors, who will have full powers to vary the direction, number, &c., of the mails.

The Société de Forges et de Chantiers de la Méditerranée has turned out an ironclad frigate, the Numancia, built for the Spanish Government, said to be the finest specimen of shipbuilding yet turned out of any private dockyard. Her length is 300 feet; her engines, 4,000 horse-power; her mean speed, 14 knots.

ITALY.

The debate on the transfer of the capital has been at last brought to a conclusion in the Senate. The most noticeable speeches on the subject during the last week were, one from the Minister of the Interior, asserting with vigour that the temporal power of the Pope was incompatible with the liberty of Italy, and unnecessary for the support of his spiritual authority. He called on the House to adopt the Convention as the nearest approach which was possible to the complete liberation of Italy, considering the prejudices in favour of the Pope which existed in other countries. Again, another good speech from the lips of General Cialdini, supporting the transfer of the capital on strategic grounds. He considered that Italy, ever since the time of Hannibal, had been and would be open to attack from the north. He urged that a much better defence could be made of the line of the Po, and the passes of the Apennines which protect Florence in that direction, than any that could be made of Turin. If Turin be maintained as the capital, an army must be kept on the east of it to defend it from the Austrians; should that army be beaten, it would be thrown back on the barren slopes of the Alps and the foreign territory of France, leaving the road into the peninsula unguarded. If Florence be taken for the capital, the army defending it would in the case of defeat be able to retire to a better line of defence, and one within Italian territory. His speech was received with great applause. The Marquis Pallavicino spoke against the bill, saying that he was old enough to remember a former occupation of Turin by the French. Signor Gallina said that the Convention must be accepted in spite of its origin; but he related an episode of the year 1849, when the priest Gioberti, then President of the Council, offered to allow Genoa to be occupied by French troops. General della Marmora replied that he had never before heard of this circumstance. The Senate at length divided on the bill, which was carried by 134 votes to 47. The removal of the various branches of the Administration from Turin to Florence will take place during the coming spring: the Ministries of War and of Foreign Affairs will go in March; the Home Office and the remainder will follow in due course. It is hoped that on May 1 the Italian Government will be able to notify officially to foreign Powers the completion of the transfer.

The proposals of the Minister of Finance continue to be accepted with great favour throughout the country; 2,000 communes have already agreed to pay the land-tax of 1865 in advance according to his suggestion. The Minister of War intends to give an unlimited furlough to all soldiers raised in Lombardy, the Romagna, Umbria, and the Marches, whose service dates nominally from 1839; the same measure is to be applied to Tuscan soldiers of 1840 and Neapolitans of 1860. Meetings have been held for the purpose of encouraging Government to persevere in their scheme for the abolition of convents, as there are rumours of intrigues now on foot to prevent the discussion of the measure. A story is afloat of a collective note addressed by Austria, Russia, and Prussia to France, to the effect that the removal of the capital to Florence will be considered by those Powers as a casus belli: whatever the truth of this story may be, it is founded on a general belief that the frequent communications between those Powers during the past year have not been without their effect. The Senate has passed bills authorising a charge of 40,000*l.* a year on the public revenue in favour of the city of Turin. The news from Rome is insignificant; an allocution from the Pope is expected shortly. A French court martial has condemned the Neapolitan Graziani to death for the murder of two French gendarmes.

DENMARK.

A deputation of 5,000 Slesvigers came from the districts of Hagerslev, Abenraa, and Flensborg, to pay their respects to the King of Denmark at Kolding; they presented an address to him, the concluding paragraph of which says: 'Should the wishes of the inhabitants prevail in the final decision upon the destiny of Slesvig, it will then be seen how deeply love for the ancient Fatherland is rooted in the hearts of the Slesvigers.' King Christian in reply said that he most deeply regretted the separation of Slesvig from Denmark, but having once ceded that province he hoped that the Slesvigers would bow to the will of Providence, and submit to their fate with patience. Prior to their reception by his Majesty, the members of the deputation laid aside the Danish colours, as the King would only receive them as Slesvigers. All the cities of Jutland have vied with one another in expressions of loyalty to their King: his Majesty had desired that festivities should be spared as much as possible, but the people would not be refused, and celebrated the visit of their sovereign by an immense spontaneous illumination.

GERMANY.

The Federal Commissioners have evacuated the Duchies upon the order of their respective Governments. It is to be regretted that in departing they sullied the fairness of their cause, such as it is, by an act of high-handed oppression. They have simply confiscated for the use of their own countries the balances of cash in the public offices, amounting to about $1,000,000, or 150,000*l.* The native members of the provisional Government have resigned in consequence. The contest between Prussia and Saxony on the subject of the Duchies was worked up into a most absurd tragicomedy before its conclusion. The Saxon Government sent the public moneys and the valuables in the treasury so well known in Dresden as the Green Vaults, to the fortress of Königstein, and talked boldly of calling out 100,000 men to defend the rights of Vaterland. The coldness with which their enthusiasm was received in Germany appears to have damped their ardour; they have eaten the leek as effectually as did ancient Pistol; they have ordered their troops to retire, with special commands not to set foot on the hated Prussian territory, but rather to go round through Hanover. Prince Frederick Charles of Prussia, the Prussian commandant in Slesvig-Holstein, has issued a proclamation, notifying to the inhabitants of the Duchies the advent of the two great Powers to the command of their country; the existing officials have been continued in authority, on their taking an oath of allegiance to the new provisional Government. The Prussian troops of occupation in the three Duchies are 10,000 in number; the Austrians have one brigade in West Slesvig. The two great Powers have at length undertaken the task of examining into the succession question. Prussia still insists upon the rights which accrue to her through the old arrangement made in 1502, as mentioned in our last number. According to an Austrian journal, her plan is to allow as many claimants as possible to come forward for the various parts of the territory of the Duchies, taking care that she herself shall be one of them; then, when it is evident that to satisfy them all it will be necessary to tear up the country into ridiculously small pieces, she will propose that one of the aspirants should buy up all the rival claims. Of all the candidates there is, of course, only one who is capable of paying down so large a sum as that required, namely, the King of Prussia. Thus that worthy will quietly step into this much-coveted territory. There is much probability in this motion; and it is very generally believed that the Duke of Augustenburg has already been offered $5,000,000 for his claim.

The return of the heroes of Düppel and Alsen to Berlin was celebrated on the 7th instant with the greatest pomp. The King met them outside the Brandenburg Gate, and rode at their head down the avenue Unter den Linden. After the troops had marched past, the King made them a speech and distributed decorations amongst the officers and soldiers. In the evening Berlin was illuminated. The King's observations were not of a very striking character. He called it a 'glorious' war and a 'glorious' peace. Thanks to the heroism of his soldiers, the days of Düppel and Alsen were handed down to future generations in the history of warfare. He expressed himself in equally laudatory terms of the fleet, which in its first engagement was not dismayed by the number of the enemy's ships. Thus far, all is couleur de rose with the King of Prussia. Nevertheless, there still is a 'little rift within the lute, which by and by may make the music mute.' The internal conflict between the King and the Chambers has been reopened by a late proclamation, in which the King commented on the enormous advantages of a strong military organisation. As this organisation has been carried out in the very teeth of the Chambers, these words have awakened all the old party rancour. The Liberal journals promise, on behalf of the representatives, that they will maintain their ground; the Ministerial organs are equally obstinate on the part of the Government.

The Address of the Lower House of Austria, in answer to the speech from the throne, has been passed through discussion, and has been presented to the Emperor in the form of a letter. The effect produced by the debate is likely to be important, both within and without the Empire.

With regard to internal affairs some very grave points have been discussed. The first of these is the relation of the various countries of the empire to one another, which came on when the present situation of Hungary was brought under examination; the Chamber expressed its hope that the Hungarian Diet would be convoked as speedily as possible. Upon this the Vaterland of Vienna very sensibly observes that the Chamber is inconsistent with itself. Up to the present year it has been all for centralisation: this year it is all for autonomy in the various provinces. The inconsistency is marked, and detracts a good deal from the weight of the vote of the Chamber on this subject. The next point of internal policy which has been severely criticised is the financial state of the country. Against the budget of Herr Plener, Professor Herbst made a violent attack, accusing the Minister of miscalculations, misstatements, and extravagance. But a short exposition of the real facts of the case showed that the calculations were founded on a basis recognised to be sound by the European capitalists who are flocking into Austria to get Government concessions, and who in a very few days subscribed double the amount of the loan required by Government at a price only 2 per cent. below par. Economy appears to be carried out to its utmost by the various departments; the army will be reduced by only 1,200, but its administration will be carried on in a much more frugal manner. A thorough but gradual reduction of the army to a peace footing is in contemplation; in August last, after a good many furloughs had been granted, there still remained 400,000 men under arms; since that date 50,000 more have been sent home; the diminution will be continued until the peace footing of 260,000 is reached. With regard to the external policy of Austria several facts of great interest have been elicited; in the first place, the Government still clings to the Prussian alliance, in spite of the growing repugnance of the people; next, they refuse to raise the state of siege in Galicia entirely, although they have suffered a defeat in the Lower House on this very point. This persistence of the Austrian Cabinet in two measures which are agreeable to the Courts of Berlin and St. Petersburg, and to them only, leads people to the same conclusion which we have already observed to exist in Italy, namely, that Russia, Austria, and Prussia are much more intimately connected than they choose to avow, since the outcry raised against the projected new Holy Alliance. A third point of the external policy of Austria which we may again notice, is the declaration that Austria is ready to recognise Italy so soon as that Power chooses to come forward and behave in a courteous manner. Count Mensdorff's observation, that it was impossible to be on good terms with a Power who considers your mere existence an insult to herself, is both natural and just.

The Elector of Hesse has replied to the address of his Chambers in a long document, the purport of which is that the observations of the Chamber upon his management of affairs are impertinent and intrusive. 'The address,' he says, 'trenches as greatly upon that respect which the Chambers owe to ourselves and our Government, as it also exceeds the measure of the privileges accorded to the representatives.' And he concludes by saying: 'We have not been able to gather from the representation of the Chambers that it is desirable to comply with their request, and to consider our Government specially bound to display greater zeal and more rapid action in state affairs, as we are already conscious of general faithful performance of our duty. But we confidently expect that our faithful Chambers will abstain from every step incompatible with our authority as sovereign of the country.'

RUSSIA.

A very important ukase has just received the Imperial sanction, regulating and reforming the administration of justice in Russia. The principal features of the new law are the employment of counsel, open courts, and trial by jury in criminal prosecutions. The new tribunals are, justices' offices, district courts, provincial courts, and the Senate. The justices' offices correspond to our police courts; the district courts are those of criminal assize, and have jurisdiction over all civil suits to the amount of 2,000 roubles. The provincial courts take all civil suits to a greater amount; and the Senate is the final court of appeal, with power only to order a new trial, not to reverse the judgment of an inferior court. In criminal cases, ministers, senators, and high functionaries will be tried by the Senate only; in all other cases, and for all other persons, there will be perfect equality. Political offences are divided into two classes. There will be a special tribunal for high treason; inferior offences will be tried by the common courts. The judges will be named by the Crown; the jury will be elected by voters who are possessed of real property of 3,000*l.* in value.

The last trace of serfdom in Russia has vanished on the abolition of that institution in the Trans-Caucasian provinces.

TURKEY.

The disturbances in Albania have taken a new phase. Last week we reported the massacre of the inhabitants of a Thessalian village by Albanian marauders. This week we hear that 600 Albanians have taken up arms, killed the Turkish tax-gatherers, and ill-treated the local officials. The Pasha of Nicha is marching on them with a force of infantry, cavalry, and artillery. There is a probability that the movement will extend further. A convention has been signed between the Porte and Persia for a telegraph line to India.

The relations between the Bey of Tunis and his supreme lord the Sultan of Turkey appear to be only faintly understood in France. A few explanations are required to bring out the exact question which has drawn an article from M. Limayrac, of the Constitutionnel; we take them from his own report. Upon the outbreak of disturbances in Tunis, the Porte announced to the French ambassador at Constantinople its intention of sending an agent thither, but repudiated in the most formal manner any thought of changing the constitution of Tunis, or the relations between the Bey and the Sultan. On these assurances M. de Moustier made no objection to the departure of the Ottoman envoy; at the same time, he gave notice to the Porte, with the approval of the French Government, that any interference on the part of that Power in Tunisian affairs would be opposed by France. The French squadron off Tunis had orders not to leave that station until the Turkish envoy had departed. The Bey has now thought fit to send a messenger, General Kairreddin, on what is reported to be only a visit of courtesy towards the Porte; he has been chased by a French man-of-war, and escaped with some difficulty. This fact is omitted by the French journalist. The French semi-official organ now repeats the menaces used originally by M. de Moustier at Constantinople, saying that, if this visit has any ulterior motives, it is known both at Tunis and at Constantinople what France will have to say in the matter. This conduct is open to several constructions; the one most obvious and most favourable to the French Government is that France recognises the right of the Sultan to settle the disorders in his vassal State, but demands in her own interest that the exercise of such right should be suspended. The right of interference is to be considered as superior to the right of sovereignty. Without adverting to the danger to English influence in the Mediterranean which follows on the recognition of this doctrine in this particular instance, it may be observed that the whole subject demands thorough investigation, in order that we may know how far our relations with our own colonies will be affected. Canada is on the point of changing its status of a colony of England into that of a vassal province; Australia has already assumed that position. The law on this point should be settled before we extend our modern feudal system farther.

It is reported that the Viceroy of Egypt, acting under the influence of the Turkish authorities, refuses to comply with the award given by the Emperor of the French on the Suez Canal question. His continued opposition is likely to bring about a crisis in the affairs of the company.

JAPAN.

It has been already reported that the Prince of Nagato refused to pay the ransom stipulated for in the treaty of peace. The matter has been referred to the criminal tribunal of Yeddo, who ordered his two palaces to be razed to the ground, and his servants to be put to death. The sentence was approved by the Mikado and the Tycoon, and 420 men and 215 women and children were executed. This sanguinary sentence appears to have had a great effect on the Prince, who sent his Prime Minister to Yeddo, and through him renewed his agreement to pay all the expenses stipulated. In spite of his voluntary humiliation, he is, it is said, to be stripped of all his honours and possessions by the Tycoon, who has completely vindicated his supremacy over the Daimios. By the latest advices we learn that the representatives of the European Powers had been received at Yeddo by the Grand Council of the Empire, who gave them complete satisfaction. The silk trade is to be freed from all restrictions, and the territory of the Prince of Nagato having been confiscated by the Tycoon, the latter will pay the indemnity demanded by the European Powers.

SOUTH AMERICA.

The latest advices from Uruguay are of a grave character. A quarrel has arisen between the Eastern republic in that country and the empire of Brazil. A Brazilian division has entered the territory of the republic and occupied the city of Melo. At the same time the Admiral in command of the Brazilian squadron stationed off Montevideo addressed a circular to the foreign agents in that port, informing them that he intended to exercise the right of search on all foreign ships, and to take possession of any cargo which appeared to him to be contraband of war. This claim on the part of Admiral Tamandare has called forth a universal protest. The French agent, M. Maillefer, has addressed a letter to the Admiral, demanding by what law he claimed to put in force the regulations of a blockade before war was declared between the two countries, or notice of blockade given. The circumstances of the case are aggravated by the fact that the Argentine republic, and not Brazil, are the owners of one bank of the river La Plata, which forms the port in question. He concludes by a meaning threat of the anger of France, should the Admiral carry out his proposed scheme. The republic of Paraguay has sent troops to the assistance of the Eastern republic.

LETTER FROM NEW YORK.

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

NEW YORK: November 30, 1864.

PEACE rumours are not all exploded yet. There is no more talk of Mr. Lincoln's sending a mission directly or indirectly to Richmond, with an overture to the Southern people to come in now and surrender, as the last chance for saving their lives. Whatever he may have to say on that topic will be communicated through his message to Congress next Monday. The latest tale of effort for peace is that the President has been solicited by leading members of the Democratic party to permit them to proceed to Richmond and confer with the Confederate authorities upon terms for the restoration of the Union. The inducement laid before the President to obtain his consent to this proceeding is, that if the South refuses to come back into the Union, or makes conditions which it would be dishonourable to accede to, the Democratic party, or these Democrats and their followers, will join him unreservedly in the most vigorous steps for calling out all the power of the North, to make a speedy end of the war by complete subjugation. The President is reported to have declined this offer. The Democrats are a defeated party, and can be constrained to adopt his policy whether they would or not. They could hardly be in earnest in asking of Mr. Lincoln that, having won the political victory over them, he shall transfer to them any part of the power or the credit of conducting war or making peace. It is the reported substance of his answer, that he would manage public affairs, which he called his 'own' affairs, in his own way. What degree of truth may be in these statements I cannot vouch for, but they are so much in character as to make them credible of both parties. The politicians who have control of the Democratic organisation are quite capable of setting up a Peace intrigue of their own, in order to make a lodgment for themselves among the triumphant Republicans, and Mr. Lincoln is just the man to turn them away with the notice that he has no use for them and can do without them. Neither Mr. Lincoln nor the War Democrats can really believe that the Southern States will ever come back into the Union. Both are accommodating themselves to the inevitable protraction of the war for an indefinite period.

From the South all things conspire to show that there is not the smallest fraction of a party there which entertains the thought of voluntary return into the Union, or of surrendering the struggle for independence. The position of Mr. Stephens, of Georgia, the Confederate Vice-President, developed in a letter lately addressed to Senator Semmes, of Louisiana, to exculpate himself from all suspicion of having intended to favour reunion in his late efforts to encourage peace ideas, is the more significant because Mr. Stephens is in decided opposition to the administration of President Davis, and does not hesitate to censure him for not having been sufficiently earnest in inviting and offering terms of peace. In that letter he ridicules the apprehensions of those who feared that, if M'Clellan were elected President, he might have offered terms for a restoration of union which the South could accept. He says:

'These apprehensions are, I doubt not, sincere. But I entertain none such myself. I am no believer in ghosts of any kind. The old Union and the old Constitution are both dead—dead for ever—except in so far as the Constitution has been preserved by us. There is for the Union as it was no resurrection by any power short of that which brought Lazarus from the tomb. There may be, and doubtless are, many at the North, and some at the South, who look forward to a restoration of the Union and the Constitution as it was; but such ideas are as vain and illusory as the dreamy imaginings of the Indian warrior who in death clings to his weapons, in fond expectation that he will have use for them beyond the grave in other lands and new hunting-grounds.'

Mr. Stephens had hopes that the election of General M'Clellan would lead to peace, but to peace with the independence of the South—not so strongly from the avowed policy of M'Clellan and his partisans, as from national necessities and new party combinations which would follow. The defeat of M'Clellan deprives these speculations of any value, except as indications of the workings of the mind of the Southern Peace party, so much spoken of in the North as tending towards a restoration of Union, when they were as intently fixed on separation as those of the more extreme party which is assailing them. On the subject of reconstruction, for which he has been accused of having a lingering expectation in the future, Mr. Stephens recalls a former letter, written, in reply to a friend's letter conveying the same imputation, in 1861. He repeats, in the following terms, what he said then:—

'I told him, in reply, that I looked upon such a charge as no less an imputation on my intelligence than upon my integrity. The issue of this war, in my judgment, was subjugation or independence. I so understood it when the State of Georgia seceded, and it is with full consciousness of this fact, with all its responsibilities, sacrifices, and perils, that I pledged myself then and there to stand by her and her fortunes, whatever they might be, in the course she had adopted.'

The 'chimera' of Mr. Stephens and his party has been that peace was attainable by an appeal to the principle of separate State sovereignty, and that, with the consent of the Governments at Washington and Richmond, the States might meet in convention and settle terms of peace, which would inevitably be terms of peaceful separation. Under M'Clellan they fancied this possible; under Lincoln they know it to be hopeless; and there will, therefore, be never heard again in the South the voice of any party which looks for peace except in successful resistance to the arms of the North, or thinks of voluntary submission as possible or endurable. Foote, of Tennessee, one of the three members of the Confederate Congress reputed in the North to be quasi-peace men and reconstructionists, has been making a scene in Richmond by denouncing the Examiner editor who said so as a slanderer. Cobb, of Alabama, one of the other two, has abandoned his title to the seat he never took, and gone to the North, and Boyce, of South Carolina, is with Stephens; and this dissipates the entire party on which Northern hopes of restoring the Union or reconstructing a new one have rested.

Notwithstanding the boastful assumptions at Washington that the 'rebellion' is in a collapsing state, and must soon perish, and the forthcoming invocations of the message to the South to come in and be pardoned, the Administration is making preparations for a large increase of the army. Before the election it was continually said by the Administration organs that there were soldiers enough raised to finish the work, and no more drafts would be required. Now, Mr. Whiting, the solicitor of the War Department, is quoted as having authorised the statement that recruitments under all the late drafts have not been sufficient to supply the waste of the armies, and that the present law does not afford the Government power enough over the enrolment, and over men as soon as conscripted, to enable it to keep the ranks filled. It seems, the habit of running away to avoid the drafting, running away after being drafted without reporting to be examined, and running away from the depots, has been so general that not more than one soldier is obtained for five names drawn; the rule has been to allow for exemptions and escapes by drawing two for one. Great numbers also get off after being mustered, on their march to the front. The law gives the Government no power over the conscript until after he has been drafted and is examined and accepted. It is now apparent, from the movements of the authorities, that they intend to have a new and very large draft, not later than January, and that they intend to make it more effective by an amendment of the conscription law early in the session, so as to enable the Government to secure the presence of enrolled men for the chances of the draft, and get a hold upon them as soon as drawn. The Provost-Marshal-General has given his notices already for the revision of the enrolled lists, and the State Governors are going to work with an alarmed alacrity to stimulate volunteering, in order to lessen the burdens of the sweeping and rigid conscription which is threatened. Many thousands who voted for Mr. Lincoln and war, on the faith of the assurances made that it was nearly over, and that no more conscription would be necessary, are filled with terror at the new necessity avowed for an indefinite number of more troops, and the prospect of repeated calls to be enforced with a rigour they never dreamed of. It was probably to stimulate this lagging patriotism, which voted for war without any stomach for fighting, that General Butler, at his late Fifth Avenue speech in this city, which made him so popular in New England, held out to them the lure of universal plunder with which to tempt them into the army. He told them that if the South rejects the President's tenders of mercy, the war will be carried on without taxes on the North for bounties or expenses. The lands and goods of the people of the Confederacy will be taken from them, and parcelled among the soldiers who go down to conquer and take possession. The old buccaneers used to gather their recruits in the same way, by engaging to divide with them the spoil of the sacked cities of the Spanish main.

'Exit the Florida,' writes a paper of this city in announcing that the captured Confederate steamer has gone to the bottom in Hampton Roads, run down at anchor by a Federal transport. It was an accident—a very extraordinary accident, as remarkable as that recorded in the 'Pickwick Papers,' where old Mr. Weller accidentally overturned a coach full of voters in the very place indicated to him as a dangerous spot by some gentlemen of the opposite party, who had given him a twenty-pound note to keep his eye on the place. It has been said, from the first intimation that Brazil would demand the restoration of this vessel, that she never would be restored if any means could be found to avoid the obligation. Destroying the vessel makes restitution impossible. If she was destroyed by accident, it is one of those miraculous coincidences so contrary to all reasonable probabilities—so conveniently adapted to the relief of those who had her in custody from very annoying embarrassments and apprehended humiliations—so perfectly in accord with their wishes and gratifying to their feelings—that it will be impossible to persuade the world of their innocence of a mean and cowardly trick. It may be difficult to prove design, and still more difficult to fix on the Government any portion of the responsibility. It has convenient friends to do what they imagine would be pleasing, who look to be dealt with very indulgently if enquiry should be pressed. But there is no probability that very rigid enquiry will be made, when the event is so much exulted over as having rid the country of a dreaded enemy, and relieved it of an international embarrassment.

The navy of the United States has succeeded, after two years of fruitless chase around the world, in destroying this little

Confederate steamer—first, by boarding her in the absence of the crew, in a neutral port, and stealing her away, under cover of night; and, secondly, by running her down when she was under the safeguard of their honour, a captive for whose release the indignant nations were calling out.

The diplomatic aspects of the case are changed by this 'accident.' Mr. Seward may plead that the Government cannot restore what no longer exists, and offer to make apology and reparation. Equity would make Brazil exact at least the return of the captured men, who have been sent to Fort Warren, indemnification to all the sufferers by the outrage, and the restoration of a ship of equivalent force, with all the equipments and munitions, fit for service, to be passed over by the Brazilian Government to the Confederates.

The rumoured changes in the Cabinet are all made uncertain by new rumours this week, not whether there are to be changes—that is certain—but as to when they will take place, and who are to be the new officers. Attorney-General Bates has certainly resigned, and Judge Usher, Secretary of the Interior, is to be the United States District Judge for Indiana. Thus much is certain. The difficulties about the Chief Justiceship are, according to report, to be lessened by making Justice Wayne (of Georgia), who is now on the bench, Chief Justice, and appointing an associate merely to succeed Judge Taney in that circuit. The last reports are, that Mr. Stanton will not give up the War Department, and consequently all the troubles about a successor will be avoided. Butler will be disappointed. General Banks returns to New Orleans, in his former position. General Canby, whom the Federal telegrams viâ Cairo reported dead, and who may read his own obituary notices, a half column long, in Northern papers, is recovering from his wound, and will keep his place. The Treasury Department is to be filled. Mr. Fessenden is almost importunate to be relieved, but, in the present state of the finances, the man who is bold enough to undertake it, and has the reputation to beget public confidence, is not yet named. Robert J. Walker is dying out of view.

The popular alarm concerning the attempts detected last Friday and Saturday to set fire to nearly all the hotels in this city has sensibly subsided. It would have subsided sooner if the authorities had taken the precaution to ascertain and make public definite accounts of the transactions in each place, and not left so much to the imagination of newspaper reporters, whose delight and profit it is to make sensations. There was enough to create excitement and frighten the community, without working up, as was notoriously done in several quarters, trivial incidents into proofs of a deadly conspiracy. It appears that there were visible signs of attempts to set fire, nearly at the same time, to the principal hotels in the city, by the same means, in the same manner, and, so far as descriptions published go to explain the appearance of suspected persons, by men of the same general appearance, each with a bag in hand, and mostly with 'a little black bag.' Phosphorus and turpentine were the agents employed, and each one of the incendiaries adopted the same means for communicating the fire, by saturating the bedclothes with these combustible preparations, and piling up the furniture. It is one of the curious facts connected with these transactions, that of twelve or thirteen of these attempts, after all these careful preparations, not one succeeded; no damage of consequence was done anywhere except at the St. Nicholas's Hotel, which suffered most, but not very seriously. The fires were discovered and put out with a promptitude as complete as though it were known beforehand where to go and look for them in the nick of time. It is also very remarkable that there has not been discovered yet any clue leading to the discovery of the conspirators, although there must have been a large number of them, and they must have had a place of rendezvous, and the time selected for their work was when the hotel crowds are most in motion. Arrests have been made—one of them of an officer in one of Mr. Lincoln's black regiments, but he was released although the fire in that hotel broke out in the room to which he was assigned, on the proof that he had not gone to it. The doings of the police are secret, but not so secret but that it leaks out that they have made no discoveries yet. The military authorities take up the investigation as a military crime, and General Dix has issued orders for the trying of accused persons by a military commissioner, and, if found guilty, hanging them without delay. Had Governor Seymour been reelected, General Dix would not thus have supplanted both the State and municipal jurisdiction over crime in this city by military will. That same idea is expressed in the proclamation of Mayor Gunther, in which he asks that in the prosecution of these enquiries 'the course of justice may be maintained inviolate,' and 'a fair and impartial trial' be had, according to the constitution of the State—a feeble assertion of constitutional rights, which will be treated with derision. The result, so far as had transpired yesterday, is given in one of the most quiet of the sensation journals thus:—'Against two of the persons taken into custody on the night of the fire, or on Saturday, there is evidence. One of them is charged with being the treasurer of the plotters; and some of the gold thought to be a part of the fund he used is in possession of the authorities; while the man had some baggage that is supposed to have belonged to persons in the conspiracy. Another man is well known and notorious as a rebel. There is some proof that he was one of the plotters, if not one of the incendiaries.'

I do not know what further may transpire; but this is but a meagre list of facts and suspicions on which to base the general outcry of the press that this was an atrocious plot of the authorities at Richmond to burn up the city of New York, and make a holocaust of its inhabitants, in revenge or retaliation for the severities of war administered by Sherman and Sheridan, that it has been discovered that the plotters are lieutenants and other officers in the rebel service, who engineered the plot in Canada and came down here to execute it. Everything yet is of the vaguest conjecture; and since the alarm has begun to subside, persons not absolutely crazy with the war passion begin to be suspicious of a 'conspiracy' to make capital for the Government party by a system of gross exaggeration and misrepresentations.

MEN-STEALING IN CANADA.—The Montreal Weekly Herald contains an account of two cases of kidnapping British subjects in that city. In the first case, one Theophile Houle had succeeded in manœuvring a man named Charles Koby by a bounty of two dollars over to Rouse's Point, where he was handed over to two accomplices of Houle and duly enlisted in the Federal army. After two months Koby escaped, returned to Montreal, and revenged himself by arresting Houle. In the second case, one Cyrille Berthelet enlisted a man named James Champ for $200. Arrangements were duly made, and Champ proceeded to the railway station. There, however, the police were on the alert, and arrested the whole party.

CHICAGO.

NOTES OF AN EXCURSIONIST.

I NOW proceed to give you some account of my visit to Chicago, and first of the hotel at which I have been staying.

The Fremont House is the largest hotel that I have seen as yet, though I am told that it is beaten by those in New York. It is a splendid block of buildings, arranged very much upon the principle of the St. Lawrence Hall at Montreal, with the exception that the basement floor of the block is occupied by shops in the exterior, while the inner portion is devoted to the offices and kitchens. The reception rooms are gigantic, the dining room still more so, and the noise and bustle of the establishment surpass anything you can imagine. It would be all very comfortable if it were not for that notorious American peculiarity, tobacco-chewing, and its unavoidable consequences. It is a matter which every visitor to this country has written and talked of, and I had heard on all sides so much about it that I thought the evil was much exaggerated. But now that I have come and seen for myself the extravagant extent to which this beastly practice is carried, and the disgusting filthiness of habits attendant upon it, I can assure you that Russell and Sala have not said a word too harsh on this subject, which is a crying stain upon the enlightened civilisation of this people. I know I am in the West only as yet, where refinement of manners is little cultivated at present, and I am assured that tobacco-chewing, though by no means uncommon in the East, is there conducted in a much more gentlemanly style. But refine as you will, you can't indulge in this luxury and not offend against the laws of decent society. If a man 'chews' he must spit, and expectorated tobacco-juice must be nasty. You might say naturally enough, Why not use the spittoons? Impossible—they would be swamped in no time. There are plenty of dark and dirty corners in the halls and passages of every hotel, where, in the centre of a nauseating triangle of deep brown splashes and greasy blotches of black, you will find a brown earthen vessel sustaining an ill-directed fire of reddish fluid from the thousand passing throats; but plentiful as these vessels are they are quite unequal to the demand. So the Yankee makes a spittoon of every floor upon which he stands. No matter of what material it consists, carpet or marble, he must spit. From the pavement in the street within a dozen yards of the front door to the passages in the attics, the steps, corridors, and staircases are one vast uncivilised pigsty. You can hardly find a man in one of whose cheeks you won't see a protuberance like the nuts in a monkey's jaw; you can't watch his mouth for two minutes without observing a brown streak flying from it in amongst the boots of the bystanders. You converse with one of these biped cuttle-fish, and it makes no difference in the activity of his bronchial muscles; enter into conversation with two or three of them, and you'll have to keep it up under a cross fire of murky jets squirted across your face, over your shoulder, between your legs, over your hat—everywhere, in fact, within a bare inch of your person, as if you were standing up to a performance of the Chinese juggler's impalement. But I must give the Yankees credit for being a match for any of our Wimbledon shots; their oral accuracy of aim is really surprising, and, like the Indian's skill with his bow, only to be accounted for by constant practice following upon early education in the art, and juvenile experiments upon flies on the walls. And if the sight of all this nastiness is offensive to the eye, the unmannerly noises by which it is accompanied are even more nauseous to the ear. Some of these fellows will retch and hawk in such a way that you would think they would spit themselves inside out; no weak-minded patient, under the influence of an electro-biologist's evil eye, could be more demonstrative in his efforts to get rid of the fancied poison. But I dare say you will be wondering how the ladies put up with all this beastliness. They don't; they have a separate establishment of their own—a separate entrance, separate drawing-rooms, separate staircases in every hotel. They could not associate with the majority of the men whose habits are so diabolical, so they sit, go out, and come in by themselves, except in the case of husbands and wives, brothers and sisters, and so on, in which cases, of course, a man is admitted to the ladies' drawing-rooms; not that he is imperatively excluded under other circumstances, but it is unusual for a gentleman unattended by ladies to venture into the sanctum of the fair sex. This reminds me of a curious feature I have frequently observed in the manners and customs of this people, which is, the unjust preference given at all the railways, steamboats, and hotels to any man who can claim any sort of connection with any member of the opposite sex who will give him her protecting wing. I have remarked on the unfair advantages given to the weaker sex themselves, and now I must tell you of the still more unjust privileges conceded to men who are taken to be travelling with them. In England and on the continent of Europe we are accustomed—I can't deny it—to look upon the presence of a female companion as a drawback to the facilities of comfortable locomotion; but here I can assure you that a bachelor has a hard time of it unless he has skill or impudence enough to attach himself to the skirt of some guardian angel. If you don't mind doing a little bit of Yankee smartness, you can easily manage to represent yourself as 'compagnon de voyage' to some fair or unfair protector. I am not particular to a T in a matter of this kind; the system is so absurd that I consider myself justified in resorting to any low artifice that may tend to demonstrate its folly, so I have constantly tried some impromptu dodge of practising an imposition upon the railway conductor or the steamboat steward, and several times with complete success. With some officials the doing of a little light porterage in the way of a shawl or a dressing-case I have found to be quite sufficient to identify me as 'belonging to that lady.' With one it was necessary to do some heavier work, and carry a very dirty disagreeable baby for an extremely ugly ill-dressed mother, before I could induce him to give me a berth as 'one of the party.' It's a scandalous system altogether. Even granting that the females ought all to be accommodated first—a matter upon which I have my doubts—I see no principle whatever upon which the same privileges are to be extended to any loafer who passes himself off as in any way connected with them in preference to a man who may have been waiting twice as long for a place, but unfortunately happens to be alone and honest. While the rule is so easily evaded it is not much hardship, for the people are extremely free and easy, and you have no difficulty in getting into conversation with any one; but at the same time I object very much to the bother of constantly dressing myself in false colours, and I have had serious thoughts of hiring some old woman to travel with me through the West. Any specimen of her sex would do equally well, and next time I visit this extraordinary country I must find some means of making a more satisfactory provision for the evasion of this extravagant rule.

I don't know that I have anything articular to say about the city of Chicago. You know, of course, how it lies, on the south-west corner of the Lake of Michigan; and you have heard how the streets that now contain nearly 300,000 inhabitants were, less than thirty years ago, open prairie. Never, I suppose, since the birth of history has a new town sprung to life with more marvellous fairylike rapidity than have the stone and marble edifices that compose this great mushroom city of the plain. To walk through the broad handsome streets and inspect the lofty buildings on either side, and then to think that twenty-nine years ago there were scarce a dozen shanties on the spot, is to attempt to realise a thing so difficult of comprehension that the mind becomes sceptical and refuses to believe it. But so it is; and if you consider for a moment the site on which the city stands—the head of the vast central plain of the North American continent—a region of natural fertility elsewhere unmatched—its facilities for water communication with the Eastern States and Europe—its position, the focus to which converge the lines of railway from all parts of Illinois and Indiana, from Wisconsin and Iowa (States which constitute the richest district of this agricultural wealth)—the long neglect of these natural resources, and the rapid development now consequent upon their discovery—it becomes easier to understand how it is that Chicago has thus rapidly become what it now is, the greatest primary grain depot in the world, the fountainhead of the vast stream of commerce which passes round the great lakes down the St. Lawrence, bearing the bountiful produce of the Western States to the markets of Europe. The city is, in fact, what the Democrats would have it recognised to be, the capital of the Western States; and I think the day is not far distant, when Chicago and St. Louis—a city whose progress has been equally astounding—will be pitted in all the jealousy of a struggle for election to the honour of being the commercial metropolis of a Western Confederacy.

On Sunday I attended service at the fashionable church, a very fine one—the churches in all these new cities are handsome and abundant—and heard a most eloquent sermon in the style of Dr. Goulburn, and music such as I never heard at any other place than Exeter Hall, performed by four professionals, whose singing was the most delightful specimen of sacred harmony that the most critical ear could wish to listen to. The rest of the day was spent in promenading the town. Sunday is not well observed, for the foreign element in the city is enormous; and those shops that do no business on the Sabbath open their doors and windows, so that to the eye of a careless observer the trade might seem to be as lively as on any week-day. There was a violent storm raging on the lake, which agitated the waters just as much as I have ever seen them troubled in the English Channel, and the promenade by the lake shore was consequently deserted for more sheltered quarters of the city. But we walked to the end of it just to get a view of some of the magnificent houses that have lately been erected on the lake shore by the more lucky of the great grain speculators of Chicago—splendid mansions many of them, red free-stone or white marble, adorned with greenhouses, creepers, and standard vines, worthy residences for English peers, though lightly spoken of as 'summer boxes' by the nobodies who have screwed a fortune out of this wretched war, and can't get rid of it fast enough with all the gambling and extravagance of this precocious city.

One peculiarity about the majority of the buildings, characteristic of the gigantic scale upon which, like the Egyptians of old, the Americans love to work, is the fact that they have been bodily raised in blocks of ten to forty or fifty houses at once from the original level at which they stood. The city was apparently run up in such reckless haste that the question of drainage was entirely forgotten, and it was not until successive inundations of the basement floors, which then stood below the level of the lake, warned the inhabitants of their precarious and unhealthy situation, that the attention of the architects was seriously called to the necessity for a change. English eyes, so they tell me here, would have seen no other way out of the difficulty than to pull down the whole city and reconstruct it on a higher level. But Yankee smartness knew a trick worth two of that, and with a bold defiant determination to outstrip all the wonders of the Old World, and 'whip its engineers out of their boots'—a Yankee simile which you would better appreciate if you were to see the great ponderous square-toed Wellingtons worn by the true American citizens, and the difficulty they have in getting into or out of them—conceived the original idea of lifting the whole city bodily into the air, and, by the aid of powerful screws and other 'Yankee notions,' it is now a fait accompli.

The next day was wet, cold, and uncomfortable. I don't believe in climate; it's a failure everywhere. People point here to their blue skies and clear atmosphere, and tell you they 'guess you don't see anything like that at home,' under the impression that the sun is a sort of illuminated plane, of which we in England only see the wrong side. But I frequently have the honour of explaining to them that 'November fogs' are not usual in July and August'; and that malarious fevers, which result from the fearfully sudden changes of the American climate, are incidents of a rarefied atmosphere which 'the Britishers' would be unwilling to take in exchange for their dull leaden skies and equable temperature. The fashionable disease here is not gout, but biliousness. There's a bilious look about everybody's face that makes the whole nation pale and yellow as children at the game of snapdragon—a jaundiced gamboge in the visages of the men that makes me think they must have swallowed the gold that has so mysteriously absented itself from the public gaze in favour of the countless raids of greenbacks with which the country is overwhelmed. But, barring their sallow looks and yellow-ochre tint of countenance, these Western men and women are a marvellously fine race. Their frames are tall, well proportioned, symmetrical, and wiry. The average height of the men is astonishing. I have walked for hours in the streets of Chicago without meeting a native as short as myself. Most of their hats are almost out of sight—if I were shortsighted, would be totally. The women are tall, though not gawky, yet not exactly elegant. I have not yet decided where the defect lies, but there's something wanting somewhere. I think it's in the walk, which is rather duck-like, with an affectation of 'sail' or 'sweep' that looks 'stagy.' A little more rotundity of form to take off the corners would be required by an English connoisseur; but Yankee girls, like the men, are not given to lateral extension—they grow like poplars rather than pollards. Square and angular, however, though they be, all praise is due to their cast of features, which is in every case more or less classical, in some really beautiful. The cheekbones are too high, the eyes too deeply set, particularly in the men, to make the full face represent the perfect type of beauty, but I am sure that no other nation that I know anything of could show so large a proportion of fine profiles. I have looked diligently for an ugly face—by which I mean one that has no features at all, such as we often see in England—but I have not been able to discover one that might not at least be considered passable. The percentage of good-looking people is undoubtedly far higher in America than it is at home, though the percentage of 'beauties' is as certainly less. But the good looks are temporary, as you have often heard. Beauty fades in this climate as prematurely as the leaves fall from the trees. But its early death is not all due to atmospheric influences; it is a constitutional decay. Englishwomen will, in some cases, retain out here their youthful looks, long after their contemporaries of the Yankee tribe have buried theirs in sallow sunken cheeks, and hollow eyes, and toothless angular jaws—just as I observe some English trees in the public gardens fresh and green as in early spring, while their American brothers around them are already putting on their autumn dress. This is one view of the American 'constitution' which to a medical man must be very interesting. I don't profess to account for it. Climate is a large element in this shortlived youthful freshness, this premature aridity of the vital fluids; but sweets, pie-crust, and iced water, immoderately indulged in from the cradle to the grave, have, I suspect, as much to do with it. Yet it is a matter of national interest; for it is an acknowledged fact that if the population of the United States were left to the natural increase of the pure American blood, the census would never justify the confident expectations of the people as to their marvellous numerical growth.

But I have no time to tell you how surprised I was to find the American character so radically different from the English—how numerous are the points in which this great diversity consists. I am at a loss to know how to give you any idea of the general impressions I have formed of the Western people of this Continent, but I think they may be briefly expressed by saying that, physically, the men and women are Scotch, with French heads; intellectually, they are educated Japanese; socially, they are French without manners; morally, they are Spaniards without romance. In a word, they are un-English. The Continental European element enters largely into their composition. One-fourth of the shops in certain quarters of Chicago bear German names and signs. Immigration daily adds to the kettleful of nationalities, and climate warms the blood of the Anglo-Saxon ingredient; so the Western settlers become, like other inhabitants of the same parallels of latitude all the world over, hot, peppery, choleric, impulsive, foolishly impatient of anything that the most sensitive of Heidelberg duellists could distort into what he calls an insult to his honour, inflammable in the company of females as a lion or a bull. They tell me that pistols and bowie-knives are not so ruthlessly employed as they were four years ago. The war has diverted men's passions into another channel, organised and concentrated them in a direction in which they can have full play; so that travellers by the Mississippi boats have given up the good old practice of sitting down to 'whist' and 'enchre' with revolvers beside them on the table, and street murders are almost out of date. But there is still a marvellous recklessness of human life and Lynch-law atrocities. Every day since I have been in the West I have read in some paper or other a paragraph or two, or more, recording the summary shooting of some fancied enemies. The climax is always introduced by a statement that the victor 'drew'—not 'a,' but 'his revolver,' as if a pistol were as naturally to be found in a man's pocket as his handkerchief. No legal consequences seem to follow this promiscuous use of 'repeaters.' There are no police to take notice of it, or, if there are, they'll be 'mum' for a 'cocktail.' Persons with whom I have talked tell me they make a practice of carrying one of these civilising emblems of the westward march of Christianity. Sometimes I have had this humiliating confession from the mouth of a well-educated 'high-toned' gentleman; at others, from the lips of daredevil youngsters, who seemed very incredulous of my assertion that my only weapon of offensive warfare was a toothpick. One gentleman told me he carried a pistol merely as a protection against the soldiers, with which the country now swarms; but I have never found any of them so thirsty after English blood as the New York Herald would indicate. Now and then I have had to listen to brilliant invectives against the despotisms of Europe, and the British Government in particular (for Britishers are looked down upon by a Yankee as perhaps the most overridden of all the Continental peoples); but I have bitten my lips and held my tongue, and being, I consider, tolerably slow to wrath, I have managed without much difficulty to keep my skull unriddled with slugs. Besides, I feel confident that it is by no means necessary to get into any such scrapes. It is easy to avoid the 'bars,' where, in nine cases out of ten, these little 'affairs' originate; and if you are unfortunate enough to impress a native so favourably as to lead him to demonstrate his liking for you by requesting that you'll join him in 'a drink'—it's his invariable method of showing his fancy, and refusal is instant death—a very small amount of tact, and a moderate capacity for suction, will keep your friend's right arm quiet. But the evil is fast dying out, and, when the country becomes settled again, will, I dare say, become as much a thing of the past as the duelling of the Bois de Boulogne. Four years of civil war have so disturbed the machinery of the law, and unsheathed the evil passions of men, that it is the height of Utopian absurdity to come out here looking for a millennium. Still, the fact remains that the administration of justice must be very imperfect, if every one is compelled and allowed to take the law into his own hands.

This brings me to say a word about the Courts and their eccentricities, which very much shocked my English notions of judicial decorum and etiquette. The City Hall, in which the Courts sit, is a handsome building in an open square. The entrance hall and staircases are finished off in a style corresponding to the grandeur of the exterior, and in any other country than Western America would be pleasant and airy lounges; but the marble floors are chequered with dark-yellow blotches, and intersected with brown streams, in which float ends of cigars and used-up quids of tobacco, and the windows are all shut down as if from fear that the effluvia from this Augean stable might poison the whole city; how I wished for a pair of pattens, and a very bad cold! The courts were not yet sitting, but the crowd led me into a large well-lit neatly-furnished chamber, in which was to come on that morning a heavy case of libel. There were no benches or desks in front of the judges' seats; but an open semicircular space, sprinkled with little settlements of chairs, upon which were seated, in earnest conversation, the lights of the Chicago bar. Under the judges' seats was a table with pen and ink upon it, about as many papers as might be seen at home on a ten-days-old barrister's table, and about half-a-dozen pairs of square-toed boots, whose owners were finishing their post-prandial cigars, and spitting at a colossal reservoir that might have been a spittoon of the Titans. Nearer the door, and separated from the semicircle by an elegant iron railing, were commodious benches for the public, in one of which, after a careful search for a clean place for my boots, I sat down for a survey of the scene. I waited some minutes, but nothing seemed likely to be commenced, so I asked when the judge would come into court. 'Oh, he's been here some time; that's him in the white wide-awake, with his legs on the iron railing.' 'Indeed,' I said, 'who is he talking to?' 'Oh! they're two of our great lawyers; that one that spat just then, is to be our next new judge.' 'Well,' I said, 'how long will the judge keep us?' 'I guess he won't be long, he always has a bit of chat first before he goes up into his box.' You may suppose from this conversation that my ideas of judicial etiquette were rather rudely shocked. Only think of our Master of the Rolls, or any other equally consequential unbending occupant of our bench, chatting away with the bar and the clerks in the centre of the court preparatory to the business of the day! Fancy the Lord Chief Baron in shorts and a slouch-hat, with a quid in his cheek, and his feet above his head, discussing the topics of the day with a knot of similarly-clad rowdies in a like horizontal position, and then, when he thought the public patience exhausted, clearing his throat with a roar that would have done credit to a lion, ascending his seat to take the business of the morning, and from his chair across the desk before him discharging his exhausted quid at the Brobdignagian vessel of abomination that occupied the centre of the sacred semicircle. But this is just what I saw in the chief court of the State of Illinois, and just, I suppose, what may be seen any day in that same polite assembly. You might think, perhaps, as I did, that nothing could ever be done in such a chaos of anomalies as that; but here again is the great enigma of these Republican institutions. No sooner had the judge taken his seat than the work was begun, and pushed through with a rapidity and regularity that astonished me. Motions were taken and polished off in a way that would have horrified V. C. Kindersley. There did not appear to be any books, or bags, or papers in the room. A small pocket memorandum was all that I could see in the hands of most of the barristers, while some did their work with the help of nothing more than a walking-stick. There was very little said; in fact, most of the business was transacted in a private whisper with the judge; each man who had anything to move going up the steps and leaning forward over the side of the judge's desk, across which there flew a few hurried words, and the thing was done. There was no visible usher of the court, and yet there was no noise or confusion; no bags, wigs, and gowns, but yet a certain amount of rude unpolished etiquette: no dignity on the Bench, but a smart business-like decision which commanded respect. Indeed, I almost began to think that the abolition of our court paraphernalia would expedite the transaction of our business, and should have voted in its favour, only that just as the thought crossed my mind the judge aimed again at the spittoon, and back came all my loyalty to our time-honoured institutions like a rush of blood to the head. He could not have done that in a wig.

The libel case came on shortly afterwards. It seemed to be conducted much as it might have been at home. The jury were sworn, as in Scotland, with the right arm uplifted, and were addressed in a voluble speech, which consisted chiefly of vulgar abuse of the opposing counsel, who paced up and down the semicircle during the delivery of the address, ever and anon venting his wrath in a nauseating attack upon the spittoon. With a powerful peroration the speaker wound up, and in an instant his feet were on the table before him, and a fresh quid was in his mouth. What was said in answer to his attack I am unable to say, for the atmosphere of the court was oppressive (the day being very sultry), and a retreat was imperative. So we fled from the presence of the law to that of a mysterious individual whose acquaintance we had made in the cars, and who had asked us to come and call on him. We found him in a little wooden cottage, crowded with sumptuous furniture, and looking, for all the world, like a pawnbroker's shop. Beside him was sitting, in costume that looked much more like a 'chemise de nuit' than a 'robe du matin,' a big bouncing Yorkshire woman, whom he introduced as his wife; and the other occupant of the house was his son, who had opened the door for us, a precocious young brat of twelve, with a couple of gaudy rings. Mr. K—— himself (an expectorator of true transatlantic calibre) was reclining upon a luxurious sofa, shoeless, coatless, vestless; smoking a magnificent cigar, and being fanned by his wife. He was a smart clever man, and had given us much information in the cars about the country and the people, but had mystified us exceedingly about himself and his occupation. So we thought we would pump him again, and thence came about our visit. He had talked about the great coal oil trade and the Oil City of Pennsylvania, so we tackled him about it, and he confessed that he had, till a few days ago, been largely engaged in the trade, in fact, had been one of the largest proprietors of the oil works; but a little reverse had befallen him, and so he had 'executed a masterly flank movement' into the suburbs of Chicago, where he intended to lie by for a few months, and raise the wind for a fresh start in life. He had been occupying an enormous house at the Oil City, built with the money he had there made at a pace which whipped all the incredible stories of the golden-showered fortunes of San Francisco, and now he was next to penniless; so he had packed up some of his best furniture, and settled in this humble cot to retrench a little before venturing into the speculating world again. Now this case is one only of a thousand. Commercial gambling is carried on here to such a fatal extent, that a failure of this kind is thought as little of as an attack of dyspepsia. Indeed, I have heard it said that a man is not reckoned 'smart' till he has had a break-down, and 'smartness,' Anglicè dishonesty, is the highest trait in the successful American's character. The social ladder is a sort of fire-escape, from the top of which a man may slide to the bottom without damaging himself, and find plenty of friends to help him up again: for credit is cheap; you can get it anywhere; everybody will take you on trust—a strange inconsistency of Yankee nature which has struck me constantly on my travels—and expect you to do the same in return; and if you do, be alive, for everybody lives on his neighbour, and the least smart goes to the wall. That was where we found Mr. K—— just then, but he had a scheme in hand for righting himself, and as it makes no difference out here what a man was to the public, who look only to what he is, it mattered not that the line of speculation he was about to try was as remote from that in which he had failed as the two poles. What it actually was he kept within his breast; but it might have been anything on earth that ever brought in a man an honest or dishonest penny. A lawyer will come to grief and turn tailor, a banker will stop payment and become 'a traveller,' a shoe-black may fail and take to politics and be a cabinet minister. No questions are asked about the past; bygones are unreservedly bygones; family stigma is as little regarded as ancestral respectability. Every American citizen, like the meanest of French corporals, carries a marshal's bâton in his knapsack. 'Non quis, sed quid,' is the question put to every one, the test of merit, the principle of reward. Parentage, pedigree, lineal superiority, are disregarded. Integrity gives place to 'smartness'; social position to unscrupulous ingenuity. Good stock is a weight upon a man's back, beneath which he can rarely struggle against the immigrant upstarts from the East, and not be beaten in the race. Good blood is a curse to a man that brings down on his head, in language more violent than John Bright's or any other unprincipled demagogue that ever disgraced our country's name, all the foolish prejudices and savage denunciations of these enemies of what they call 'Europēān aristocracy.' So the men of real worth are kept below the surface by the mushroom nobodies that are always coming to the top like the stones on a ploughed field, to be removed perhaps as quickly, but only in favour of other 'shoddy' more pushing and unscrupulous than themselves. The social scale has become inverted. Man is looked upon as a mere machine of so much dollar-making power, and no matter what the internal economy of the works, the productive capacity is the only thing regarded. And he that makes the largest amount of money (I can't say 'income,' for commercial success is not stable or durable enough to permit men here to talk of annual 'incomes'), he that fills the biggest coffers with the greatest rapidity and ease, is the smartest, the best man.

All this was well explained to us by Mr. K—— himself. He made no secret of the thing. He detailed to us one or two of his smartest tricks in the short years of his commercial life, and propounded to us others that were then brewing under his presiding care; and so confident was he of his eventual success that he invited me over to see him this time next year, in a mansion twice as large as that he had just quitted; and I felt very much inclined to accept his offer just out of curiosity to see what can be done in this wonderful country by the most original of all virtues, Yankee smartness.

Well, I must not write any longer on this theme. Our stay in Chicago was a very amusing one, for we dived into every corner of the city, in order to see every phase of Western life. But of course there are no objects worthy of description in the smaller streets, nothing like the picturesque poverty of an Italian town, or the plain naked pauperism of London. Some of the larger thoroughfares are still unfinished, for the city is in its infancy, and in those there yet remain a few wooden châlets, which will in a short time give place to white marble blocks, like those that already stand around them. The city officers have already interdicted the erection of any more wooden houses to insure the safety and magnificence of the town; and ten or fifteen years hence when the great streets are all complete, and every building is fronted with marble, Chicago will be as grand a city as any on this continent. From the top of the lantern turret of the Court House there is a splendid view of the city and the suburbs, with the lake and the prairies on either side.

After a survey of the prospect, we walked down to the wharf, and saw over one of the famous 'elevators' that have made the fortunes of so many Western grain merchants. I have no time to describe its operation; but you may imagine the ingenious economy of time and labour gained by the working of these elevators, by being told that the largest vessel that plies upon the Northern lakes can be unshipped of its load of grain (which is carried in bulk), in the course of a few hours. The vessels draw up under the walls of these gigantic buildings, and into the hold is thrust a great elephantine trunk, which sucks up the loose grain to the topmost story of the house. There it is cleaned, and winnowed, and sorted, and in a few minutes down it comes again through several pipes, according to its quality, into the railway trucks that draw up to receive it at the back of the building, and so it goes off to the markets of the East. That which we visited was one of the largest of all, an enormous pile of wood, looking like an overgrown barn, or a very fine specimen of a Pickford's van. It had three great trunks at work upon the cargo of three grain ships, and a regular depot of trucks behind it receiving the grain which it rained forth in a host of golden showers. Inside all was noise and dust. We threaded our way some distance through it to get a notion of the business going on within, but the din stunned us, and the dust stifled us, and we skedaddled into the open air again, more bewildered than edified by our visit, and very hot and peppery, as if we had been racing in a flour-sack, or been pelted with 'confetti' at a Roman carnival. I can't tell you how many of these elevators there are along the quays of Chicago, but their number is considerable, and their proportions are huge; and the sight of these in operation, with the busy aspect of the harbour, the river, and the wharves, would enable you to form some estimate of the vast grain business that has raised this city like magic from the prairie.

I don't know that I have anything else to tell you of Chicago, except that the mosquitos are ten times as troublesome as any that I met in Malta. They don't seem to bother the natives, perhaps their blood is too bad to be worth the sucking, or else they are naturally mosquito proof; but the instinctive attentions of these insects to a stranger from the old world beat those of the most vigilant terrier that was ever set to welcome visitors in a yard. But it is no joke to receive too much of their attentions, as I did on the first night of my stay in the city; and it is a dreadful waste of the precious hours that ought to be devoted to peaceful slumber, to spend one-fourth of them in clearing the mosquito curtains and the bed-clothes of the almost invisible enemy. And shake the curtains and the counterpanes as you will, flip about your towels as you may, you are tolerably sure to leave in some hidden corner one of the most active of his tribe, who will wait upon you as soon as you have tucked yourself up for the night, and considerately attend you till the day, trumpeting around your ears to announce his vigilance, as he looks out for a soft spot to settle upon, where the skin is thin and blood abundant. (And though I am not given to spirituous liquors, I find that the place which suits them as well as any other is the extremity of my nose.) Yes, mosquitoes are the bane of every hot climate. The more I travel, the more convinced am I that Dr. Hooker is right, in pronouncing climate to be 'a failure everywhere.' But there are other agencies of personal annoyance besides mosquitoes, and of all the worst are the flies. In England we are accustomed to look on a fly as a quiet, inoffensive animal, easily got rid of when not wanted; but here he is quite another character, the most impudent, brazenfaced, shameless ruffian you can imagine.

THE CROPS OF THE UNITED STATES.—The report of the United States Commissioner of Agriculture for the months of September and October has just been published. Comparing the crops of 1864 with the crops of 1863, he says there is a decrease in wheat of 18,703,213 bushels, in rye of 909,807 bushels, in barley of 850,827 bushels, in potatoes of 3,903,782 bushels, in hay of 1,620,090 tons, in fattening hays of 1,002,658. In oats and Indian corn there was a considerable increase.

SPAIN AND THE SOUTH AMERICAN PROVINCES.

(PRESENTED TO BOTH HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT BY COMMAND OF HIS MAJESTY, MARCH, 1824.)

[Extract of Memorandum of a Conference between the Prince de Polignac and Mr. Canning, held October 9, 1823.

THE Prince de Polignac having announced to Mr. Canning that His Excellency was now prepared to enter with Mr. Canning into a frank explanation of the views of his Government respecting the question of Spanish America, in return for a similar communication which Mr. Canning had previously offered to make to the Prince de Polignac on the part of the British Cabinet, Mr. Canning stated that the British Cabinet had no disguise or reservation of that subject; that their opinions and intentions were substantially the same as were announced to the French Government by the despatch of Mr. Canning to Sir Charles Stuart, of March 31, which despatch that ambassador communicated to M. de Chateaubriand, and which had since been published to the world. That the near approach of a crisis, in which the affairs of Spanish America must naturally occupy a great share of the attention of both Powers, made it desirable that there should be no misunderstanding between them on any part of a subject so important. That the British Government were of opinion that any attempt to bring Spanish America again under its ancient submission to Spain must be utterly hopeless; that all negotiation for that purpose would be unsuccessful; and that the prolongation or renewal of war for the same object would be only a waste of human life, and an infliction of calamity on both parties to no end. That the British Government would, however, not only abstain from interposing any obstacle on their part to any attempt at negotiation which Spain might think proper to make, but would aid and countenance such negotiation, provided it were founded upon a basis which appeared to them to be practicable; and that they would in any case remain strictly neutral in a war between Spain and the colonies, if war should be unhappily prolonged. But that the junction of any foreign Power in an enterprise of Spain against the colonies would be viewed by them as constituting an entirely new question, and one upon which they must take such decision as the interests of Great Britain might require. That the British Government absolutely disclaimed, not only any desire of appropriating to itself any portion of the Spanish colonies, but any intention of forming any political connection with them beyond that of amity and commercial intercourse. That in those respects, so far from seeking an exclusive preference for British subjects over those of foreign States, England was prepared, and would be contented, to see the mother country (by virtue of an amicable arrangement) in possession of that preference; and to be ranked after her, equally with others, on the footing of the most favoured nations. That, completely convinced that the ancient system of the colonies could not be restored, the British Government could not enter into any stipulation binding itself either to refuse or to delay its recognition of their independence. That the British Government had no desire to precipitate that recognition, so long as there was any reasonable chance of an accommodation with the mother country by which such a recognition might come first from Spain. But that it could not wait indefinitely for that result; that it could not consent to make its recognition of the new States dependent upon that of Spain; and that it would consider any foreign interference, by force or by menace, in the dispute between Spain and the colonies, as a motive for recognising the latter without delay. That the mission of consuls to the several provinces of Spanish America was no new measure on the part of this country; that it was one which had, on the contrary, been delayed, perhaps too long, in consideration of the state of Spain, after having been announced to the Spanish Government in the month of December last as settled, and even after a list had been furnished to that Government of the places to which such appointments were intended to be made. That such appointments were absolutely necessary for the protection of British trade in those countries. That the old pretension of Spain to interdict all trade with those countries was, in the opinion of the British Government, altogether obsolete; but that, even if attempted to be enforced against others, it was, with regard to Great Britain, clearly inapplicable. That permission to trade with Spanish colonies had been conceded to Great Britain in the year 1810, when the mediation of Great Britain between Spain and her colonies was asked by Spain, and granted by Great Britain; that this mediation, indeed, was not afterwards employed, because Spain changed her counsel; but that it was not therefore practicable for Great Britain to withdraw commercial capital once embarked in Spanish America, and to desist from commercial intercourse once established. That it had been ever since distinctly understood that the trade was open to British subjects, and that the ancient coast laws of Spain were, so far as regarded them at least, tacitly repealed. That, in virtue of this understanding, redress had been demanded of Spain in 1822 for (among other grievances) seizures of vessels for alleged infringements of those laws, which redress the Spanish Government bound itself by a convention (now in course of execution) to afford. That Great Britain, however, had no desire to set up any separate right to the free enjoyment of this trade; that she considered the force of circumstances, and the irreversible progress of events, to have already determined the question of the existence of that freedom for all the world; but that for herself she claimed and would continue to use it; and should any attempt be made to dispute that claim, and to renew the obsolete interdiction, such attempt might be best cut short by a speedy and unqualified recognition of the independence of the Spanish American States. That, with these general opinions, and with these peculiar claims, England could not go into a joint deliberation upon the subject of Spanish America, upon an equal footing with other Powers whose opinions were less formed upon that question, and whose interests were less implicated in the decision of it. That she thought it fair, therefore, to explain beforehand to what degree her mind was made up, and her determination taken. The Prince de Polignac declared that his Government believed it to be utterly hopeless to reduce Spanish America to the state of its former relation to Spain. That France disclaimed, on her part, any intention or desire to avail herself of the present state of the colonies, or of the present situation of France towards Spain, to appropriate to herself any part of the Spanish possessions in America, or to obtain for herself any exclusive advantages; and that, like England, she would willingly see the mother country in possession of superior commercial advantages by amicable arrangements; and would be contented, like her, to rank after the mother country among the most favoured nations. Lastly, that she abjured in any case any design of acting against the colonies by force of arms. The Prince de Polignac proceeded to say, that, as to what might be the best arrangement between Spain and her colonies, the French Government could not give nor venture to form an opinion, until the King of Spain should be at liberty. That they would then be ready to enter upon it, in concert with their allies, and with Great Britain among the number. In observing upon what Mr. Canning had said with respect to the peculiar situation of Great Britain in reference to such a conference, the Prince de Polignac declared that he saw no difficulty which should prevent England from taking part in the conference, however she might now announce the difference in the view which she took of the question from that taken by the allies. The refusal of England to cooperate in the work of reconciliation might afford reason to think either that she did not really wish for that reconciliation, or that she had some ulterior object in contemplation—two suppositions equally injurious to the honour and good faith of the British Cabinet. The Prince de Polignac further declared that he could not conceive what could be meant under the present circumstances by a pure and simple acknowledgment of the independence of the Spanish colonies, since, those countries being actually distracted by civil wars, there existed no government in them which could offer any appearance of solidity; and that the acknowledgment of American independence, so long as such a state of things continued, appeared to him to be nothing less than a real sanction of anarchy. The Prince de Polignac added, that in the interest of humanity, and especially in that of the Spanish colonies, it would be worthy of the European Governments to concert together the means of calming, in those distant and scarcely civilised regions, passions blinded by party spirit, and to endeavour to bring back to a principle of union in government, whether monarchical or aristocratical, people among whom absurd and dangerous theories were now keeping up agitation and disunion. Mr. Canning, without entering into discussion upon these abstract principles, contented himself with saying that, however desirable the establishment of a monarchical form of government in any of those provinces might be on the one hand, or whatever might be the difficulties in the way of it on the other hand, his Government could not take upon itself to put it forward as a condition of their recognition.

Mr. Secretary Canning to Sir W. A'Court.

Foreign Office: January 30, 1824.

As to any further step to be taken by His Majesty towards the acknowledgment of the de facto Governments of America, the decision must (as has already been stated more than once to Spain and to other Powers) depend upon various circumstances; and, among others, upon the reports which the British Government may receive of the actual state of affairs in the several American provinces. But it appears manifest to the British Government that if so large a portion of the globe should remain much longer without any recognised political existence, or any definite political connection with the established Governments of Europe, the consequences of such a state of things must be at once most embarrassing to those Governments and most injurious to the interests of all European nations. For these reasons, and not from mere views of selfish policy, the British Government is decidedly of opinion that the recognition of such of the new States as have established de facto their separate political existence, cannot be much longer delayed. The British Government have no desire to anticipate Spain in that recognition. On the contrary, it is on every account their wish that His Catholic Majesty should have the grace and the advantage of leading the way in that recognition among the Powers of Europe. But the Court of Madrid must be aware that the discretion of His Majesty in this respect cannot be indefinitely bound up by that of His Catholic Majesty; and that, even before many months elapse, the desire now sincerely felt by the British Government to leave this precedency to Spain may be overborne by considerations of a more comprehensive nature—considerations regarding not only the essential interests of His Majesty's subjects, but the relations of the Old World with the New. Should Spain resolve to avail herself of the opportunity yet within her power, the British Government would, if the Court of Madrid desired it, willingly afford its countenance and aid to a negotiation commenced on that only basis which appears to them to be now practicable; and would see without reluctance the conclusion, through a negotiation on that basis, of an arrangement by which the mother country should be secured in the enjoyment of commercial advantages superior to those conceded to other nations. For herself, Great Britain asks no exclusive privileges of trade, no invidious preference, but equal freedom of commerce for all. If Spain shall determine to persevere in other counsels, it cannot but be expected that Great Britain must take her own course upon this matter when the time for taking it shall arrive; of which Spain shall have full and early intimation. Nothing that is here stated can occasion to the Spanish Government any surprise. In my despatch to Sir Charles Stuart, of March 31, 1823, which was communicated to the Spanish Government, the opinion was distinctly expressed that 'time and the course of events had substantially decided the separation of the colonies from the mother country; although the formal recognition of those provinces as independent States by His Majesty might be hastened or retarded by various external circumstances, as well as by the more or less satisfactory progress in each State towards a regular and settled form of government.' At a subsequent period, in a communication made in the first instance to France, and afterwards to other Powers, as well as to Spain, the same opinions were repeated; with this specific addition, that in either of two cases (now happily not likely to occur)—in that of any attempt on the part of Spain to revive the obsolete interdiction of intercourse with countries over which she has no longer any actual dominion, or in that of the employment of foreign assistance to reestablish her dominion in those countries by force of arms—the recognition of such new States by His Majesty would be decided and immediate. After thus declaring to you, for the information of the Court of Madrid, the deliberate opinion of the British Government on the points on which Spain requires the advice of her allies, it does not appear to the British Cabinet at all necessary to go into a conference to declare that opinion anew, even if it were perfectly clear from the tenor of M. Ofalia's instructions that Great Britain is in fact included in the invitation to the conference at Paris. Every one of the Powers so invited has been constantly and unreservedly apprised, not only of each step which the British Government has taken, but of every opinion which it has formed on this subject; and this despatch will be communicated to them all. If those Powers should severally come to the same conclusion with Great Britain, the concurrent expression of their several opinions cannot have less weight in the judgment of Spain, and must naturally be more acceptable to her feelings than if such concurrence, being the result of a conference of five Powers, should carry the appearance of a concerted dictation. If (unhappily, as we think) the allies, or any of them, should come to a different conclusion, we shall at least have avoided the inconvenience of a discussion by which our own opinion could not have been changed; we shall have avoided an appearance of mystery, by which the jealousy of other parties might have been excited; we shall have avoided a delay which the state of the question may hardly allow. Meanwhile, this explicit recapitulation of the whole course of our sentiments and of our proceedings on this momentous subject must at once acquit us of any indisposition to answer the call of Spain for friendly counsel, and protect us against the suspicion of having any purpose to conceal from Spain or from the world.

I am, &c.,

GENERAL LEE.

THE two following letters are already familiar to the public. We print them here because they have given rise to criticism demanding comment.

Arlington, Virginia, April 20, 1861.

General,—Since my interview with you on the 18th instant I have felt that I ought not longer to retain my commission in the army. I, therefore, tender my resignation, which I request you will recommend for acceptance. It would have been presented at once, but for the struggle it has cost me to separate myself from a service to which I have devoted all the best years of my life and all the ability I possessed.

During the whole of that time, more than a quarter of a century, I have experienced nothing but kindness from my superiors, and the most cordial friendship from my comrades. To no one, General, have I been so much indebted as to yourself for uniform kindness and consideration, and it has always been my ardent desire to merit your approbation. I shall carry to the grave the most grateful recollections of your kind consideration, and your name and fame will always be dear to me.

Save in defence of my native State, I never desire again to draw my sword. Be pleased to accept my most earnest wishes for the continuance of your happiness and prosperity, and believe me most truly yours,

R. E. LEE.

Lieutenant-General Winfield Scott, commanding United States' Army.

A copy of the preceding letter was enclosed in the following letter to a sister of the General, Mrs. A. M.:—

Arlington, Virginia, April 20, 1861.

My dear Sister,—I am grieved at my inability to see you. . . . . I have been waiting 'for a more convenient season,' which has brought to many before me deep and lasting regret. Now we are in a state of war which will yield to nothing. The whole South is in a state of revolution, into which Virginia, after a long struggle, has been drawn; and though I recognise no necessity for this state of things, and would have forborne and pleaded to the end for redress of grievances, real or supposed, yet in my own person I had to meet the question whether I should take part against my native State. With all my devotion to the Union, and the feeling of loyalty and duty of an American citizen, I have not been able to make up my mind to raise my hand against my relatives, my children, my home. I have therefore resigned my commission in the army, and, save in defence of my native State, with the sincere hope that my poor services may never be needed, I hope I may never be called on to draw my sword.

I know you will blame me, but you must think as kindly of me as you can, and believe that I have endeavoured to do what I thought right. To show you the feeling and struggle it has cost me, I send a copy of my letter to General Scott, which accompanied my letter of resignation. I have no time for more. . . . . May God guard and protect you and yours, and shower upon you every blessing, is the prayer of your devoted brother, R. E. LEE.—(Times.)

The following letter will also be read with interest. G. W. Custis Lee, to whom it is addressed, is now at Richmond on the personal staff of President Davis, and in command of the immediate defences of the capital:—

Arlington House, April 5, 1852.

My dear Son,—I am just in the act of leaving home for New Mexico. My fine old regiment has been ordered to that distant region, and I must hasten on to see that they are properly cared for. I have but little to add in reply to your letters of March 26, 27, and 28. Your letters breathe a true spirit of frankness; they have given myself and your mother great pleasure. You must study to be frank with the world; frankness is the child of honesty and courage. Say just what you mean to do on every occasion, and take it for granted you mean to do right. If a friend asks a favour, you should grant it if it is reasonable; if not, tell him plainly why you cannot; you will wrong him and wrong yourself by equivocation of any kind. Never do a wrong thing to make a friend or keep one; the man who requires you to do so is dearly purchased at a sacrifice. Deal kindly, but firmly, with all your classmates; you will find it the policy which wears best. Above all, do not appear to others what you are not. If you have any fault to find with any one, tell him, not others, of what you complain; there is no more dangerous experiment than that of undertaking to be one thing before a man's face and another behind his back. We should live, act, and say nothing to the injury of any one. It is not only best as a matter of principle, but it is the path to peace and honour.

In regard to duty, let me, in conclusion of this hasty letter, inform you that nearly a hundred years ago there was a day of remarkable gloom and darkness—still known as the dark day—a day when the light of the sun was slowly extinguished, as if by an eclipse. The Legislature of Connecticut was in session, and as its members saw the unexpected and unaccountable darkness coming on, they shared in the general awe and terror. It was supposed by many that the last day—the day of judgment—had come. Some one, in the consternation of the hour, moved an adjournment. Then there arose an old Puritan legislator, Devenport of Stamford, and said that if the last day had come, he desired to be found at his place doing his duty, and, therefore, moved that candles be brought in so that the House could proceed with its duty. There was quietness in that man's mind, the quietness of heavenly wisdom and inflexible willingness to obey present duty. Duty, then, is the sublimest word in our language. Do your duty in all things like the old Puritan. You cannot do more; you should never wish to do less. Never let me and your mother wear one gray hair for any lack of duty on your part.

Your affectionate father,

To G. W. Custis Lee. R. E. LEE.

TO OUR FRIENDS AND SUBSCRIBERS.

THE INDEX was established in May 1862, in the darkest hour of Confederate fortunes, by earnest friends of Southern Independence, with the distinctly expressed object of being the representative, in English journalism, of a gallant and struggling people appealing to the world not only for political, but still more for moral recognition. Since accepting this great trust, THE INDEX has unceasingly laboured, by the combined aid of English and of Southern writers, to enlarge and extend the common ground upon which two nations may cordially meet, which need only to understand each other in order to cherish the warmest mutual appreciation and lasting friendship. The chief and almost the sole difficulty has been, and is still, the callous indifference of the British Government on the one hand, and, on the other, the perplexity, to the European mind, of the unsolved and unprecedented problems involved in the management and education of four millions of the African race, intermingled with a population of the highest Caucasian type. This difficulty could be met only by a liberal fairness to every shade of honest opinion, by an inflexible adherence to truth under all circumstances, and by a bold avowal of convictions, even though ill received. THE INDEX does not claim to be neutral, but it claims to be independent in the highest sense of that word. It is because it must reflect and appeal to, at one and the same time, the public opinion of two countries as yet only imperfectly acquainted, that this somewhat unusual self-description is called for.

Thanks to arrangements now in successful operation, by which the Letters of regular Correspondents and Newspapers from all parts of the Confederate States are received within from twenty-five to thirty days from their date, THE INDEX is always enabled to present the very Latest Direct News from the South, as well as a faithful reflex of the tone and spirit of the Southern Press.

All communications intended for publication should invariably be addressed to 'the Editor of THE INDEX, 291 Strand, W.C.,' and unless authenticated by a responsible name, can receive no attention.

The War.

We know enough of the progress of SHERMAN'S expedition to assert without hesitation that it has utterly failed in one of its principal objects. The chief aim of the Federal general was undoubtedly to provide a new base for operations against the cotton States on the sea. But only secondary to that was the hope of paralysing the Southern armies of the South-west by the total destruction of the great factories and arsenals on which they were almost entirely dependent for the supply of their warlike material. Undoubtedly the capture of Augusta by SHERMAN would have been a serious, though not a vital, blow to the South; and the fall of Macon would have been hardly less disastrous. That SHERMAN aimed at both these towns there is not the slightest doubt. The whole press was full, within a week of the starting of the expedition, of rumours of the capture of Macon and the defenceless condition of Augusta; and although doubts were here and there expressed as to SHERMAN'S columns reaching the coast without serious opposition, there was no misgiving as to the fate of the two great military workshops of Georgia. It turns out that the Federal army has avoided both towns. When Macon was left unassailed by General SHERMAN'S corps, the ingenuity of Northern journalists found a plausible reason for its safety. SHERMAN'S strategy had completely deceived the Southern leaders; he had made a feint at Macon, and so compelled the Confederates to concentrate their whole force in that town; as soon as he was assured of the presence of the small Southern army 'where he wanted it,' he at once pushed on to Augusta, where he could not possibly encounter opposition, where all was panic, confusion, and helplessness, where slaves were being impressed as soldiers, &c. Federal organs in this country indulged in the same delightful anticipations. It was exultantly pointed out that if BEAUREGARD and HARDEE were at Macon, SHERMAN had placed them out of the fight by his masterly manœuvre, and it was inferred that there could be no army to defend Augusta, or offer opposition to SHERMAN'S further march to the sea. We now know that SHERMAN has found Augusta, as he previously found Macon, too strong to attack, and that, foiled at both these places, he is undisguisedly and avowedly fighting for a safe retreat. That the most desperate efforts will be made to extricate him from his difficulties we doubt not; that great fleets and armies will be put in motion to create a diversion, to make a new base for him, to carry provisions and fodder to his starving men and famished cattle, is to be expected. But there is good reason to believe that the bulk of his army will be beyond help long before help can be forthcoming, and that SHERMAN will expiate, by the loss of a magnificent army, the greatest military blunder of which the North has yet been guilty.

Where SHERMAN'S army really was at the end of last month it is quite impossible to say. A despatch from General GRANT, on the credit of the Richmond Examiner, places it east of the Oconnee River, and well on its way to the coast. But, on the other hand, the rest of the Richmond journals agree in the assertion that for six or seven days SHERMAN had not gained ten miles of ground, and that every day troops were being poured in upon him, in front, in flank, and in rear. BEAUREGARD had anticipated him at Macon, and again at Augusta. BEAUREGARD'S force on the Tennessee River was estimated at 65,000 men, and HOOD has, at the outside, 50,000 soldiers under his immediate command. The balance of the army might be, and probably was, spared to go to the aid of the Georgian volunteers; and if BEAUREGARD could anticipate SHERMAN at Macon, there is no reason why 10,000 men should not follow close in his track, and be in time to take part in the final struggle with the Federal invaders. But it is tolerably certain that Augusta also was, by the end of the month of November, very strongly garrisoned. From Charleston, and from all the towns of South Carolina, veterans and militia had marched to her defence. Troops had been moved down quietly from Virginia; and BRAGG, with the Wilmington garrison, is also reported to have left for the same destination. HAMPTON'S cavalry and WHEELER'S horse were upon the enemy's track. COBB and HARDEE and JOHNSTON and BEAUREGARD were organising and arming the new levies, and superintending the systematic resistance offered to the advancing Federals. It is plain, then, that there must have been by the beginning of the present month a very formidable army in Georgia, and that whatever opposition SHERMAN had met with up to that time would be child's play in comparison with that which he had to expect. And what must have been the condition of his troops by that time? We know that his cavalry had had several hard fights, and on more than one occasion suffered a severe check. We hear of one portion of it, endeavouring to open communications with Beaufort, being cut off and captured. This in itself would show that SHERMAN is in a very critical position. But it must be borne in mind that the subsistence of the whole army depends upon the cavalry. KILPATRICK has not only to fight, but to forage. He must provide the advanced guard, and the rear guard, and the Commissariat of the Federals; and we ask our readers to picture to themselves what must be the state of a cavalry force which has had three weeks of such arduous duties. There is no possibility of remounting the cavalry. Every horse will have been impressed for Confederate service or driven off. Indeed, we shall be surprised, supposing KILPATRICK'S force to have originally consisted of 10,000 men, if, on the 1st of December, there were 5,000 effective troopers in SHERMAN'S army. As to the report of his having received reinforcements, that is very untrustworthy. Unless DAHLGREN and FOSTER could march their gunboats across country, they were plainly in no position to afford aid to SHERMAN. The relief, if it is to come at all, will come in the expedition said to have started from Fortress Monroe for Savannah, or a point farther south. But Savannah is almost unassailable by sea. The safety of Augusta once assured, the army there assembled can be transported in a few hours to Savannah, and, step by step, SHERMAN'S march along the Savannah River will be contested, whilst clouds of Georgian and Carolinian riflemen will gather in his rear, cut off stragglers and trains, and almost as effectually impede his progress as if they fought stubborn battles in his front. SHERMAN may yet escape destruction, and reach the sea; but so far he has done nothing but inspire a keen sense of injury in Southern hearts, a deadlier hate, and a fiercer thirst for revenge. The opening-up of a new line to Atlanta, or the establishment of a new base, will not compensate even in Northern eyes for the loss of the whole of Northern Georgia and Alabama, possibly the severance of the last tie between Tennessee and her Federal oppressors.

The accounts from HOOD'S army are conflicting. A battle appears to have been fought on the 30th, in which, of course, a Federal victory is claimed. But it is significant that the Federals, who are alleged to have repulsed their assailants with heavy loss at all points, retreated some twenty or thirty miles in the night subsequent to the engagement, harassed all the way by the Confederate cavalry, and that two days later they had retired within the defences of Nashville, with the Confederate army but three miles distant. If we are to understand that General THOMAS evacuated Shelbyville after the engagement, it would seem that the Federal army is cut in two and is in great danger. In that case THOMAS'S only line of retreat would be towards Chattanooga. But if Nashville should fall, neither Chattanooga nor Knoxville could be held a month. HOOD'S numbers have been naturally kept secret, but he must evidently be in strong force; and it is certain that his cavalry, an effective veteran force, largely outnumbers the same branch of the Federal service. It is probable, therefore, that the Federal army will be compelled to give up Nashville in its turn, and select a more defensible position with less exposed communications. At any rate, we may look for the news of the most momentous events within the next week or two. At present everything looks favourable for the South. We can hardly expect that everywhere success will attend the gigantic efforts her gallant sons are putting forth; but, to her, defeat means simply present disappointment—to the North, it would be overwhelming and irreparable disaster.

General Lee.

LORD MAHON, in his masterly introduction of Colonel GEORGE WASHINGTON upon the stage of the first War of Independence, dwells with peculiar satisfaction on the correspondence of the great Virginian concerning the Stamp Act and the other harsh measures which emanated from time to time from the British Parliament. That correspondence was marked by extraordinary moderation, and the convictions of the writer were ever steadfast and decided in favour of allegiance to the crown. Then again, when the shadows of civil war began to loom on the horizon, WASHINGTON was less forward and eager than others in declaring or declaiming against the mother-country. This conduct has been urged by way of accusation against him; but, as Lord MAHON observes, it contained no matter of condemnation, but rather a topic of praise. 'Ought not,' says the historian, 'a brave soldier, who had known and seen the havoc of war, to pause longer than any brawling civilian ere he resolves to inflict that havoc on his country? Ought not his reluctance to be stronger still when the war before him is not between nation and nation, but between the sons of the same race and the subjects of the same king? Was it not this very reluctance which, in 1829, impelled the Duke of WELLINGTON to exclaim amidst general applause that, long inured as he had been to scenes of strife, he would make any sacrifice, even of his own life, rather than expose his country to even one month of civil war?' When, however, WASHINGTON had once come to a determination, his magnanimity in perseverance was as conspicuous as his hesitation in coming forward. His high spirit never quailed before defeat, and he declared that if the colonies were overpowered, he would go to the Far West and establish an independent State beyond the Father of Waters.

History repeats itself, and, thank God, great men are created to meet great emergencies. In the second War of Independence, Colonel ROBERT E. LEE, like his great prototype, first chief of the army of Virginia, then the most trusted General of the armies of the Thirteen States, has shown the same hesitation and the same invincible constancy. That hesitation has been distorted into a charge, not against General LEE, for his virtues have silenced tongues against which no human excellence seemed proof, but against those whom the Southerners have chosen for the heads of their civil government. The accusation is that General LEE was and is no believer in the cause for which he fights, and that his services have been enlisted by the artifice of those who 'for their own purposes, or in their own passions, stirred up to madness the intemperate feelings of their countrymen.'

Doubtless many of our readers are familiar with the letters written on April 20, 1861, by Colonel ROBERT E. LEE, and addressed, the one to Lieutenant-General WINFIELD SCOTT, the other to the sister of the writer. As they have been used as a handle for attack against the leaders of the Southern people, we have deemed it right to reprint what was long ago familiar to Southern ears. In those letters General LEE, like a true soldier of honour, regards with inexpressible grief the necessity which compels him to retire from a service in which he had won renown, and which was endeared to him alike by the triumphs of war and of friendship. The reason for his resignation is at once simple and insuperable. General LEE refused to fight against the State of Virginia. Save in defence of his native State, he would never again draw his sword. What is the meaning of this language? Is it not the very substance and marrow of the cause, that a Southerner should fight for the integrity, the sovereignty, and the independence of his State? Is not the doctrine of States Rights the issue on which America has been split asunder? Was not President DAVIS marked out by the Southern people as the great champion of that truth, which alone could insure the existence of constitutional liberty on the Western continent? General LEE has struck upon the very keystone of the fabric which his sword has done so much to consolidate.

Clear, however, as his purpose was not to 'fight against relatives, children, and home,' which thing General SCOTT, to his eternal infamy, has consented to do, the gallant soldier might well doubt before he rushed into civil war. Though his wildest imaginations could never have conceived the atrocities which have been enacted by Northern generals, and at the bare recital of which European blood has curdled, yet he, like WASHINGTON, knew the horrors of war, and he would have forborne and pleaded to save his beloved State from the fate of being the theatre of the contest. When once his resolution was taken to defend his native country, he inscribed on his sword those words with which Lord MAHON would have adorned the sword of WASHINGTON, 'Never draw me without reason; never sheath me without honour.'

In truth, no one would reject the insinuations to which we have alluded with more scorn than General LEE himself. It bespeaks a strange fatuity to suppose that a man of the sagacity and calm foresight of LEE could be drawn into a trap by the artifices of a few politicians. We know, however, from experience of former suggestions of a similar nature, that it is against the chief of the Southern Confederacy that these attacks are directed. No phenomenon has been witnessed more singular in all its features than the notion that a revolution which bids fair to make the great effort of France a mere bubble, was the work of one man. Surely, if this position be true, nature must have combined in this shaker of the Western continent qualities by the side of which the aggregate skill of a thousand HILDEBRANDS and MACHIAVELS sinks into insignificance. If posterity be condemned to read such theories, it will stand aghast at the criticism which beholds in the convulsion of a world, in the mighty struggle of peoples and principles, the mere intrigues of an individual. It will rather recognise the truth, that the South rose as one man to battle against Northern despotism, that she selected her leaders with unparalleled unanimity and wisdom, and adhered to them with a brave confidence which has exploded every fancy of selfish interest and ambitious passion.

The occasion is improved, perhaps under the inspiration of the COBDEN speech, by the repetition of the charge that the Southern leaders have never alleged for their conduct any cause that would bear investigation. It is idle to make proclamation on the house-tops when the mob below shout and refuse to hear; yet what can be more false than this charge? Has CALHOUN never lived, and have the Southern statesmen never endorsed his doctrines? Has President DAVIS delivered no messages to Congress, and has Congress adopted no resolutions setting forth the purposes and dispositions of the Confederate States? What abundance is sufficient to satisfy men who see nothing 'that will bear investigation' in a cause which asserts the inalienable right of 'self-government according to established laws and institutions?'

But since the point has been raised, it may fairly be asked whether the North has alleged for its aggression 'any cause that will bear investigation?' Where is any manifesto to be found justifying, or attempting to justify, a policy which avowedly seeks to exterminate eight millions of people? Is it to be sought in the unintelligible vagaries of Mr. LINCOLN, or the contradictory effusions of Mr. SEWARD? Comparisons of the Mississippi to the Thames, and of Texas to Devonshire, offer no solution; neither is explanation to be discovered even in proposed extensions of the Illinois railroads. The civilised world has a right to demand a clear exposition of the purposes, principles, and dispositions of the Northern Government, and common fairness requires that those who are eager in the challenge should not decline the gage of battle.

Recognition: A Contrast.

WE publish this week some papers, taken from a bluebook issued no less than forty years ago, which seem to possess no little interest and importance as bearing on a question which events are likely ere long again to bring under the consideration of the English Government and the people by whose will and judgment, once decidedly formed and firmly expressed, that Government must perforce be ruled—we mean the question of recognising the Confederate States. The one precedent which the opponents of recognition have ventured to cite in their favour is the case of the Spanish colonies in America. They admit that the instances of Greece, Belgium, and Italy are against them; but they pretend that the case of Spanish America is more appropriate to the present question—that it affords a contrast, rather than an exception, to the rule observed in the instances just mentioned, and a precedent adverse to the claims of the Confederacy. The parallel we are about to draw between the two cases will, we think, show a striking contrast between the conduct of Mr. Secretary CANNING and that of the present FOREIGN SECRETARY.

The war between Spain and her colonies lasted much longer than the present contest has done before the question of recognition could be entertained at all. For this there were several reasons, none of them applicable to the present instance. First, for many years Spain and England were in alliance against the usurpation of JOSEPH and the armies of NAPOLEON; and while this alliance lasted it was of course out of the question for us to entertain the claims of the revolted subjects of our ally. Secondly, the revolt was long unsuccessful, and its fortunes were still longer dubious. There was a powerful Spanish party in the colonies; and the insurgents were, in more than one case, repeatedly reduced to the last extremity. It was very long before the cause of Spain could definitely and confidently be pronounced hopeless. Thirdly, ten years of war in those days, when steam was not, when rifles and rifled artillery were not dreamt of, did less execution than two years of such fighting as has characterised war since 1852. The endurance of a nation is more severely tested by six months of such a struggle as that of 1859 in Italy, or that now raging in America, than by as many years of such desultory strife as that between Spain and her Transatlantic provinces. The question of time, therefore, is irrelevant. It is sufficient to compare the position of Spain in 1824 and of the United States in 1864.

When these communications passed between Mr. CANNING and the French and Spanish Governments, the cause of the colonies was at last in the ascendant. They had often seemed on the verge of submission; it was not impossible that they might be reduced as low again; but for the nonce they had decidedly the best of it. In one or two Spain still continued the contest, at least as successfully as the North maintains it in the border States of the Confederacy. In others she held such foothold as the North possesses in Louisiana and the Carolinas. At sea she was less absolutely superior than are the United States; but whatever stand the colonists were able to make on that element was due entirely to the fact that the British Government had not interpreted the duties of neutrality then in the same sense which it assigns to them now. The navy of the colonists had been created altogether by British shipwrights, British officers, and British crews; and no small part of their successes, whether by land or sea, were due to the chivalric daring and extraordinary skill of Lord COCHRANE. Apart from British interference, the position of Spain seemed quite as good as that of the United States can now be said to be.

There are, however, important points of difference between the two situations. In the first place, the colonists were undoubtedly rebel, in revolt against their legitimate sovereign, whose business it was to prove his inability to conquer them before they could expect to be treated as independent. The Confederacy consists of sovereign States, recognised as such by Great Britain, and fairly entitled to throw the onus of proving the lapse, resignation, or destruction of their sovereign character on the enemy who impeaches it. Secondly, Spain had always avowed her intention to conquer them, and her belief that she could do it. Mr. SEWARD, at the outset of this struggle, in the name of the Federal Government, most vehemently repudiated the intention of conquest, as not only impossible and immoral in itself, but as alien to the whole spirit of the Federal bond. He asked only that we should give him time to prove the Southern people still loyal to the Union before we recognised a government established, as he affirmed, by a violent and factious minority: he has proved the contrary beyond all possibility of doubt, and we are fairly entitled on his own showing to recognise the authority at Richmond as the legitimate Government of the South. Thirdly, that Government has from the first maintained its authority with perfect ease and completeness; and the civil administration of the Confederacy and of the States has gone on as regularly as that of England. The Spanish colonies, on the contrary, almost without an exception, were so destitute of organisation and of settled government, that the Prince de POLIGNAC declared that to recognise their independence would be simply to recognise, sanction, and perpetuate anarchy. So far, therefore, as the claim of the Spanish colonies differed from that of the Confederate States, the latter is decidedly the stronger.

It may be said that the Spanish colonies, though allied, were not confederated, and that Great Britain did not recognise those in which Spain still maintained the contest on an equal footing. But no one can read Mr. CANNING'S language without being perfectly certain that if the colonies had formed a confederacy, Mr. CANNING would none the less have recognised it; leaving it to time to determine which colonies belonged to it and which did not. He would have recognised the Confederate Government as undoubtedly the Government of ten confederate States; he would have left the Border States and the frontier lines an open question.

It may be observed, in passing, that the position of England was not so favourable for recognition then as it is now. Mr. CANNING was the Minister of a Tory King—the Foreign Secretary of a Tory Cabinet—and as such could hardly incline to favour the cause of rebellion. And England was the only country in Europe well disposed towards the colonies; but for her, the Holy Alliance would not have been unwilling to reconquer them for their ancient master. In recognising the colonies, therefore, England had to break with traditions now obsolete, and to offend Powers which would now gladly cooperate with her in acknowledging the independence of the Confederate States. In every respect, therefore, Lord RUSSELL has a better case for recognising the Confederacy, and less cause to shrink from so doing, than had Mr. CANNING in the case of the Spanish colonies—in every respect but one, which the contrast between the conduct of the two statesmen brings into painful prominence.

Mr. CANNING asserts his right boldly, but with perfect courtesy. He would prefer that Spain should have the opportunity of reconciling herself with her offshoots by being the first to acknowledge them as independent States; but he distinctly warns her that Great Britain will not wait upon the obstinacy of Spain. Lord RUSSELL wavers, quibbles, and hesitates—inclines to think that we have no business to acknowledge the Confederacy so long as the United States choose to maintain the war. Lord RUSSELL has no doubt that the South must achieve her independence, and wishes that the North would let her go in peace; but he has never dared to communicate either his conviction or his wish to those whose action they might influence. Mr. CANNING told Spain in the plainest terms that 'the British Government were of opinion that any attempt to bring Spanish America again under its ancient submission to Spain must be utterly hopeless,' and urged upon her, both directly and through her allies, the policy of renouncing her dreams of conquest and negotiating for an equitable and advantageous peace. Lord RUSSELL submissively gave Mr. ADAMS to understand that HER MAJESTY'S Government would not, as matters stood, think of so offensive a step as the recognition of the South; Mr. CANNING firmly declined to 'enter into any stipulation binding him either to refuse or to delay the recognition of their (the colonies') independence.' The Foreign Secretary of 1863 endeavoured to persuade his countrymen that they must wait to recognise the Confederacy till the North should recognise the futility of its hopes; his predecessor of 1823 boldly rested the right of recognition on the conviction of Great Britain that the colonies could never again be subjugated. Mr. CANNING boldly affirmed his country's right; Lord RUSSELL palters with it, equivocates, suppresses, is ready to abjure it, rather than displease the powers that be at Washington.

Lord RUSSELL'S policy has been uncertain, timid, shortsighted. He has allowed our relations with a great empire, our most valuable commercial ally, to be entirely cut off, and made no effort to restore them. He has rejected every proposal for mediation, so afraid is he of a quarrel with the United States. It is nothing to him that a country as large as Europe, and of more importance to us than all Europe, is cut off from all diplomatic relations with the rest of the world—nothing that British interests are sacrificed—nothing that British subjects are without protection. His one object is to avoid a quarrel with the North. What was CANNING'S policy when once his mind was satisfied that the Colonies had established a claim to recognition? He avowed at once his sense of the necessity of recognition on political grounds. 'If so large a portion of the globe should remain much longer without any recognised political existence, or any definite political connection with the established Governments of Europe, the consequences of such a state of things must be at once most embarrassing to those Governments and most injurious to the interests of all European nations.' Surely no one will pretend that the importance of the Spanish-American republics is equal to that of the Confederate States, or that the want of definite political relations with the latter Power is less injurious and embarrassing to European nations? If it were so necessary to institute diplomatic communications with Peru and Ecuador, what must be the folly and inconvenience of a total suspension of relations with the civilised people and wealthy regions of the South! Have we had no experience of that inconvenience—no cause to wish that our American policy had been framed by a CANNING and not by a RUSSELL?

Lord RUSSELL has withdrawn our consuls from the South at the bidding of the United States; Mr. CANNING sent consuls to the Spanish-American ports in utter disregard of the anger and complaints of Spain. British trade must be protected, and British interests secured, in his opinion, however little agreeable the measure might be to a foreign and not very friendly Power; Lord RUSSELL, on the other hand, has more than once rated the merchants of Great Britain for not abstaining from a trade offensive to the United States. Lord RUSSELL insulted the Confederate Government by obliging consuls within its dominions to receive orders from the ambassador at Washington, thus asserting the de jure authority which the South had de facto abolished. Mr. CANNING, in the papers before us, intimates peremptorily his determination to tolerate no assumption, on the part of Spain, of authority over the coasts and ports of the colonies which are de facto emancipated from her rule.

Mr. CANNING frankly urges the interests of Great Britain, so deeply involved in the freedom and prosperity of the Spanish republics, as a reason for their recognition. The interests there involved were trivial indeed compared with those at stake in the cotton States of the Confederacy; and there can be no doubt how Mr. CANNING would act were he living now to carry out the spirit of his policy of 1823. Those who believe Lord RUSSELL to be a more chivalrous statesman than Mr. CANNING may put faith in his professed abhorrence of interested action, and suppose that he is really guilty of sacrificing the welfare of his country to a Quixotic generosity. It is sufficient for us to notice that in each point the arguments of the advocates of recognition now reproduce the language held by Mr. CANNING in this oft-cited case—that in every point the policy of Lord RUSSELL reverses the precedent that has been quoted in his favour. The situation of Spain towards her colonies was that of the United States towards the Confederacy, save that in some respects the claim of the colonies to recognition was weaker than that of their successors. Mr. CANNING decided on recognition, first, because he considered the cause of Spain hopeless; secondly, because it was necessary that some diplomatic relations should exist between the colonies and Europe; thirdly, because it was the interest of England to recognise them. And he repudiated peremptorily the idea that he was bound to wait till Spain had made up her mind to abandon the struggle. Here we have the very argument which has been so often stated in these pages on behalf of the Confederacy, put forth as conclusive by the man who may be said to have founded the modern foreign policy of England.

We may observe that while holding in abeyance for the moment his intention to recognise the colonies, Mr. CANNING uses it very effectively to keep Spain and her allies in check. 'If France helps Spain in this quarrel, we recognise the colonies instanter. If Spain seizes our ships on an illegal pretence (of interdicting trade with the colonies), we will recognise them instanter.' How would Mr. CANNING deal at this day with pretensions and proceedings of the United States which we find it difficult to meet by direct prevention? Would he have hesitated for a moment to say, 'If you seize ships in neutral waters, we recognise the South the next day. If you will enlist Irishmen, our subjects, to fight your battles, we recognise the South.'

What conclusion are we to draw from the striking contrast between the policy of Lord RUSSELL and of Mr. CANNING in regard to the quarrels of the New World? That international law, as regards recognition, has grown stricter since Mr. CANNING's day? That Mr. CANNING was led astray by interest or partiality, while Lord RUSSELL is adhering strictly to the law? Or that, while Mr. CANNING thought the hostility of Spain, with the Holy Alliance at her back, too insignificant to turn him from the path of justice and sound policy, the fear of the United States overshadows Lord RUSSELL's mind so completely, that no policy, however wise and righteous, which might lead to a collision with that dreaded Power can find entertainment or favour there?

Professor Goldwin Smith.

THE Yankees, it must be admitted, have found a zealous and active, if not a valuable, ally in Professor GOLDWIN SMITH. If they have done him great honour at feasts and celebrations, if he has been thought worthy of a seat on the platform with the mellifluous EVERETT, if LINCOLN has entertained him with his latest and best jokes, and BUTLER, in the character of Amphitryon, has received him handsomely at the head-quarters of the army on the James, the Professor has requited these various civilities in a manner the most grateful to the Yankee mind and heart. His letters to the Daily News, in which he 'whitewashes' PRESIDENT and people, will be regarded in the Model Republic as a 'big thing,' and wherever he may go, from Maine to Minnesota, the Professor of Modern History in the University of Oxford will be greeted with the plaudit of 'Bully for you!' True it is that the success of the Oxonian in his amiable labours will excite something of surprise even in Yankeedom, and that many American readers of the American correspondence of the Daily News will be no less astonished than delighted to discover that, after all, LINCOLN is a gentleman, that STANTON is a paragon of truth, and SEWARD the model of ingenuous statesmanship, and that the Beast himself is a most noble Beast, a Beast 'with an iron will,' who crushes all the obstacles in his way (except General LEE's army), a Beast that will occupy in the 'melancholy annals' of the revolution 'a broader and perhaps a less odious page than is commonly supposed.' (See Letter from Washington, November 22, 1864.)

Nota bene, in passing, that Professor GOLDWIN SMITH herein distinctly characterises the war in America as a 'revolution' of which BUTLER is a leader—a philosophical and historical fact which the Yankees have persistently denied, declaring the Southern defence of the Constitution to be a 'rebellion' against their authority, and which they are not likely to accept at his hands with the same complacent approval that will be extended to his other expositions.

While Professor SMITH writes modern history in the Daily News to the entire satisfaction of the Yankees, subject to the exception just stated, it may at least be doubted whether his fugitive essays in this line will be altogether so acceptable to his own countrymen, and especially to the better class of the English public. They have some well-known, and it may be well-founded, prejudices in favour of truth, justice, magnanimity, courage—of devotion to principle, of endurance in a great cause—which run counter to the general drift of the Professor's American letters. It may possibly be gratifying to some Englishmen to be told that perhaps the Yankees are devastating Virginia for their benefit, and 'conquering from slavery a home for the surplus population of England;' but there are others, and they constitute the immense majority, who will not justify the attempt to exterminate a brave people that their lands may pass to the conquerors and their assigns, and who will reject with scorn the implied threats of Professor SMITH that the Yankees will some day or other visit their wrath upon this country and work its ruin. The tone of feeling in Yankeedom, says Professor SMITH, is 'manifestly softening' towards England (rejoice, Britannia! throughout thy borders!); but the Americans (i.e. the Yankees—the 'rebels,' of course, are not Americans) 'are made of flesh and blood, and they will not endure the continuance of so outrageous a wrong' as letting vessels slip out of English ports under command of Confederate officers to prey upon Yankee commerce. Tremble and take warning, ye Britons! Redouble your vigilance, Lords of the Admiralty!—keep a bright look-out all round this 'right little, tight little island,' lest another Alabama get to sea from Clyde or Severn, Humber or Thames; for be ye well assured that should this occur, on the authority of Professor GOLDWIN SMITH, your end draweth nigh—the nation of shopkeepers may as well put up the shutters and close business—the Yankee will demolish the Britisher!

In the opening paragraph of Professor SMITH's last letter an opinion was expressed painfully at variance with the uniform serenity and satisfaction of the writer, which may give to others, as it gave to us, a momentary feeling of depression:—'There is too much reason to fear,' says the generally gamesome and gratified, but now grieving, GOLDWIN, 'that American honour has suffered a great stain.' One is at a loss to know what has happened. It must, indeed, be something quite out of the ordinary line of infamy that can give a stain to 'American honour,' and darken the Punica fides of Mr. SEWARD, and we are conscious of a feeling of disappointment, which is, at the same time, a feeling of unspeakable relief, when we hear that the fears of the Professor are based upon that little matter of the 'accidental sinking' of the Florida. But the writer does not go very far before he recovers his confidence in 'American honour;' and the succeeding sentences are happily turned into the cunningest special pleading to avert from his friends Messrs. LINCOLN, SEWARD, and Co. the odium, be the same more or less, which may attach to that most lucky of all unfortunate casualties. A 'personal escapade' is surely not a 'national offence,' and therefore E Pluribus Unum has nothing to do with it.

So much for 'American honour.' It may occur to some readers on our side the Atlantic that 'English honour' is just a little compromised in this correspondence—that the fame of the ancient University of Oxford may acquire some slight stain from the contamination of BUTLER—and that the character of the English gentleman is too sacred a thing to be committed to a representative so regardless of its glorious traditions. The acceptance of hospitality implies the obligation to reciprocate it, and Professor GOLDWIN SMITH commits his University and his countrymen to the kindly reception of the Beast, should he ever prowl upon this island, by consenting to sit down at the feed of the animal. Modern History will hereafter vindicate itself against the perversions of its Professor, but meanwhile the English people will protest strongly against such liberties as he takes with their self-respect.

Retaliation.

ABOUT daybreak in the height of the fashionable season, two men, one a Londoner and the other a visitor, were walking through Piccadilly. On their left hand was to be seen the metropolitan palace of the Sovereign of the British Empire; on their right hand was a row of princely mansions, and amongst them the town residence of the Prime Minister of England. Now and then a carriage rattled past conveying its occupants home from some gay gathering. But there was one feature in the scene that above all others arrested the attention of the visitor. Opposite the mansion of Lord PALMERSTON, and only separated from Buckingham Palace by the Green Park, there were lying on the paving stones what at first sight appeared to be two or three bundles of rags. A nearer inspection showed that these bundles of rags were women who could claim no other roof than the sky, and who had no softer bed than the flagstones. There they were, huddled up two by two for the sake of warmth, and sleeping soundly. To the visitor it seemed shocking to behold, in the very midst of such great wealth, objects of such abject poverty; and when the Londoner came to reflect on it, he too thought it sad that there should be such destitution in the richest city in the world. The visitor asked how London people could endure such sights. The Londoner replied, 'We are so accustomed to them that our hearts too often grow callous.'

This too true story very well illustrates European sentiment respecting the war in America. We do not charge our countrymen with indifference to the sufferings of the gallant people who are fighting for the rights and liberties which we love, and which were established by the labours, the heroism, and the sacrifices of our common forefathers. Such a charge would be false and ungracious. A few weeks ago a bazaar for the relief of Southern prisoners was held in Liverpool, and England took the opportunity of manifesting her generous sympathy. In all places where men resort the conduct of the Federals is denounced, and in all drawing-rooms the South has a host of fair friends, who do not conceal their true womanly abhorrence of Federal barbarity, and who unfeignedly pray for the triumph of the South. The press of England, with singular unanimity, avows the justice of the Confederate cause, and censures the inhuman system of warfare adopted by the Federals. Still, we think, it cannot be denied that the repeated atrocities of the North have rather deadened our sense of their enormity. At the beginning of the war there was a loud outcry at the suggestion of the Federals blocking up one of the inlets to the Charleston harbour by sinking a stone fleet; but what an insignificant infraction of the laws of civilised warfare would that have been compared to many deeds done since then by the Federals!

We are not about to plead for intervention, but we are convinced that if, four years ago, England and France had known, as they know now, that secession was a national uprising, and that, being unable to conquer, the Federals would attempt to exterminate the Southern people, there would have been a demand for intervention such as the Governments could not disregard. We do not complain that there is now no demand for intervention, but we have a reason for calling attention to Northern savagery, and for asking our countrymen to realise as well as they can what is implied by such announcements as 'Ten Confederates shot,' 'Seven towns burnt,' 'SHERMAN sends away the inhabitants of Atlanta,' 'The Shenandoah laid waste,' 'SHERMAN devastating Georgia.'

Try as we will, we shall achieve a most inadequate conception of what is meant by Federal devastation. Yet let us endeavour to picture it. What a sight it must have been when the whole population of Atlanta were driven from their homes! Novelists and dramatists have described with thrilling effect the scene of misery incident on a family being turned into the streets for the non-payment of rent. Now let us conceive many, very many families, a whole townful turned out of their homes and driven out of the city of their abode. Or let us turn to SHERMAN'S march through Georgia, the advance lighted by the flaming torch, the rear marked by smouldering ruins. How can we describe it? It seems a long distance by railway from London to Birmingham—it is about 112 miles. Suppose an enemy marching by this road, and for five miles on either side desolating the country. Fences are torn down; houses, barns, and farming implements are burnt. The smiling country of yesterday is a blackened desert to-day. The women and children who had homes and stores of food yesterday are homeless and starving to-day. Yet over a longer line than 100 miles has SHERMAN led his army and thus desolated the country. Nor is that all. Despite the strictest discipline, when soldiers are commanded and exhorted to respect the property and rights of civilians under the penalty of death, deeds are done that intensify the horrors of war. What, then, is to be expected when town after town is given over to be burnt, and the broad country is consigned to pillage? There are some offences that it is an offence to name, and we have often been obliged, for decency's sake, to conceal Federal atrocities. On this occasion we will quote a short extract from the Augusta Chronicle, which gives an account of Federal conduct while SHERMAN held Atlanta, and when we may suppose his army was under some discipline. What deeds have been done in the course of the march of desolation no imagination is corrupt enough to portray:—

When you hear of the destruction of property, the half is not told. Other crimes, the most heinous in the eye of Heaven, have they committed. In De Kalb, a short time ago, they seized five negro women, and in the yard, in the presence of the white family, several of whom were grown females, they violated their persons. In one neighbourhood in the same county they violated the persons of six respectable ladies. The information of these crimes comes to me from a source not to be questioned for a moment.

Now, it is useless to suppose that such proceedings do not involve retaliation. Marvellous indeed has been the forbearance of the Confederates; but they will soon learn that forbearance is no longer a virtue, but rather complicity in crime. At the beginning of the war the illustrious and eminently pious STONEWALL JACKSON recommended that no prisoners should be taken, because then Mr. LINCOLN would have found it almost impossible to recruit his armies. For the sake of home and country men must and will fight, though the alternative be victory or death; but men will not fight for money on such terms. We are inclined to think STONEWALL JACKSON was right. We are convinced that if the South inscribed 'No quarter!' on her banners, the struggle would be short. In that case Mr. LINCOLN would find it harder than ever to recruit his armies. In that case the Confederate cruisers would be a terror not only to Federal shipowners, but also to Federal sailors, and unfurling the black flag would be a mortal blow to the Federal marine. And the South could justify such a proceeding. She could say to the North, 'For four years you have tried to subjugate us, and we have shown you that we consider no sacrifice too great for independence, and that we will die rather than submit. Still you continue the war, and since you cannot conquer you are bent on exterminating us, and you do not disguise your intention. You thus proclaim war to the death, and therefore we do the same. Henceforth, then, let it be war to the death on either side.'

But we are discussing retaliation, not policy. It might have been politic and just for the South to adopt a policy of 'No quarter!' if the Federals had conducted the war in the most humane manner. But the North has not been humane, but barbarous. Therefore, if retaliation did not shorten the war, it would not be less a bounden duty. Of what avail has been Southern forbearance? When General LEE advanced into the North, he treated the inhabitants and private property as though his army had been marching through a Confederate State. What effect has this had on the North? Let the devastation of the Shenandoah Valley and of Georgia be the answer. Forbearance will not check the cruel vandalism of the North. Forbearance will not save the women and children of the South from such misery as no tongue can tell and no pen can describe. We repeat, then, that we are on the eve of a crisis, when forbearance will cease to be a virtue and will become an act of complicity in crime. At present Mr. LINCOLN can say to his Border States: 'Enjoy to the full the accounts of the devastations in Virginia and Georgia; if LEE comes North, he will protect your lives and property.' He can say to Federal seamen: 'Pursue your avocation without fear, for if your owners' ships are captured your lives are safe.' He can say to his soldiers: 'Go into the South. Burn and pillage. Give the rein to your licentious passions. Do not dread retribution. The Southerners will treat you according to the rules of civilised warfare.' Yes, Southern forbearance is offering a premium for the commission of crime, just as though in this city we opened the doors of our prisons, disbanded our police, and proclaimed that henceforth theft, murder, and rape should be unpunished. We are convinced that the only way to check Northern barbarity is to announce that the season of forbearance is past, and now is the time of retaliation.

We write thus under a deep and dread sense of responsibility. Would to God that we could discern any escape from a policy of retaliation! We are not ashamed to plead with the North, though we fear that no heed will be given to words of mercy and to the voice of humanity. Still, we ask the supporters of Mr. LINCOLN to pause in their career of Southern devastation. What is to be gained by it? It is not necessary to observe that the deeds of SHERMAN and SHERIDAN do not tend to the restoration of the Union, because no one in the North or out of the North dreams that that can be accomplished under any circumstances. But the burning of towns, cruelty and outrage to women and children, so far from aiding, make conquest more difficult. And if the people of the South are to be exterminated, the first business is to conquer the men, and it will then be comparatively easy to get rid of the women and children. But if this system of barbarous warfare is persevered in, there must be retaliation; and, as we have shown, it is the North, and not the South, that will be crippled by it. The sufferings of the South cannot be more poignant than they have been; retaliation will teach the North the tenfold horrors of uncivilised warfare.

However, the purport of this article is not to plead with the North, but to prepare our countrymen for what must ensue if the Federals persist in fighting with the torch and making war on Southern women and children. Retaliation becomes a necessity and a solemn obligation. We will hope against hope that the North may see the folly of her wicked and savage mode of warfare, and that retaliation may be needless. But if not—if the South is compelled to unfurl the black flag—let Europe do the South justice; let Europe not condemn the South for so doing, but 'in that hour remember the days of her affliction.'

The Legality of Blockade-Running.

THE law reports of Saturday last contain an account of a trial in which the presiding Judge laid down certain doctrines of a peculiarly novel and startling character. The confidence and positiveness with which these doctrines were asserted appear to have astonished the lawyers engaged—among whom were some of the leaders of the Bar—as much as they have surprised ourselves, who pretend to no deeper knowledge of legal principles than may be acquired by such study as ought to form part of the education of every man who undertakes to deal with political controversies. We have the less hesitation in criticising the dicta of the Court on this occasion, that they are flatly opposed not only to everything that has been asserted by writers on international law, but also to the judgment delivered by a Judge of at least equal authority in regard to the very same subject-matter in a previous trial.

A contract was entered into between Mr. JORSS and Mr. ELLISON by which the former agreed to send some 200 or 250 tons of Manchester goods to Charleston by the Tubal Cain, a ship belonging to Mr. LAFONE, of Liverpool. The contract was broken. Mr. LAFONE brought an action against Mr. ELLISON, which was tried before Mr. Justice WILLES at Liverpool. The question of legality was there raised, but peremptorily decided by Mr. Justice WILLES in favour of the plaintiff, and the jury gave 1,885*l.* damages, a sum which the Judge considered very inadequate. Mr. ELLISON, of course, brought an action against Mr. JORSS, through whose failure in the performance of the contract he had suffered. The case came on at the Guildhall, on Saturday, before Mr. BARON MARTIN and a special jury. A plea of illegality in the contract had been put in, the effect of which would have been to defeat the plaintiff's claim, as, of course, no Court will lend itself to the enforcement of a bargain which is contrary to law, or founded on an unlawful consideration. But the defendant's lawyers had been so ill-satisfied with this plea as to withdraw it, and defended the case on other grounds of no public interest. Mr. Baron MARTIN used the following language:—

'Having looked at the correspondence, I think there was a contract; but my impression is that the jury can only give nominal damages, because the contract is an illegal one, directly opposed to the QUEEN'S proclamation, and having a direct tendency to involve the country in war.'

The learned Judge seems to have adopted the notion of the Foreign and Colonial Offices, that there is something wrong, if not absolutely criminal, in all transactions disagreeable to the Government of the United States. He holds that the contract between JORSS and ELLISON was illegal, apparently, on three grounds:—

(1) That the goods for which freight was engaged, and the ship in which they were to be carried, were intended to break the blockade of the Southern ports.

(2) That the transaction was contrary to the QUEEN'S proclamation.

(3) That it had a direct tendency to involve this country in war with the United States.

We dispute every one of these arguments. In the first place, blockade-running is not illegal, in the sense in which illegality would avoid a contract. This we should have thought too notorious to require proof, if it had not been controverted by a Judge of the Court of Exchequer. Even by international law, those who engage in the attempt to run a blockade are not offenders against any recognised law. If they were, they would be amenable to punishment. This they are not. The blockading Power has no right to lay a finger on the crew or captain of a blockade-runner, nay, not even on the owner, so long as these offer no resistance to the capture of their vessel. The only right she possesses is that of capturing the vessel while actually or constructively engaged in blockade-breaking—that is, after she has sailed for the blockaded port, or after she has left it, and before she has reached a neutral destination. The crew, or some of them, may be detained as witnesses, not as malefactors. To prove that this right of capture is a right of prevention—a privilege of war—not an act of judicial punishment, it is sufficient to observe that neither another vessel of the same owner, nor the same vessel subsequently engaged on an innocent voyage, can be seized. It is clear, therefore, that the owner has broken no law, inasmuch as no punishment can be inflicted on him. The law of nations gives him a right to pursue his trade, and the enemy a right to capture him thereon—if they can. But even if blockade-breaking were illegal by the law of nations, it would not avoid a contract. To do that, it must be illegal by municipal law. Now, this it certainly is not. The neutral country is not bound to restrain its subjects' trade, and never attempts to do so. There is no English law against blockade-breaking, and no rule of public law from which any prohibition thereof could be inferred as a duty incumbent upon our Government or our Courts.

But, secondly, Mr. Baron MARTIN affirms that the transaction in question was illegal because it violated the QUEEN'S proclamation. Now it must be borne in mind that England is a constitutional Government, and that the advisers and servants of the Crown—for the QUEEN'S name ought not to be dragged into this controversy—cannot make that unlawful which is not prohibited either by statute or by the common law. They have, indeed, power to prohibit altogether the export of certain classes of goods; but Manchester goods are not among them, and at present this power has not been exercised. If, therefore, the Government were to issue a proclamation forbidding British subjects to trade with either of the American belligerents, this proclamation would be in itself void and illegal, and contracts in contravention of its terms would not be affected by it. But, as a matter of fact, the QUEEN'S proclamation does not pretend to do this. It forbids British subjects to enlist in the service of the belligerents, or to furnish them with munitions of war. The first of these prohibitions is rightful, because such enlistments are forbidden by law, and any subject disobeying this order could be punished, not indeed for contravening the proclamation, but for breaking the preexisting law, which the proclamation does no more than declare. But there is no law forbidding the export of munitions of war to belligerents; and we believe that the power given to Government to forbid the export of particular munitions can only be employed generally, and not as against a particular State. We suspect, then, that this part of the proclamation is of no effect; and certainly it has been on all sides habitually disregarded, and that with perfect impunity. The Customs do not pretend a right to seize 'hardware' destined for Charleston, or cargoes of rifles openly shipped for New York. But even granting that the proclamation were part of the law of the land (and that BARING Brothers are liable to a criminal information for sending arms to the Federal Government), it does not touch the case in hand. The goods contracted to be shipped by one party and conveyed by the other were Manchester goods—calicoes and stuffs, not munitions of war—and their shipment could in no way violate the QUEEN'S proclamation. Even if that proclamation were equivalent to an Act of Parliament, then the goods which were the subject of the contract are not affected by it, and it could not, therefore, impair the validity of the engagement.

Finally, Mr. Baron MARTIN says, 'The contract is illegal because it has a direct tendency to involve us in war.' We will admit the proposition of law here implied. We will admit the doubtful doctrine that, before and independently of the Foreign Enlistment Act—which is here inapplicable—it would be an offence at common law to do any act tending directly to bring war upon this country, and that any contract to do such an act would be void accordingly. But it is clear that by 'an act tending to involve us in war' a lawyer must understand 'an act giving to a foreign Power reasonable cause of war against us.' For, in the first place, the law cannot assume that a foreign Power will go to war without just and reasonable cause; and, next, if a foreign Government had threatened formally to do so, that wrongful menace could not be allowed to curtail the rights and liberties of British subjects. To fit out an expedition to attack New York, or liberate the prisoners on Johnston's Island, would be, on this supposition of law, an unlawful act at common law; for it would give the United States reasonable cause of war, if we permitted such proceedings. To send out regiments to join the Federal army would be similarly an offence at common law, as it would give a similar cause of war to the Confederacy. The Garibaldian excursionists would have been amenable to such a law. But in the eye of the law the export of goods to a blockaded port can have no tendency to involve us in war, because a declaration of war on such a ground would be contrary to every principle of international law, and to the established usages of Christian Powers. It is perfectly settled that not even the supply of contraband of war by neutral subjects to a belligerent, even at a blockaded port, can give the slightest ground of complaint to the enemy as against the neutral government. And, therefore, inasmuch as the export of the goods in question could have no tendency whatever in a legal—or, we will add, in an actual and practical sense—to involve us in war with the United States, as that Power certainly will not go to war with us for exporting goods to the South, and would be utterly in the wrong if she did, there is not the slightest ground for the pretence that such exports are illegal at common law on the ground of public policy, or that a contract to carry them is void for illegality. The following passages show with sufficient clearness how the law on this subject stands: first, that blockade-running is not an offence in law; and, secondly, that it has no tendency to involve the government of the blockade-running merchants in war—that is, it gives no cause of complaint to the blockading Power:—

The transport of merchandise to the ports of a belligerent State is per se a perfectly lawful act on the part of a neutral merchant; and it is only by reason of the accidental uses to which certain articles of merchandise may be applied, in consequence of war existing between two States, that the right to intercept such merchandise in the course of transport on the high seas to the ports of a belligerent Power, and to confiscate it to its own uses, accrues to the adverse belligerent. The right of the neutral to transport, and of the adverse belligerent to seize, are conflicting rights, and neither party can charge the other with a criminal act. Upon this view of the common law, which is sanctioned by the highest authorities, it would be under an erroneous conception of the juridical relations which exist between belligerent States and neutral States, that a belligerent Power, in the absence of special treaty-engagements with a neutral Power, should hold itself entitled to complain to the latter of its not exercising its authority to restrain the trade of its subjects with the adverse belligerent. The belligerent, to use the language of an eminent Judge of the Supreme Court of the United States, must content himself with cutting up the neutral commerce, and ought to make no complaint to the neutral Power, not even where the individual merchant rescues his vessel after capture, and escapes into his own or a friendly port.—Twiss, vol. ii. preface.

The limits of the political duties of a neutral nation towards belligerent nations are identical with the limits of its sovereignty. Such conduct cannot be charged upon the Government of the State as a departure from neutrality. Forfeiture of the goods and ship is the penalty annexed to such acts by the law of the high seas in time of war; and if this were not the case, it would be in the power of individual merchants to involve a neutral nation in war against its will.—Twiss, vol. ii. p. 439.

A neutral Power does nothing incompatible with neutrality in allowing its subjects to carry any articles whatsoever of commerce to markets within the territory of a belligerent Power, nor is it required by the common law of nations to exercise its right of sovereignty over strangers who frequent its markets, in order to prevent the exportation of any articles which they may have purchased in its markets.—Twiss, vol. ii. p. 461.

'It is no departure from neutrality,' is the language of this Declaration, 'for the citizens of a neutral State to sell to belligerents gunpowder, arms, munitions, or any other articles of merchandise. Contraband of war, and military transportation, have been furnished by lawful right, by citizens of the United States, to each of the belligerents, but more especially and in larger proportions to Great Britain and to France.'—Attorney-General United States, October 1855.

'On this subject,' to use the language of Mr. Justice Johnson in delivering the judgment of the Supreme Court of the United States, 'there appears to be a tacit convention between the neutral Power and the belligerent Power that, on the one hand, the neutral State shall not be implicated in the misconduct of the individual; and, on the other, that the offender shall be subjected to the exercise of belligerent right.'

THE CONFEDERATE CAUSE IN FRANCE.

FROM A CONFEDERATE CORRESPONDENT.

Paris: December 14.

I have but little news for you this week. The Paris press has allowed the American question to slumber for a while, and has devoted its attention to the consideration of the speech delivered by the Prefect of the Seine, who, by the way, made a somewhat unhappy allusion to the municipal administration of the district of Colombia.

Sherman's grand expedition has gained the admiration of Le Siècle and L'Opinion Nationale. Le Temps also admires this expedition (the Opposition journals admire everything done by the Federals), but is fearful that some unexpected surprise may suddenly arrest the movements of the short-sighted general. As to La Presse, although it fully believes that Sherman will succeed, still it altogether disapproves of the useless destruction which has everywhere marked his progress. 'Such extreme measures (it observes) require some very tangible reasons for their justification—if, indeed, they can be justified at all.'

It is unnecessary to remark that the journals which express themselves with such delight respecting the skilful strategy of Sherman would be puzzled to explain on what grounds they anticipate his success, since the geography of the interior of Georgia and of Alabama is less known to them than even the heart of China. It is sometimes very amusing to read the blunders they commit with regard to America. One writer, for instance, a learned librarian of Paris, lately placed an island opposite Mobile; another, who prides himself on knowing English, and who writes specially upon the American and the English question, a short time since translated the name 'Spottsylvania' by 'Tâchesylvanie.' This ingenious writer probably found, on reference to a dictionary, that 'Spot' meant 'Tâche' in French; he therefore wrote 'Tâchesylvanie,' thus transforming a house into a country.

I will not speak of the names of towns, of rivers, and of men, whose orthography suffers a daily mutilation at the hands of certain journals pretending to a greater knowledge of America than those of their contemporaries which acknowledge the Southern Confederation as the depositary of those American democratic institutions which liberal Europe so much admires. To mention all these blunders would take much time and afford little amusement. I will only state that Le Siècle is so ill-informed respecting American matters, that, in a leading article which it recently published, it repeatedly calls Mr. Benjamin Mr. Baptiste.

Such errors as these are never to be met with in La Patrie. One of the editors of this excellent journal, M. Aucaigne, whose knowledge of America has been acquired by a personal residence in that country, is scrupulously particular in giving to his readers the exact topography of the theatre of each new military operation; and exactness in such a matter greatly facilitates the right understanding of the various phases assumed by the present war.

It is with the deepest regret I inform you that the worthy proprietor and chief editor of La Patrie, M. Delamarre, is at the present moment very ill. For a long time past this distinguished man has been the subject of severe bodily suffering, and recently his numerous friends, feeling persuaded that the great mental fatigue caused him by the superintendence of such an important journal as La Patrie was prejudicial to his health, induced him to discontinue his labours and seek repose. It is said that, yielding to their solicitations, M. Delamarre intends to dispose of his journal and to place it under the direction of a committee, at the head of which is to be M. de Persigny. I do not offer this information as authentic; indeed, I would far rather hope that it is premature, and that the Patrie will be spared the loss of its able director, through whom it has acquired so great an authority. M. Delamarre will ever be regarded by the Southerners as the courageous journalist who was one of the first to defend their rights, and who has unceasingly supported their cause by his influential journal.

I notice that for some time past Le Journal des Débats has borrowed its news from Le Courrier des Etats-Unis in preference to Le Messager Franco-Américain. May this be taken as indicating a change in politics relative to the American question? It is possible, but not probable. It would not, however, be the first time that Le Journal des Débats has shown itself hostile to the United States. Thus, in the affair of the Florida, the most severe article ever published against the North appeared in this journal. I am aware that, according to La Chronique Secrète, this article may have been written only with a view to please Brazil, whose hereditary princess has recently married the son of the Duc de Nemours, one of those Orleanist princes to whom the Débats is so devoted; but is La Chronique Secrète to be relied on? Be this as it may, a few days after the appearance of this article, M. Prévost-Paradol put the Confederates to flight, and sang of the virtues of honest Old Abe. It may happen, however, now that Mr. Dayton is dead, who was intimately connected with the editors of the Débats, and particularly with M. Laboulaye, that this journal may become somewhat softened in its tone towards the Southern States.

A new political journal, of a large size, is about to be established here. Its title is to be L'Avenir, and its chief editor M. Peyrat. M. Peyrat was formerly editor of La Presse; he is a man of talent, but a staunch Radical, and has lately acquired great notoriety by the publication of a new Vie de Jésus, in which he far surpasses M. Renan in daring. It may therefore be expected that L'Avenir will designate the Confederates as slave-dealers, rebels, aristocrats, &c.—expressions which are used by the Republicans of Europe towards the only Republicans in America.

It is also reported that another new journal is to be published, having for its editor M. Ernest Feydeau, the well-known author of 'Fanny;' but I do not yet know what political opinions it is intended to advocate.

If it be true that Paris is about to enrich itself by the publication of two new political journals, it is also true that it is about to lose one—Le Nord. But let not the Yankees be uneasy; the organ of their dear friend the Czar of Russia is not dying, but only changing its domicile; it is going back to Belgium.

I am able to announce to you the early publication of the excellent work by the Marquis of Lothian on the secession of the Confederate States. The translation of this work has been undertaken by the able and indefatigable Madame Judith Derosme. To this distinguished writer, who has made the English language her special study, we are indebted for the translation of Captain Semmes's journal. I sincerely hope that her new work will meet with as great success as the first.

The Marquis de Châteaurenard, the new French Minister at Washington, is now at Paris. He will no doubt soon leave for the United States, but the present serious illness of his son has deferred his departure.

AN HISTORICAL SKETCH.

The first permanent colonial settlement made on the American continent by the English was made under a charter granted in 1606, in the fourth year of James I., to Sir Thomas Gates and his associates. That charter was subsequently set aside upon quo warranto, issued at the instance of the British Crown, and in 1620 another charter took its place, granted to the Duke of Lennox and his associates, who were incorporated under the name of the Plymouth Company. To that Company the coast was granted from 40° to 48° of north latitude. This charter was followed by successive grants to different noblemen and companies, until the entire coast was disposed of. In 1664 to the Duke of York was granted all the territory as far south as Delaware Bay; and in 1663 and 1664 to Lord Clarendon and his associates the entire coast of the continent, from 29° of north latitude to that celebrated line of 36° 30′ north, since so infamous in the history of American politics. Thus was the whole coast comprised within the limits of the United States at the time the Union was overthrown.

Prior to this first settlement the slave trade had been inaugurated and established in Great Britain. The first notice which history gives us of it is the grant of a charter by Queen Elizabeth to a company formed for the purpose of supplying slaves to the Spanish-American colonies. The Virgin Queen herself was a shareholder. Subsequently, in 1662, under Charles II., a monopoly was created in favour of a company authorised to export to the colonies 3,000 slaves per annum; and so valuable was this privilege considered, so great was the influence required for the purpose of obtaining a share in it, that it was placed under the auspices of the Queen Dowager and the Duke of York. The King himself issued his proclamation, inviting his subjects to establish themselves on the western side of the Atlantic; and, as an encouragement to the migration, tendered a grant of 100 acres of land for each four slaves that they would employ in the cultivation of it.

The merchants of London found their trade to the slave coast very much cramped by this royal monopoly granted to royal favourites, and they continued to stun the ear of the Commons with loud complaints that they were excluded from the advantages of so prosperous a traffic; and in 1695 the Commons of England, in committee of the whole House, resolved—

That for the better supply of the plantations, all the subjects of Great Britain should have liberty to trade in Africa for negroes, with such limits as should be prescribed by Parliament.

In the 9th and 10th William III., an Act was passed partially relaxing this monopoly, the preamble to which states that—

The trade was highly beneficial and advantageous to the kingdom and to the plantations and colonies thereunto belonging.

This partial relaxation was unsatisfactory. Petitions continued to pour in. In 1708 the Commons again resolved—

That the trade was important, and ought to be free and open to all the Queen's subjects trading from Great Britain.

And in 1711 they again resolved that—

This trade ought to be free in a regulated company; the plantations ought to be supplied with negroes at reasonable rates; a considerable stock was necessary for carrying on the trade to the best advantage; and that an export of 100,000*l.* at least, in merchandise, should be annually made from Great Britain to Africa.

Finally, in the year 1744, these repeated resolutions of the Commons, and petitions of the merchants of London, accomplished the desired result. They gained their object by the passage of the Act of 23rd George II., throwing open the trade, and declaring

The slave trade to be very advantageous to Great Britain, and necessary for supplying the plantations and colonies thereunto belonging with a sufficient number of negroes at reasonable rates.

This legislation, emanating from the mother country, fixed the institution of slavery upon the colonies. They could not resist it. All their right was limited to petition, to remonstrance, and to attempts at legislation at home to diminish the evil. Every such attempt was sternly repressed by the British Crown. Virginia early discouraged the trade, and during her colonial existence passed twenty-three Acts imposing duties on slaves imported into the colony. She had endeavoured to stop the trade altogether, but the home Government would not sanction her efforts in that direction. In 1760 South Carolina passed an Act prohibiting the further importation of African slaves. The Act was rejected by the King in council, who declared the trade 'beneficial and necessary to the mother country.' The Governor was reprimanded, and a circular was sent to all the Governors of all the colonies, warning them against presuming to countenance such legislation.

In 1765 a similar Act was twice read in the Assembly of Jamaica. The news reached Great Britain before its final passage. Instructions were sent out to the royal Governor. He called the House of Assembly before him, communicated his instructions, and forbade any further progress of the bill. In 1774, in spite of this discountenancing action of the mother Government, two bills passed the Assembly; and the Earl of Dartmouth, then Secretary of State, wrote to Sir Basil Keith, the Governor of the colony, that 'these measures had created alarm to the merchants of Great Britain engaged in that branch of commerce,' and forbidding him, 'on pain of removal from his government, to assent to such laws.'

Massachusetts, the first State in America which directly participated in the slave trade, and that, too, though a member of one of the Boston churches earnestly rebuked the traffic, imposed duties upon negroes imported, and aimed at other efforts; but as late as 1774, when the Assembly of Massachusetts passed an Act 'to prevent the importation of negroes and others as slaves,' Governor Hutchinson refused his assent, and dissolved the Assembly, because to sanction it would have violated his instructions. The royal orders to Governor Wentworth of New Hampshire, directed him not to give his assent to, or pass, any law imposing duties on negroes imported into New Hampshire. Slaves were introduced into Pennsylvania by William Penn; and, though before he died he did somewhat to meliorate their condition, 'he died a slaveholder.' In Georgia, slavery was disallowed by the trustees during the early years of that colony, through policy, and not from motives of philanthropy; the object of the trustees and home Government being to interpose a barrier of free territory between South Carolina and the Spanish settlement in Florida. But the trustees were finally overruled, and slaves were imported into Georgia. Oglethorpe owned a plantation and slaves in South Carolina before negroes were allowed in Georgia; and George Whitefield, the celebrated divine, was the advocate and owner of slaves at Bethesda, below Savannah. The Earl of Shaftesbury took a prominent part in repealing the regulation by which the trustees for Georgia had hitherto prevented the introduction of slaves into that colony.

Finally, in 1775—mark the date, 1775—after the revolutionary struggle had commenced, whilst the Continental Congress was in session, after armies had been levied, after Crown Point and Ticonderoga had been taken possession of by the colonists, and after the first blood shed in the revolution had reddened the spring sod upon the green at Lexington, the same Earl of Dartmouth alluded to above, in answer to a remonstrance from the colonies, replied:

> We cannot allow the colonies to check or discourage in any degree a traffic so beneficial to the nation.

But what could the remonstrances of colonies or the labour of individual philanthropy accomplish, when kings and queens, and cabinets and cities, and parliaments and associations, for two hundred years, were the patrons and participants in this evil traffic? The Treaty of Utrecht, in 1713, constituted Her Britannic Majesty Queen Anne, and His Catholic Majesty Philip V., the crowned slave-merchants of North America; the Queen agreeing, in the space of thirty years, to bring into the Spanish West Indies 144,000 negroes, to the exclusion of every other slave trader; and in her speech to Parliament the following year, she boasted of her plan in thus obtaining for English subjects a new slave-market in the Spanish West Indies. Subsequently, in 1729, Parliament, at the recommendation of the King, granted supplies for keeping up the slave traders' forts in Africa; and in 1745 a British merchant embodied the views of the mass of the English people, when he entitled his tract 'The African Slave Trade the great Pillar and Support of the British Plantation Trade in America.'

But this is not all. Almost immediately after the Treaty of Utrecht, a question arose in the English Council as to the true legal character of the slaves thus to be exported to the Spanish American colonies; and, according to the forms of the British Constitution, the question was submitted by the Crown in Council to the twelve judges of England. Their answer is in these words:—

> In pursuance of His Majesty's Order in Council hereunto annexed, we do humbly certify our opinion to be that negroes are merchandise.

This opinion was signed by Lord Chief Justice Holt, Judge Pollexfen, and eight other judges of England. Very soon afterwards the nascent spirit of fanaticism began to obtain a foothold in England; and although large numbers of negro slaves were owned in Great Britain, and, as remarked above, were daily sold on the public Exchange in London (see 2 Haggard's Rep., p. 105), questions arose as to the right of the owners to retain property in their slaves; and the merchants of London, alarmed, submitted the question to Sir Philip Yorke, who afterwards became Lord Hardwicke, and to Lord Talbot, who were then the solicitor and attorney-general of the kingdom. The question was propounded to them, 'What are the rights of a British owner of a slave in England?' And this is the answer of those two legal functionaries. They certified that 'a slave coming from the West Indies to England, with or without his master, doth not become free; and his master's property in him is not thereby determined nor varied, and the master may legally compel him to return to the plantations.' In 1749, the same question again came up before Lord Hardwicke, then Lord Chancellor of England, and, by a decree in Chancery in the case before him, he affirmed the doctrine which he had laid down when he was attorney-general.

Things thus stood in England until 1771, when the spirit of fanaticism, acquiring strength, finally operated upon Lord Mansfield, who, by a judgment rendered in the celebrated Sommersett case, subverted the common law of England by judicial legislation. He decided, not that a slave carried to England from the West Indies by his master thereby became free, but that, by the law of England, if the slave resisted the master, there was no remedy by which the master could exercise his control; that the colonial legislation which afforded the master means of controlling his property in the colonies had no authority in England; and that England by her laws had provided no substitute for that authority. This was judicial legislation, and subverted the entire previous jurisprudence of Great Britain. Lord Mansfield felt it, and begged the parties to compromise. They said they would not. 'Why,' said he, 'I have known six of these cases already, and in five out of the six there was a compromise; you had better compromise this matter.' But the parties said no, they would stand on the law; and then, after holding the case up three times, Lord Mansfield mustered up courage to give the decision above mentioned.

The position that this judgment subverted the existing law, is supported by an intellect greater than Mansfield's—by a judge of resplendent genius and great learning—one who, in all questions of international law, on all subjects not dependent upon the peculiar municipal common law of England, has won for himself the proudest name in the annals of her jurisprudence. That judge was Lord Stowell. As late as 1827, twenty years after Great Britain had abolished the slave trade, six years before she was brought to the point of confiscating the property of her colonies, which she had forced them to buy, a case was brought before that celebrated judge—a case known to all lawyers by the name of the slave Grace. It was pretended in the argument that the slave Grace was free, because she had been carried to England; and it was contended, under the authority of Lord Mansfield's decision in the Sommersett case, that having once breathed English air she was free—that the atmosphere of that favoured kingdom was too pure to be breathed by a slave. Lord Stowell, in answering that legal argument, said that, after painful and laborious research into historical records, he did not find anything touching the peculiar fitness of the English atmosphere for respiration during the ten centuries that slaves had lived in England!

It may indeed be affirmed that the European continental powers, which joined and cooperated with Great Britain in the discovery and establishment of colonies on this continent, all followed the same views of policy. France, Spain, Portugal, and England occupied the whole continent, north and south. The legislation of all of them was the same. Louis XIII., by royal edict, established slavery in all his colonies in America. Everybody knows that it was at the instance of Las Casas that the Spanish crown engaged in the slave trade with a view of substituting the servile labour of the African for that of the Indian, who had been reduced to slavery by his Spanish conquerors. As regards Portugal, she inaugurated the trade; she originally supplied all the colonies; and the empire of Brazil to-day, with its servile labour, is the legitimate fruit of the colonial policy of the Portuguese Government in the sixteenth century. She began her trade in 1508, and some authors say even before the colonisation of America in the fifteenth century.

Slavery was thus the common recognised institution of the New World. Nor can it be admitted that it was not the common law (white or black slavery) of the Old World at the time the American Union was formed; but enough for the present.

It thus appears that Great Britain took a leading part in planting African slavery on the American continent: that she forced the institution of slavery upon the colonies now composing the Confederate States; and that she never did abolish the slave trade until after she had lost nearly all of her American possessions where negro slavery could be made valuable. Without saying that Great Britain would not have discontinued the slave trade if she had not lost her most flourishing colonies, yet it may fairly be asserted that if the splendid domain lying between the St. Lawrence and the Gulf of Mexico, and reaching from the Atlantic to the Pacific, now constituted a part of her possessions as Canada does, she would to-day uphold slavery with the same earnestness that she now opposes it. Be this as it may, the facts and arguments produced in this paper establish beyond the possibility of successful contradiction the position that of all the Powers in the world, Great Britain should be the last to object to recognising the Confederate States on account of the existence in them of African slavery. She planted African slavery in these States against the will of the States. She reaped the profits of the trade by which they were supplied with slaves. Both her Government and people still enjoy those profits, and in all their anxiety to rid the South of slavery they have never offered to surrender any part of those profits in order to accomplish their wishes. Having forced slavery upon the colonies against their will, and amassed great wealth by the 'traffic in human flesh,' they now desire the States to abolish slavery, regardless of their wishes; and yet they do not propose to bear any portion of the expense! As slavery was established here in defiance of the wishes of the inhabitants, so they now propose to abolish it in utter disregard of the feelings or interest of their descendants. It is not improbable that many of the most vociferous opponents of slavery of this day in Great Britain are the descendants of men who grew rich by the trade which established the negro on the Western continent.

For the future, then, let Englishmen cease their pious ejaculations in regard to slavery in the South. Such exhibitions only disgust men of intelligence and proper sentiments. England stocked the Confederate States with African slaves. She brought them here and received a price for them; and though she may take water and, like Pilate, wash her hands before the nations, saying, I am innocent of the blood of these people, yet both earth and heaven will hold her responsible for the thing. She cannot purge herself of the crime, and yet retain 'the pieces of silver.' She will not give up 'the pieces of silver;' then, for decency's sake, let her be silent! If the social framework of these States is blurred by the scrofula of slavery, the malady was inherited from the mother country—from old England and New England; for what old England left undone to fasten the institution of negro servitude upon this country, New England took up and completed.

MOSBY'S LAST EXPLOIT.

(From the Richmond Dispatch, November 24.)

ONE Captain Blazer, a man remarkable for skill and courage, was some time since detailed from the infantry of the Yankee army to operate as a guerilla hunter in Northern Virginia. He was given a lieutenant and eighty picked mounted men, armed with Spencer carbines, and directed to devote himself especially to the capture of Mosby's men. In the course of several months, by indefatigable scouting, he has managed to pick up a number of detached squads and individual members of Colonel Mosby's command, and has made for himself a creditable reputation for energy and vigilance, both in the Valley and Northern Virginia east of the Blue Ridge. But, hitherto, it has never been his fortune to encounter an enemy equal to himself in numbers. Of late he has been expressing himself as panting to encounter some innumerable, unlimited numbers of guerillas. The fulfilment of the wish, as will be seen, was not long delayed.

Last Friday, Captain P. A. Richards, commanding Companies A and B, first squadron of Mosby's command, made an expedition into Clarke to hunt up and to do battle with the doughty Blazer, if the latter so willed it. On reaching the neighbourhood of Cabletown, seven miles west of Snicker's Gap, scouts reported Blazer and his force advancing from the direction of Winchester. Captain Richards drew up his men in line of battle and awaited his approach. Blazer heralded his advance with a shower of bullets from the Spencer carbines, and then rushed down upon our troops. Captain Richards, instead of awaiting his onset, determined to meet him in full career, and when the enemy was fifty yards distant gave the order for his men to charge. It has since been ascertained that Blazer believed himself attacking a greatly inferior force, who would fly before his first onslaught. He discovered his error too late to save him from its consequences.

The opposing squadrons rushed together with a crash. There was a momentary struggle, an uproar of shouts, and the report of firearms. Blazer's men gave way before the valour of our troops, and attempted to save themselves by flight. On one side of the road was a wood, on the other a fence enclosing fields. The fugitives made for a gap in this fence; a number were shot down before reaching it; others succeeded in reaching the field, hotly pursued by our men. A pursuit and running fight was kept up for four miles, our men never halting until Blazer's organisation was destroyed, himself and his men either killed, captured, or dispersed in the woods. The whole affair lasted not more than twenty minutes. In this brief time Captain Richards had captured Blazer and thirty of his men, killed outright thirty others, among whom was his lieutenant, and scattered the few remaining members of his troop to the winds. Blazer admits that he was beaten and broken up in a fair fight.

The strangest part of this story is the small loss sustained by our men. We had one man killed and five slightly wounded. The latter are believed to have been shot by our men in the excitement of the charge and the pursuit.

Captain Blazer and eighteen of his command arrived in this city on Tuesday evening in charge of privates John A. Payne and Harry Shand, Company B, Mosby's command. The rest of the Yankees captured in this fight were too badly wounded to be removed from the neighbourhood of the battle-field.

AFFAIRS FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

WEDNESDAY EVENING.

MONEY AND DISCOUNT MARKET.

THE money market is just in that position that we may look for greater ease, though it is not certain that the Bank directors will reduce the rate. The state of financial affairs on the Continent is decidedly improving, and the Banks of Berlin and Frankfort have lowered their terms for discount; but it is quite possible, if a drain shall arise to Egypt and the East, of which symptoms are now and then presented, that the effect would be, in the early part of the new year, to bring money back to its full value. Every prospect now exists of floating through the next month or six weeks with comparative ease. The bill-brokers and discount establishments have transacted a good business, and, with the exception of one or two establishments, very few bad debts have been made. It may be very fairly supposed that 1864, as a year, has not proved unpropitious. Large profits had been made through speculation in cotton, bank, and miscellaneous shares. But when the collapse came, houses failed, and prices receded, a corresponding loss was entailed, but principally among those who had operated without capital, and subsisted solely on ephemeral credit. The withdrawal to-day of 300,000*l.* for Egypt, although on balance of the week the amount sent in exhibits an excess, may, perhaps, stay the Bank directors in agreeing to reduce to 6 per cent. If they did so, it would greatly relieve trade, and it would show what the mercantile public just at this moment require to see, that there is confidence in the future. Should the governor and company of the Bank of England consider it undesirable to make any alteration, it will create no unfavourable impression beyond inducing caution, and teaching the public to believe that all the mischief is not yet over.

BULLION AND SPECIE MOVEMENTS.

The bullion market presents a better appearance than for the last two or three weeks, for although the withdrawals of gold from the Bank for transmission abroad have been large, there is a balance of 108,000*l.* on the other side, the amount sent in having reached 445,000*l.*, and the withdrawals 337,000*l.* The arrivals of specie comprised 139,530*l.* from New York, 11,756*l.* from the West Coast of Africa, and 225,800*l.* from the West Indies, making a total of 377,086*l.* The specie taken out by the Syria, which sailed for the East on Monday, was 378,530*l.*, of which 288,680*l.* was in silver for Bombay, and 45,350*l.* in gold; the remaining 44,500*l.* was gold for Alexandria. The silver market has been quiet since the arrangements were completed for the East, and very little is now doing in bar, but the nominal price is 61½*d.* A small parcel of Mexican dollars has been disposed of to-day at 60⅞*d.*, which is a decline of about ¼*d.* as compared with previous sales. We hear by the Australian mail that the Essex sailed from Melbourne on September 29 with 84,500*l.*, and the Monarch on October 23 with 104,000*l.*

HOME AND FOREIGN SECURITIES.

There has been a general dulness pervading the English Stock Market throughout the week, but prices have not fluctuated to any great extent, and towards the close this evening there was a rather better feeling, and the funds closed at a fractional improvement. In the Foreign Stock Market business has also been very quiet, but this is generally the case on the near approach of the Christmas holidays and the end of the year, and it is not likely there will be any material improvement till after the advent of the new year. Prices of all descriptions of stocks remain very steady, there being but a fractional alteration in any of them. Consols closed this evening at $89\frac{1}{4}$ to $89\frac{3}{8}$ ex div. for money, and $89\frac{5}{8}$ to $89\frac{3}{4}$ ex div. for the account, which, as contrasted with last week, is a rise of about $\frac{1}{8}$ per cent. Exchequer bills are slightly better, being now up to 5*s.* to 1*s.* dis. Greek stock shows no alteration whatever, the price remaining at $22\frac{1}{2}$ to 23. Mexican are also unchanged at $29\frac{3}{8}$ to $29\frac{5}{8}$. Spanish have declined about $\frac{1}{8}$ per cent., the Passives closing at $31\frac{5}{8}$ to $31\frac{7}{8}$, and the Certificates at 14 to $14\frac{1}{4}$. Turkish Six per Cents. of 1854 are 88 to 89, or $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. better, and the Four per Cents. are steady at 99 to 101.

AMERICAN SECURITIES.

There has again been a rather restricted business in American Government and railway securities, the nature of the intelligence from the other side of the Atlantic not being such as either to induce speculation or purchase for investments. The chief transactions have been caused by a pressure of sales for realisation. In the aggregate, however, prices are fairly sustained, though the tendency is towards increased weakness. The dealings are thus officially recorded:—United States Five per Cents., 1882, at $43\frac{1}{2}$, $42\frac{3}{4}$, and $42\frac{1}{2}$; Virginia State Six per Cents. at 30, $29\frac{1}{2}$, $28\frac{1}{2}$, and $27\frac{1}{2}$; Atlantic and Great Western Railway, New York Section, first mortgage, at 72 and $71\frac{1}{2}$; ditto ditto, second mortgage, at 67; ditto ditto, Pennsylvania Section, at 71, 72, and $71\frac{3}{4}$; Erie, $100 shares, all paid, at $39\frac{1}{2}$ and 38; Illinois Central Six per Cents. at 73; and ditto ditto, $100 shares, all paid, at 51, $50\frac{1}{4}$, and $50\frac{3}{8}$.

CONFEDERATE COTTON LOAN.

The market has been steadier this week with a fair amount of business at slightly better prices. The closing quotation today is 61 to 63.

IMPORTS FROM THE CONFEDERATE STATES.

The following table, extracted from the Customs Bill of Entry, is a statement of part of the imports of Southern cotton and tobacco into England since our last number:—

MERCANTILE SUSPENSIONS.

The following suspensions have taken place since our last number:—Messrs. Stirling, Gordon, & Co., of Glasgow, liabilities 180,000*l.*; Messrs. J. M. & J. Stanley, of Sheffield, liabilities reported at 40,000*l.*: Messrs. H. J. Walduck & Co., of Manchester and Birmingham, liabilities about 20,000*l.*

A LOAN FOR MONTEVIDEO.

A prospectus has just been issued of a Montevidean European loan for 1,000,000*l.* sterling, in six-per-cent. bonds of 100*l.* each at the price of 60. The dividends are to be paid in sterling in London, and there is to be a sinking fund of 1 per cent. per annum. It appears that the legislature and executive of the Republic of Uruguay have duly conferred power on Messrs. Mana & Co., of Montevideo, to convert $6,000,000 (1,250,000*l.* sterling) of debentures of the internal debt into a national debt stock, represented by six-per-cent. bonds, and to be issued in Europe prior to the 31st inst. The present loan forms the only external loan of the State. Apart from the general revenues of the Republic, there is a special hypothecation of customs and anchorage dues, estimated to produce 100,000*l.* per annum, which are to be paid weekly to Messrs. Mana & Co., and remitted by them monthly to Messrs. Mana, M'Gregor, & Co. of London, by whom applications for the present loan are invited. The instalments are payable as follows:—5 per cent. on application, 10 per cent. on allotment, 15 per cent. on January 30, 15 per cent. on February 28, and 15 per cent. on March 31. Six per cent. discount is to be allowed on payments in full in anticipation.

THE COURSE OF THE PRODUCE MARKETS.

The produce trades have undergone very few changes since this day week. Purchases have, for the most part, been of the same moderate average as noticed for some time past, and supplies continue to be brought forward in the same sparing way. By these means any great variation in prices is prevented, but the tendency has, on the whole, rather favoured the buyer than otherwise. Arrivals have not greatly increased, and as the deliveries have in some instances improved, there is no further accumulation of stocks worth naming. We have had quiet grain markets throughout, but, supplies being moderate, factors have not reduced their terms appreciably. Oilcake maintains its value: American linseed, in barrels, 11*l.* to 11*l.* 10*s.*, and bags, 9*l.* 15*s.* to 10*l.* 15*s.* per ton. Oilseeds are steady. In provisions a moderate business is passing. The value of bacon is firm, in consequence of diminished stock, but there is not much pressing. A few American new singed sides have been placed at 48*s.* to 50*s.* Long and short middles are in fair request at 40*s.* to 45*s.* Beef is still extremely dull of sale. Fine butters maintain their price, although the demand is not over-active, and the mild weather keeps up good supplies from the continent; the best brands of American are worth 112*s.* to 116*s.* per cwt. The cheese trade is without activity. American cheese ranges from 48*s.* to 58*s.* per cwt. for fair to good qualities. A slight improvement has taken place in the demand for sugar during the last day or two, and rates are firmer, but no recovery from the recent decline can be quoted. Coffee meets a quiet sale, and prices are tolerably well supported. Nothing new has transpired in the tea market, which continues exceedingly dull. No further change has taken place in spices. Rice is held for full terms, at which but small sales have been made. Jute has again declined 5*s.* to 10*s.* per ton, and hemp, whilst not appreciably lower, is barely so firm. Cotton is dull. At the wool sales, which are now drawing to a close, scarcely anything has been done for American. Extreme dulness prevails throughout the metal market, and prices are little better than nominal. Scotch pig iron, 50*s.* 3*d.* cash. No change whatever has taken place in oils or tallow, and but little is doing in either. Petroleum is firm at 2*s.* 1*d.* to 2*s.* $1\frac{1}{2}$d. per gallon for American refined.

Liverpool: Wednesday, December 14.—The animation exhibited in our cotton market last week has not been maintained; business has again become somewhat inanimate, and prices have a receding tendency. But lower values and declining business are the general characteristics at this period of the year, independent of any other exciting causes. At present the chief demand is for American, Egyptian, East Indian, and China descriptions. A few days since the transactions in cotton 'to arrive' and for future delivery were rather extensive, but these have likewise now fallen off. The sales this week have been 39,000 bales, of which 15,000 were taken on speculation and for export. The total sales this year down to the present time have been 2,618,461 bales, and to the corresponding period in 1863, 2,524,028 bales. There have been imported this year 2,178,821 bales; whilst last year the number was 1,585,276 bales. The trade have taken this year 1,546,896 bales, against 1,274,143 bales in 1863. The exports this year have reached 535,762 bales, and in 1863 they were 448,514 bales. There have been taken on speculation this year 527,181 bales, and last year they were 742,704 bales. The estimated stocks at the present time are 383,556 bales, whilst in 1863 they were 2,535,535 bales. The closing quotations this afternoon were:—Americans, $23\frac{3}{4}$d. to $27\frac{1}{4}$d.; Maceio, $25\frac{1}{4}$d. to $25\frac{3}{4}$d.; Bahia, $25\frac{1}{2}$d. to 26*d.*; Egyptian, $26\frac{3}{4}$d. to 30*d.*; Smyrna, $17\frac{1}{4}$d. to 20*d.*; Surats, $13\frac{1}{2}$d. to $20\frac{1}{4}$d.; Madras, $16\frac{1}{4}$d. to $16\frac{1}{2}$d.; Bengal, $11\frac{1}{2}$d. to $14\frac{1}{2}$d.; Scinde, $11\frac{1}{4}$d. to $12\frac{3}{4}$d.; China, $14\frac{1}{2}$d. to $16\frac{1}{4}$d.; and Japan, $17\frac{1}{4}$d. to $17\frac{1}{2}$d.

The markets at Manchester have during the week exhibited great firmness, and for most descriptions of goods the tendency is towards higher quotations. Buyers, however, are still disinclined to pay the prices demanded, and refrain generally from making large purchases; if, however, sellers would slightly lower their pretensions, a large business would in all probability be transacted. It is not likely the markets will exhibit much improvement during the next fortnight; but most people look forward to a better business being done early in the new year. There has not been a large business transacted in shipping yarns, but where spinners have been compelled to sell, lower prices have been accepted. Many buyers are waiting for telegrams in anticipation of the Overland Mail from India, and this is the chief reason why the market remains so quiet. In home-trade yarns the market has been rather stronger, and a fair business continues to be transacted at fully previous rates. The cloth market remains very firm, with an improved tendency in quotations; the improvement, however, is chiefly observable in the class of shirtings most suitable for India. The latest prices were for $\frac{7}{8}$ Grey Printers, 7*s.* 9*d.* to 15*s.*; $\frac{9}{8}$ Grey Madapollams, 7*s.* to 10*s.*; $\frac{9}{8}$ Grey Printers, 9*s.* 9*d.* to 17*s.* 3*d.*; $\frac{5}{4}$ Grey Shirtings, 11*s.* 6*d.* to 25*s.*; Water Twist, No. 20, 1*s.* 9*d.* to 2*s.* 6*d.*; No. 30, 2*s.* 3*d.* to 2*s.* 10*d.*; No. 40, 2*s.* 10*d.* to 3*s.* 4*d.*; Mule Twist, No. 20, 1*s.* 8*d.* to 2*s.* 4*d.*; No. 30, 1*s.* 11*d.* to 2*s.* 8*d.*; No. 40, 2*s.* to 2*s.* 10*d.*; No. 50, 2*s.* 5*d.* to 3*s.*; No. 60, 2*s.* 8*d.* to 3*s.* 2*d.*; No. 70, 2*s.* 11*d.* to 3*s.* 5*d.*; No. 80, 3*s.* 1*d.* to 3*s.* 7*d.*; No. 90, 3*s.* 3*d.* to 3*s.* 9*d.*; and No. 100, 3*s.* 6*d.* to 4*s.* 1*d.*

THERE are at this time many thousands of Confederate prisoners of war confined in the various forts and camps of the Northern States. A large proportion of them are wounded or sick, and all are in a state of destitution, the accounts of which, as given in private letters and in the newspapers, present a picture of human suffering, which has scarcely a parallel in modern times. The merest necessaries of life are wanting, and frequently the wounded prisoner has no raiment save that which is stark and stiffened with his clotted blood. Horrible as war is in all its features, assuredly it has no greater horrors than the long agony of the poor captive who, when the feverish excitement of the contest is over, is left to the bitter charity of strangers and foes, without one friendly hand to soothe the pains of body or friendly voice to whisper hope and comfort to his despairing mind. These men, cut off from the assistance of their kindred or the protection of their Government, have peculiar claims on the patriotism of their countrymen in Europe, and upon Christian benevolence everywhere. They did not recklessly or from choice embrace the profession of arms, but in exchanging the comforts, and often the luxuries, of home for the toils and hardships of a soldier's life, they obeyed a stern sense of duty and the call of their country in its extremest need. An unusual proportion, also, of those that fill the ranks of the Confederate armies belong to the higher walks of life, upon whom privations, such as are endured by prisoners in the hands of the North, fall with increased severity.

The Southern Prisoners' Relief Fund is intended to mitigate some of these sufferings which cannot altogether be relieved. Within little more than a twelvemonth, nearly £3,000 have been collected and expended in relief. The managers of the Fund are assisted in their efforts by self-devoted ladies in the principal Northern cities, who visit the sufferers and give them such aid as the means at their disposal render possible. Of late the Federal Government has granted permission that this Samaritan work may be done openly. It is earnestly hoped that all Southerners residing in Europe will support the Fund to the extent of their ability, and its objects may recommend themselves to all, irrespective of country or political convictions, who sympathise with the sufferings of their fellow-men.

Contributions will be received by J. H. ASHBRIDGE, Treasurer, Walmer Buildings, Water Street, Liverpool; or in London, by HENRY HOTZE, Esq., 17 Savile Row, W.; in Paris, by H. O. BREWER, Esq., 6 Rue Circulaire; and DANIEL HUBBARD, Esq., 24 Rue Lord Byron.

The Papal Government and the Confederate States.

THE following is the reply of His Holiness the POPE to the Manifesto of the Congress of the Confederate States:—

'Honourable Gentlemen,—Mr. SOUTTER has handed me your letter of November 11, with which, in conformity to the instructions of your Government, you have sent me a copy of the manifesto issued by the Congress of the Confederate States, and approved by the most honourable President, in order that the attention of the Government of the Holy See, to whom, as well as to the other Governments, you have addressed yourselves, might be called to it.

'The sentiments expressed in the manifesto, tending as they do to the cessation of the most bloody war which still rages in your countries, and to the putting an end to the disasters which accompany it by proceeding to negotiations for peace, being entirely in accordance with the disposition and character of the august head of the Catholic Church, I did not hesitate a moment in bringing it to the notice of the Holy Father.

'His Holiness, who has been deeply afflicted by the accounts of the frightful carnage of this obstinate struggle, has heard with satisfaction the expression of the same sentiments. Being the Vicar on earth of that God who is the Author of peace, he yearns to see these wraths appeased and peace restored. In proof of this, he wrote to the Archbishops of New York and New Orleans, as far back as October 18, 1862, inviting them to exert themselves in bringing about this holy object. You may, then, honourable gentlemen, feel well assured that whenever a favourable occasion shall present itself, His Holiness will not fail to avail himself of it, to hasten so desirable a result, and that all nations may be united in the bonds of charity.

'In acquainting you with this benignant disposition of the Holy Father, I am pleased to declare myself, with sentiments of the most distinguished esteem,

'Truly your servant,
'G. CARD. ANTONELLI.

'Rome, December 2, 1864.

An Historical Parallel.

IN the year 1777, while the contest between the Thirteen States of North America and England was raging furiously, a building at Portsmouth called the Rope-house was set on fire and entirely consumed. Shortly afterwards another large building in the Dockyard, called the Hemp-house, was found to contain a considerable store of combustibles. Other incendiary attempts followed in rapid succession. At Plymouth the design wholly miscarried. At Bristol some warehouses on the quay were burned, but the shipping fortunately escaped. A general panic ensued, replete with various surmises. The Tory party attributed these offences to the professors of American and Republican principles. The party accused retorted by declaring that these were malicious acts or inventions of the Tories instituted for the purpose of calumniating their adversaries. The real culprit turned out to be a fellow known as JOHN the Painter, who ultimately was convicted and hanged. This man, a native of Edinburgh, had spent three years in America, and had imbibed a deep hatred of England. According to a confession elicited by a pretended accomplice, he had concocted his schemes with SILAS DEANE of Connecticut, at that time a commissioner at the French Court, and had reason to believe that BENJAMIN FRANKLIN was employed on a similar errand. He expected, as he said, not only a money reward from SILAS DEANE, but also a commission in the American army. This story was clearly false so far as FRANKLIN was concerned, and the probabilities were strongly against the privity of SILAS DEANE. Yet colour was lent to the assertions of the man by an expression of FRANKLIN when writing to Dr. PRIESTLEY many months before: 'England,' said FRANKLIN, 'has begun to burn our seaport towns, secure, I suppose, that we shall never be able to return the outrage in kind.' In truth, however, the motives that actuated JOHN the Painter were not political. Possibly, he may have thought that his zeal would be rewarded in some form or other, but his life was made up of petty thefts, skilful depredations, and daring burglaries. The offence of arson merely gave a zest to the ordinary routine of a felonious existence. What would have been more unjustifiable than for the English Government, under such circumstances, to have branded the American authorities with the commission of these attempts, and to have endeavoured by such accusations to disgrace the cause of the Revolutionists in the eyes of the world? At the same time, the expressions of Dr. FRANKLIN plainly indicate that in his eyes such retaliation might, under certain circumstances, be recommended.

We are all by this time familiar with the somewhat 'sensational' story of the burning of New York. The fourteen travellers, with their fourteen carpet-bags and their fourteen lots of phosphorus, have been learned by heart. As in 1777, so in 1864, one party has thrown out accusations, and the other has retorted with allegations of conspiracy against the public liberty. Two persons have been arrested, but who and what they are, and what their motives may have been, is not yet given to the world. The occasion has, however, been improved by the Republican press. 'Confederate agents, or perhaps Democrats in league with rebels, have attempted to burn our sacred city. Two things, therefore, are clear: first, that the rebel Government is vile enough to stoop to any deed of darkness; second, that martial law alone can preserve New York in safety.' Thus reason Mr. LINCOLN's friends; for Mr. LINCOLN has always two grand objects in view—the exasperation of the Northern people against the South, and the absolute control by the military arm of the bodies and purses of his subjects. Time, perhaps, will show whether this attempt at incendiarism was a mere smart trick akin to the sinking of the Florida, or the act of persons urged by the hope of plunder and the phantasy of reward. Whatever may be the merits of the affair, no reasonable being will implicate the authorities at Richmond. The forbearance shown in spite of unparalleled provocations forbids the suspicion.

The matter, however, suggests a remark which may perhaps go home to the Yankee mind. The Departments at Richmond have been over and over again importuned with proposals for wreaking vengeance on a Government and a people which has never for a moment shrunk from the burning and the pillage of Southern towns. There are hundreds of men in the South whose very souls have been turned to gall by the outrages inflicted on their country or their family, whose one absorbing idea is hatred of their persecutors, whose lives are only valued as necessary to the destruction of their enemies. It is beyond question that the burning of any Northern city is at all times within the power of the Confederate Government. That being so, it is idle to suppose that the 'bogus' arson of November was concocted at Richmond.

Lastly, it is not to be imagined that the patience of the South is inexhaustible. There is no peculiar sanctity attaching to New York which did not attach to the barns of the Shenandoah Valley, to Atlanta, or to the towns and villages the conflagration of which marked the track of the host of SHERMAN. If New York or Boston were destroyed to-morrow, the retribution would not only be just, but perhaps even humane. Nothing but fear will restrain the savage nature of the Northern hordes; with them forbearance is folly, and mercy a laughing-stock. The destruction of one of their fairest cities might teach them that Southern women and children have felt the pangs of hunger, and shivered beneath the shelter of the canopy of heaven, and might frighten them into an abstinence from atrocities that emulate the fury of ZINGIS KHAN.

Notes on Events of the Week.

AMERICA.

AT last we have something like definite intelligence of Sherman in his march through Georgia. His principal force remained several days near Millen collecting supplies, and on December 2 the march was resumed in the direction of Savannah. A competent Confederate force will resist his progress beyond a certain point, whether he attempt to reach Savannah or Darien, and the Richmond journals state that it was rumoured his advance guard were already skirmishing with the outposts around the former place. It seems absolutely certain that a great battle has ere this been fought, in which the fate of Sherman and his army has been decided. Several combats between the Confederate cavalry under Wheeler and the cavalry of Sherman had taken place east of the Oconee River, in all of which the Yankees were repulsed. At Waynesboro', on December 4, the fight was a heavy one, and Kilpatrick, the Yankee leader, was wounded. At the same time the expedition under Foster, which moved inland from Port Royal on November 30, with the view of relieving Sherman, had been arrested by a signal defeat at Grahamsville, on the Charleston and Savannah Railway, and Foster had retreated, leaving his dead and wounded, to the number of 1,300, on the field. Foster's present position is on Broad River, under the cover of his gunboats. He had been largely reinforced, but up to the 3rd inst. had not resumed the offensive. It is clear enough that he can do nothing to extricate Sherman. The forces engaged in the battle at Grahamsville under Foster were 5,000 infantry, with 16 guns, against 1,400 State troops from Georgia, with 7 guns.

In Tennessee no general engagement had been fought since the battle of Franklin. General Hood is closely besieging Nashville, and has entirely cut off its communication with the North. His batteries on the Tennessee River, fourteen miles from the city, command the whole navigation of the stream, and seven Federal gunboats which had been sent to dislodge him went back discomfited, one of the boats badly damaged. One brigade of General Hood's army had marched in the direction of Murfreesboro. His advance, under Forrest, had already crossed the Cumberland River, as it was rumoured, and an invasion of Kentucky is doubtless the object of the movement.

In East Tennessee, according to Federal' accounts, General Burbridge, in evacuating Cumberland Gap, moved upon General Breckinridge, who was retiring into Western Virginia, but the Confederate accounts claim that Breckinridge was master of the situation, and that Burbridge was retreating upon Knoxville. The whole country around Knoxville had been laid waste by Sherman's order before he left Atlanta, according to the usual method of warfare pursued by that commander. General Beauregard officially reports that the Federals evacuated Decatur, Alabama, on November 26, after destroying their stores and ammunition.

IT is rumoured that the army of the Potomac has been reinforced by two corps from Sheridan. Grant was massing troops on the Jerusalem Plank Road, preparatory to another general movement upon Petersburg and Richmond. A great battle was daily expected. The Confederate batteries had been keeping up a fire upon the canal at Dutch Gap, and Butler had sent over three negro brigades to defend his diggers. General Rosser had achieved a very brilliant success on the northern frontier of Virginia, capturing Fort Kelly at New Creek on November 28, and shortly afterwards Piedmont, a most important station on the line of the Baltimore and Ohio Railway, where the largest machine shops of the company are established. He destroyed immense quantities of Federal stores and all the public buildings, and brought away with him, besides prisoners and artillery, 1,015 horses and 1,000 head of cattle.

THE report of Mr. Gideon Welles, the Federal Secretary of the Navy, states that since the beginning of the war 141 steamers and 62 ironclads have been added to the navy, and that, on December 1, 671 vessels were in course of construction, measuring 10,396 tons, and to carry 4,610 guns. On the face of it this appears an ample preparation against enemies who, according to Mr. Lincoln, are, and always have been, destitute 'equally of ships and of ports and harbours.' The expenditure of the Naval Department since March 1, 1864, is set down at $280,647,261. The value of the prizes taken during the present year is $14,396,250. Mr. Welles explains the difficulty of blockading the port of Wilmington—he evidently does not agree with Mr. Lincoln that the Confederates are destitute of ports—and says that Wilmington can only be shut up by a combined military and naval movement. If Wilmington is closed, Mr. Welles will then learn that it is still more difficult to effectually blockade 3,500 miles of coast. Mr. Welles designates the Alabama, Florida, and Georgia as 'English-built piratical cruisers,' and bullies Captain Semmes like a drunken fishfag, and in a manner that shows the Federal press is justified in describing him as a garrulous Mrs. Grundy. He also honours the owner of the Deerhound with some abuse. However, we are not concerned with the vulgar rant of Mr. Gideon Welles.

THE report of Mr. Fessenden, the Federal Secretary of the Treasury, estimates the public debt in July 1865 at $2,645,320,682. He estimates the expenditures at $1,168,256,005, and the receipts at $396,000,000, of which he says $300,000,000 ought to be realised from internal duties, and suggests that an income-tax should be collected from all without exemption. Deducting estimated receipts and unexpended appropriations, he estimates that $422,256,005 will have to be provided for by loans. We shall comment on Mr. Fessenden's report next week.

THE seizure of the Florida by the Wachusetts has been discussed in the Confederate Senate. The resolutions declare that the outrage is a wrong to every civilised maritime Power, and that the Brazilian Government is bound to enforce the restoration of the Florida. The resolutions also provide for laying the case before all European Governments, and for the appointment of a commissioner to confer with the Brazilian Government.

GENERAL DIX lately issued an order commanding all parties who have come from the South to New York since 1861 to register themselves, leaving their name and description at head-quarters. A short time afterwards a second order was issued, declaring that all persons who did not so register would be considered and treated as spies. This order was not allowed to remain a dead letter, and in one day upwards of sixty persons were arrested. If any one in New York has a spite against his neighbour, he has merely to inform General Dix that the hated individual is a Southern sympathiser, or, what is worse in the eyes of the Federal authorities, a political opponent of Mr. Lincoln, and suspicion is aroused, and an arrest is pretty sure to follow. In these proceedings we can see the commencement of a reign of terror.

THERE was a mutiny of negro troops at Memphis on November 11. It appears that the coloured troops tried to force their way out of the fort, where they were kept more like prisoners than soldiers. The outbreak was soon over. The correspondent of a New York paper writes: 'The big guns and little guns of the fort were turned upon the poor wretches, and many were laid low in the dust.' The Federal Administration has endeavoured to keep this affair a secret. The Memphis papers were not allowed to refer to it, but it oozed out through the correspondence of the New York papers.

THE Federal Government has issued some orders 'in reference to Confederate raids from Canada.' This and similar proceedings are to form a pretext for placing an imposing force upon the lakes, and the force on the lakes is intended as a demonstration to the people that the Government sympathises and encourages the popular antipathy to England.

IN a letter described as 'sharp,' Mr. Seward refuses to allow the money collected in Liverpool to be applied to the relief of Southern prisoners in the North. The Lincolnite papers consider the letter a proper rebuke to 'British impudence.' We can almost excuse the rudeness and inhumanity of Mr. Seward and his organs. Any manifestation of British humanity must seem like a galling insult to a Government waging war like savages. The employers of Butler, Turchin, Sheridan, and Sherman, must feel insulted that this country expresses sympathy with gallant men in their misfortune. Nor are we in the least surprised that Mr. Seward embraces the opportunity of abusing this country. He and the Government of which he is a member have been making political capital by fostering the Yankee hate of England. Mr. Seward does not officially assert that the war in America has been 'promoted and protracted by British subjects without a motive.' He knows that it will stir up the people and make the Lincoln Administration highly popular. We really do not know what Mr. Seward means by the fund collected at Liverpool being 'ostentatiously offered.' Surely there must be some confusion of facts and dates in Mr. Seward's mind. He must have been thinking of the Sanitary Fair or of the New York donations to Lancashire. The only conclusion to be drawn from this incident is that the Government of the United States regards benevolence as impertinence, and hates England as malignantly as it does the Confederate States.

MR. CHASE has been appointed Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, in place of the late Chief Justice Taney. Mr. Chase is known to Europe as Federal Secretary of the Treasury. He has practised at the bar, and was for some time one of the State Judges in Ohio, which State he represented in the Federal Senate.

THE capture of two blockade-runners, the Vixen and the General Armstrong, is reported in New York. The Armstrong was taken off Wilmington. She had a cargo of cotton, most of which was thrown overboard.

THE money market in New York has been unfavourably affected by the Message of President Lincoln and the report of Secretary Fessenden. On December 6, gold closed at 232. On the 10th it was quoted at 230.

ENGLAND.

ON Thursday last a deputation waited upon Mr. Adams, the Minister of the United States, to present an address emanating from the committee of the Emancipation Society, congratulating Mr. Lincoln on his election to the office of President for four years commencing from March 1865. Mr. Evans, as chairman of the Society, addressed Mr. Adams, stating that the efforts, the influence, and the example of England in the emancipation of the negro, had induced the countrymen of Mr. Adams to take the sound view on that question, so that the awakened conscience of the North had driven the slaveholders of the South into revolt, which was the sole cause of the war. Mr. Chesson, the secretary of the Society, then read the address, which was as follows:—

TO HIS EXCELLENCY ABRAHAM LINCOLN, PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

Sir,—We, the president and members of the Emancipation Society, with profound respect for your person and for your office, congratulate you upon your reelection as President of the United States of America. Your first election marked you out as the freely chosen leader of the people for the express and avowed purpose of resisting the encroachments of the slave power, and we rejoice that, after four years' experience, your countrymen have again determined that you shall act as their chief magistrate for another term of office, in order that the hateful institution of slavery may be entirely abolished. We agree with those who elected you in their deductions that 'slavery was the cause of the rebellion' it is your duty to quell; that it 'must be hostile to the principles of republican government;' and that both 'justice and national safety demand its extirpation,' and we at the same time feel confident that whilst vigorously conducting the remaining operations of the war, so as to accomplish this high purpose, your Administration will be guided, as it has hitherto been, by an earnest desire to mitigate the sufferings inseparable from a condition of strife. We have noticed with peculiar satisfaction the sanction and aid given by your Government to the voluntary efforts of the sanitary commission, whose agents have not confined their beneficent action to their own party in the struggle, but have bestowed the greatest care and attention upon the sick and wounded rebels who have fallen into your hands. We deplore the loss of valuable life in the protracted conflict which the slaveholders have forced upon your country; but it is an honour to you and to your fellow-citizens that no prisoners have been put to death for the mere fact of being taken in arms against your Government; and we have faith that you will continue to show all possible mercy and forbearance to the enemies of your republic, and thus leave to your contemporaries and to posterity the grateful task of placing your moderation in noble contrast with the deplorable and sanguinary ferocity exhibited by European despots towards those whom their cruelty has driven to revolt. That your exertions may shorten the duration of the war, and that your country, thoroughly purged and purified from the crime and curse of slavery, and with every citizen, without regard to race or colour, standing in perfect equality before the law, may enjoy internal happiness, and exert a useful and widespread influence for the advancement of liberty and the general good of mankind, is the wish and prayer of your sincere friends.

Mr. P. A. Taylor, M.P., the treasurer of the Society, spoke next, and observed that in the reelection of President Lincoln he saw, first, a forecast of the entire reconstruction of the great republic; second, the promotion of the abolition of that system of slavery which had been the blot of and disgrace upon the countrymen of Mr. Adams; and, third, in the future relations of England and the United States a state of things tending towards the realisation of peace, progress, and civilisation. The Hon. and Rev. Baptist Noel said that the choice of the American people seemed to him to be as creditable to the intelligence of the nation as it was to the virtue of Mr. Lincoln. That choice must surely exercise a powerful influence upon the counsels of the South, because thereby the leaders of the rebellion had been taught that the North was as firm and resolute to maintain its own rights as they were ardent to secure the triumph of their lawlessness. That being the case, the leaders of the rebellion—especially if the magnanimous, generous, and christian-like proposal of General Butler to include them in an amnesty from which they would have excluded him, were adopted—would have no further grounds to sustain this struggle except the resolute determination to commit two crimes—the crime of causeless rebellion and the crime of cruel slaveholding. He could not but hope that the leaders themselves, when they saw the equal firmness and generosity of the North, might yield to wiser feelings, and at any rate it was satisfactory to observe repeated and growing evidence that the non-slaveholding population of the South was not so reluctant to return to the Union, where they might enjoy liberty, fraternity, and equality under the folds of the old flag. Sir Charles Lyell and Dr. Massie followed him; the latter in the course of his speech stating that he was sorry to say that from certain very ostentatious displays of literary advocacy, and the sympathy which had been given to the South, there was danger of an unkindly feeling being engendered in the minds of friends across the Atlantic; but those parties, and the people who followed them, did not represent the middle and working classes, the backbone and sinew of the nation. The other speakers were Messrs. Thomas Hughes, Mason Jones, and Nicholay. Mr. Adams read a speech in reply, in which he thanked the deputation for their address. He could not disguise from himself, or from them, the painful fact that an opposite disposition had been manifested here in influential circles, and that the knowledge of this had given rise to a general impression among his countrymen that the whole British nation really desired the disruption and consequent downfall of the power of the United States. Hence had sprung up a corresponding degree of illwill which bade fair, if not counteracted, only to increase with time. If such passion were permitted a full indulgence between two nations, it needed little sagacity to foretell that, in the long run, the end would be war. He commented on the election of Mr. Lincoln, holding, first, that the South had participated in the contest by intrigues, and, second, that the fate of slavery was the turning-point of the decision made.

THE appeal of Dr. Colenso against the decision of his metropolitan the Bishop of Cape Town, depriving him of his see of Natal, and prohibiting him from the exercise of any divine office within the province, came on before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council on the 14th inst., and occupied four days in the hearing. The members of the Council present were the Lord Chancellor, Lord Cranworth, Lord Kingsdown, Dr. Lushington, and the Master of the Rolls. Mr. W. James, Q.C., and Mr. Fitzjames Stephen were heard for the appellant; Sir Hugh Cairns and the Queen's Advocate for the Bishop of Cape Town. The Bishop appeared under protest denying, with all due reverence, that Her Majesty in Council had any jurisdiction in the subject-matter of the petition, or that any appeal lay from what he had done in the matter of the complaint of the Right Reverend Dr. Colenso either to Her Majesty in Council or to the Judicial Committee. The whole force of the argument of Mr. James was directed to show that the Bishop of Cape Town had no jurisdiction against Dr. Colenso, that the Church of Natal was part of the Church of England, and that the Queen, as head of the latter, had the same authority over both. The Crown had no power to authorise the Bishop of Cape Town to institute criminal proceedings against the Bishop of Natal, or to pronounce sentence of deposition upon him. In support of this view the learned gentleman quoted several cases, maintaining that it was the clearest possible law that no office for life created under letters patent could be determined except by a scire facias, or a conviction for a criminal offence in a court of competent jurisdiction, and he went on to contend that if in the case of the Roman Catholic Church a Roman Catholic archbishop were to attempt to deprive a suffragan bishop of his see, an appeal would lie to the Pope, and that the Church of England ought not in that respect to be placed in a worse position by having denied to its bishops the power of appealing to the Sovereign, who was the supreme authority in the State, when they felt themselves aggrieved by the action of those placed immediately above them. Had such a case as the present occurred in the Presbyterian Church in the colonies, an appeal would, he might add, lie to the Conference, while a similar right of appeal would be found to exist among the members of every other religious denomination to some properly constituted tribunal whose authority they acknowledged. The truth was, however, that the Church of England was not in that respect in a worse position than other churches; for, according to her constitution, an appeal lay to the Sovereign, as the supreme visitor and highest authority in all ecclesiastical corporations. Indeed, the 25th William and Mary, cap. 20, showed clearly that the King had jurisdiction in every ecclesiastical case, just in the same way as previous to the Reformation it had been exercised by the Pope. The principle for which he argued was distinctly laid down, moreover, in the Act authorising the constitution of Courts of Delegates. The Church of England, in effecting a settlement in any of our colonies, took with her all the laws, usages, and jurisdiction of the Church at home, so far as they were capable of being exercised within that colony, and it was, he maintained, of the very essence of our Constitution that any jurisdiction whatsoever exercised by the authority given by the Sovereign was open to appeal. It seemed to him, he might further observe, that the Bishop of Cape Town had strangely forgotten that he was a bishop of the United Church of England and Ireland in the course which he had pursued. As to the Bishop of Natal, it was no part of his contract with the Crown when he received his appointment that he should become a member of the schismatical Church of South Africa, as Dr. Gray would seem to have done in his violation of his duty as a member of the Established Church.

Sir Hugh Cairns contended, on the other hand, that the Bishop of Cape Town had jurisdiction to try Dr. Colenso for heresy and to deprive him; second, that the Crown had no jurisdiction in the matter in its present stage by way of appeal from the sentence of its metropolitan; third, that the Crown had no original jurisdiction, visitorial or otherwise. On the positive side of the argument the learned counsel contended that the Crown had authority to make certain provisions in the letters patent as a matter of positive and coercive law, those provisions not, of course, being in contravention of any imperial law. The first argument, therefore, which he had to advance on the point of jurisdiction was that inasmuch as the Crown, in the year 1853, declared that the see of Natal should be subject to the Bishop of Cape Town, in the same manner as a suffragan bishop in the province of Canterbury should be subject to the archbishop, the Bishop of Natal was thereby placed under a coercive jurisdiction. Having said thus much upon that point, he should next deal with the question of consential jurisdiction, which would imply an agreement on the part of the members of a religious body located in any colony to abide by certain regulations. The Conference, for instance, might issue its commands to the Wesleyan body, and although there might be no direct contract in the case, those who joined the body would hold themselves bound to obey particular rules and orders; so in the present instance the command conveyed in the letters patent stating the Bishop of Natal should be subject to the Bishop of Cape Town in the same manner as a suffragan bishop in the province of Canterbury was subject to the archbishop might be regarded as one of those rules, bringing the case under the head of consential jurisdiction. Indeed, the whole point seemed to him to narrow itself to the question—Had the Archbishop of Canterbury the power to deprive his suffragan in a case of heresy? If so—and what he heard was, he thought, perfectly clear,—it must be admitted that the Bishop of Natal was equally subject to the Bishop of Cape Town. The Court took time to consider its judgment.

THE new station at Ludgate Hill, situate on the south side of that thoroughfare, was opened yesterday for public traffic. The works are as yet very incomplete, but the station, when finished, will resemble that erected at Blackfriars on the Surrey side, while the lines and platforms will be covered with iron framework and glazed roof as at Charing Cross. The opening of this station completes the 'Metropolitan Extensions.' It is hoped that before the summer the City Extension lines will be finished, so as to join the railway now opened with Farringdon Street Station, and by that route to connect the lines running southward from the metropolis with the Great Northern and North Western lines.

AN accident of a terrible nature occurred on the North Kent Railway on Friday last. A ballast train entered the Blackheath tunnel about five o'clock in the afternoon, and during the passage six trucks became detached and remained in the tunnel, while the engine with the remaining trucks proceeded. Shortly afterwards the express train coming from Charlton was signalled 'all right' at the entrance of the tunnel, and dashed into the darkness at the rate of 30 miles an hour. A frightful crash took place at once from the collision of the passenger train with the ballast trucks. The latter were smashed to atoms, and five platelayers on them were at once killed. The engine and tender of the express train were thrown on their sides and choked up the way. A van and two carriages were also shivered to pieces. The cries of the wounded, the shrieks of frightened women and children, the gloomy darkness of the tunnel lit up partially by the burning fragments of the carriages, created a scene of horror. Measures were at once taken to stop the traffic, and assistance was procured with the utmost speed. With great exertion the dead and wounded were collected, when it was found that, in addition to the five platelayers killed outright, the driver and stoker of the passenger train were frightfully burned and scalded. The stoker has since died. The two guards were also severely injured. Nine passengers are lying in a precarious condition at the Anti-Gallican Tavern at Charlton, and ten other persons have received great injuries.

IT appears that, from want of enterprise or insufficiency of information, an opportunity of securing a comfortable country-seat, a decent income and a position in life, together with the title and office of a rector, has been allowed to slip through the fingers of aspirants to such advantages. Two days since the advowson with right of next presentation to the rectory of Pickworth, the property of the Duke of St. Albans, was put up for sale by auction at Garraway's by Messrs. Fox & Bousfield. Nothing could be more eloquent than the language in which the auctioneer described the contiguity of Pickworth to the seats of rich and noble landed proprietors, the salubrity of the site of the rectory, and the commodious size of the parish. Perhaps there was even a slight hint about the Belvoir hounds, or the well-preserved coverts of Belton or Syston. Then, as to the pecuniary side of the matter, the living was worth 400*l.* a year, with a good substantial house and a tidy glebe. Backed by such a combination of happy circumstances, the auctioneer was justified in considering 4,000*l.* as a fair bid for starting. A dead silence followed the harangue, broken at last by the feeble offer of 1,500*l.* From that sum there was a smart run up to 2,950*l.*, and then the fox fairly went to earth. Persuasion fell on deaf ears, and after a declaration that such an offer was out of all proportion to the true value, the auctioneer was fain to knock down the lot to himself at the figure of 3,000*l.* The public will await with interest some explanation of this extraordinary apathy on the part of speculators in Church property.

THE wedding present from the people of Victoria to the Princess of Wales was despatched from Melbourne at the end of October. The gift is a flower-vase of the most choice materials. From a stand composed of polished blackwood from Mount Macedon rises a rockwork of quartz specimens streaked with gold, obtained from Wood's Point, Castlemaine, and Tarnagulla, and bright black nubbly antimony from Costerfield. Supported by this is a base of St. Arnaud silver, exhibiting specimens of Australian fauna and flora. From the centre of the group spring two golden stems of the oak, which symbolise England and Denmark, and the tree-fern, which represents Victoria. The whole is surmounted by a fluted silver bowl for flowers, round the border of which are grapes and frosted vine-leaves. The cost of the whole is 300 guineas. The amount was raised by shilling subscriptions.

MR. and MRS. STRATTON and Miss Minnie Warren, with Commodore Nutt, have been holding levees at the Crystal Palace, Sydenham, during the present week. Great crowds of visitors assembled to behold the famous Tom Thumb and his yet more diminutive friends.

THE CONTINENT.

FRANCE.

A RUMOUR has largely obtained in Germany, though contradicted by the Mémorial Diplomatique, that Prussia is negotiating with Bavaria for the cession to France of a small piece of territory on the Sarre, containing coal-fields of great value, in return for the future good offices of the latter country with regard to the Prussianising of the Duchies. The denial, however, goes no further than a declaration that the cession will be of no political importance, but will be made for purely industrial purposes. It is also said that France is endeavouring to acquire a naval station on the shore of the North Sea, for which Bremerhaven is named as a likely place. With regard to the general question of the Duchies, France still refuses to deviate from the expectant attitude which she has maintained from the beginning of the difficulties.

Those interested in the internal politics of France have been somewhat startled by the news that MM. Carnot and Garnier-Pagès, two leading members of the Opposition, have resolved to resign their seats as deputies of the Department of the Seine. Their resolution is said to be connected with the decision given in the case of the 'Thirteen,' to which body both of these deputies belonged. The Siècle points out that, by insisting upon this view of the question, MM. Carnot and Garnier-Pagès establish a deplorable confusion between judicial and political questions; and another journal says that the lapse of time between the cause and the effect, the delivery of the judgment and the resignation of the seats, diminishes considerably the significance of the proceeding.

A serious difference has lately taken place between two high prelates of the Gallican Church, which has very nearly created a scandal. Mgr. de Ségur, during a recent visit to Rome, accused some of the French bishops of lukewarmness in the cause of the Pope, and among them he named Mgr. Darboy, Archbishop of Paris, his own metropolitan. The Archbishop called on Mgr. de Ségur to retract his accusations, or to cease preaching and confessing in the diocese of Paris. Mgr. de Ségur replied in an unsatisfactory manner, whereupon the Archbishop laid upon him the threatened interdict. Mgr. de Ségur is the fashionable confessor in the Faubourg St. Germain, and consequently this measure caused a great perturbation in that quarter. The Papal Nuncio then interfered in the affair, and induced Mgr. de Ségur to make the explanations required by the Archbishop. He was thereupon relieved of the interdict; only, by way of a permanent reminder of his fault, he was forbidden to wear the insignia of his rank as Canon of St. Denis.

Every casual visitor to Paris must have recognised the fact that the crossing of any of the great thoroughfares is a matter of danger, compared to which the perils of Oxford Circus sink into insignificance, and even Cheapside appears easy. So thoroughly was a certain old lady of Paris impressed with this, that she had for years kept herself to that side of the boulevards on which she lived. Not even the strong arm of a man-servant could inspire her with sufficient confidence to cross that perilous passage at the top of the Rue de la Paix. All the quarter between the Boulevards des Italiens, the Rue Royale, and the Rue de Rivoli, was as unknown to her as the interior of Africa. On her death, which took place lately, she was found to have left by will a large sum to any hackney-coach keeper who would start several lines of small omnibuses to cross the boulevards every five minutes at the top of all the principal streets, for the accommodation of elderly ladies and gentlemen as nervous as herself—the fare to be one sou. Many cab-proprietors have already come forward to undertake the business. The only misfortune is that the fulfilment of the old lady's wishes will cause so great a disturbance in the traffic, that the position of all foot-passengers who cannot take advantage of her omnibuses will be made considerably worse.

ITALY.

On the 15th inst. were published in the Official Gazette of Turin the various documents which complete the Franco-Italian Convention; the Bill which has passed through the Chamber and Senate, and the royal assent thereto; and a general ratification of the terms of the Convention. The Italian journals announce that the report of the Committee of Enquiry on the events of September cannot be presented to the Chamber for some days, although the Committee has spared neither time nor trouble on its work. The military enquiry ordered by the Minister of War on the same affair has been terminated, and comes to the following conclusion. 'There is reason for prosecuting regularly, according to the criminal law, fifty-six carbineers, and this trial should take place at the earliest opportunity.' The Chamber of Deputies on the 15th inst. authorised the continuation to the end of the year 1865 of the present law with regard to brigandage. This law, which is of a very severe character, has had the best effects in mitigating the evil against which it is directed. The statistics of the present brigandage in the south of Italy are interesting. A band of fifteen, without any acknowledged chief, exists in the province of the Abruzzi, and about the same number at Castellamare in the neighbourhood of Naples. In the farther Abruzzi there are four bands, under recognised chiefs, with an average of 17 in each. In the Terra di Lavoro, on the confines of the Papal States, there are 12 bands, one of which is 55 strong; the rest number about 110 men together. In the principality of Avellino there are 5 bands, of 5 apiece. In Salerno, 2, of 25 and 20 respectively. In the Basilicata the number of brigands has been reduced during the past year from 500 to 100, who are scattered among 12 bands. In Hither Calabria there are 32, and in Farther Calabria 25 brigands. Grand total in nine provinces, about 500 brigands. From the circumstantial detail of these statistics it is evident that the central authorities are now masters of the situation against these scoundrels; the continuation of the same energy during another year will, it is hoped, thoroughly eradicate this crying evil.

The city of Florence is making great preparations for the reception of the various branches of the Administration; the several available public buildings have been distributed among the public offices; the Palazzo Vecchio will be the seat of the Senate and the House of Deputies. Subscriptions have been made for the relief of the sufferers from the late flood; it has been remarked with bitterness that the Church has failed altogether to come forward to the assistance of the unfortunate Florentines. The Pope sent 200*l.*, and all credit is due to him, for of all the Church dignitaries he is probably the one who has least command of ready money. But, considering the enormous incomes enjoyed by ecclesiastical corporations in Tuscany, they may be said to have utterly failed in their duty. It appears that the Archbishop of Pisa has a yearly revenue of nearly 17,000*l.*; the Carmelite nuns of St. Theresa in Florence have 16,000*l.* a year for the support of 54 members; the 49 Frati della SS. Annunziata have about 25,000*l.* a year; the Dominicans, 31 in number, have 28,000*l.* Many others are equally rich. The various monastic establishments in Florence are more than 50 in number. No better argument can be brought forward for the necessity of Signor Vacca's bill for the suppression of these establishments. It is feared that in consequence of certain intrigues the bill will be shelved, at least for the next session.

Some scandal has been created at Rome by the defection of Cardinal d'Andrea from the Papal cause. He has taken up his abode in Naples, and openly declares his determination not to return to Rome. The Pope, it is said, has sent him word that, as he has gone to Naples without leave, he had better stay there. The Cardinal makes a point of exhibiting his liberal tendencies by receiving priests of the Emancipation Society, and conversing with them as a kindred spirit. He asserts that the Pope is personally the chief obstacle in the way of a reconciliation between Italy and the Holy See. A story, coming from Rome, is, however, rather inconsistent with the Cardinal's statement. It appears that Don Vincenzio Colonna, a member of that princely house whose chronicles are worthily related in Bulwer Lytton's 'Rienzi,' is an intimate friend of His Holiness, and that one day he was surprised to hear the Pope assert that the Roman Catholic religion did not need the assistance of the temporal power to remain 'the true religion of God.' Don Vincenzio related the fact to his friends, and it was soon generally disseminated; so that now a Roman discussing the question never fails to quote the Pope's authority in proof of the fact that the temporal power is not absolutely necessary for the preservation of religion. The difficulties between Russia and the Papacy are on the increase. M. de Meyendorff, the Russian representative at Rome, has gone to Florence to avoid the diplomatic reception in the Vatican at Christmas. It is expected that the Pope will send him his passports, should the Czar interdict all communication between Rome and Poland. Rumours were abroad of the discovery of an Italian plot for the assassination of the Pope and Cardinal Antonelli. It turned out eventually to be in some way similar to the 'Confederate' plot for burning New York. The pretended assassins were proved to be staunch Bourbonists, and therefore devoted to the Pope. Cardinal Antonelli has promised the French Government to give them the Pope's reply on the matter of the Franco-Italian Convention before the end of the year.

COPENHAGEN.

A difficulty has occurred with regard to the proposed changes in the constitution of Denmark, in consequence of the separation of the Duchies. The Landsthing, or Upper House, has declined to allow the Lower House to settle all the details of the change, and then present it to the Upper House to be accepted or rejected in gross. The Lower House is therefore called upon to reconsider its decision. Should a compromise be effected, such as a committee formed of both Houses, and reporting separately to both, harmony will be restored; if, however, each party continues to maintain its present opinion, the Government will be obliged to have recourse to a dissolution to get out of the difficulty.

GERMANY.

No new circumstance has occurred with regard to the ultimate solution of the succession question. As has been already stated, the Austro-Prussian Commissioners for the temporary government of the Duchies inaugurated their administration by demanding an oath of submission from the local authorities. The University of Kiel, the most influential body in that part of Germany, discussed the demand for some hours, and at length agreed to give the required promise, 'without prejudice to the future destiny of the Duchies,' at the same time protesting against annexation by Prussia, against the pretensions of the Grand-Duke of Oldenburg, and in favour of those of the Duke of Augustenburg. The Commissioners accepted their declaration, with all its reserves and protests. The example of the professors of the University has been followed by a great number of local functionaries. The rights of the Duchies have been guarded in another case of small apparent importance were it not that the most trivial circumstances have grown into importance throughout this strange affair. The vessels belonging to the Duchies are to carry their national colours of white, red, and blue, instead of the black and white colours of Prussia, as originally proposed by that Power. This concession has been made on the request of Austria.

The secondary States of Germany are about to make another attempt in support of their united existence. A conference between their plenipotentiaries is to take place at Munich, with a view of protesting against the doctrine that Austria and Prussia are the protecting Powers of the Confederation, and the remaining States merely their protégés. They desire, in their own words, to form a united body capable of protecting the Confederation for the future against certain menaces which are a disgrace to the German fatherland. According to general accounts, Austria is not averse to the formation of such a body; and Herr von Schmerling is to attend at Munich on her behalf. The Wanderer of Vienna is, however, of a contrary opinion, and asserts that the formation of a third Power of equal strength with the other two is impossible and useless—impossible, because the complete unity of such a body is not feasible, and because the united strength of the secondary States is not equal to that of one of the great Powers; useless, because, even if the minor Confederation as suggested were possible, it must act in conformity with the wishes of the great Powers, or create deplorable disturbances in Germany. Such is the substance of the Wanderer's argument; it is only remarkable inasmuch as it virtually condemns the whole Confederation, as at present constituted, quite as severely as the proposed alliance of the secondary States.

The German States which have consented to become members of the new Zollverein, on the basis of the Franco-Prussian treaty of commerce, expressed a wish for certain modifications in that treaty. These have accordingly been made. The amended treaty will be submitted to the various Chambers, and will come into operation on July 1, 1865. A new treaty of commerce between Austria and Prussia is about to be negotiated at Berlin, on the basis of the former treaty of 1852. Bavaria and Saxony will take part in the discussions.

The Austrian Government is inclined to deal leniently with its political offenders. Out of 809 persons arrested, 617 have been released, 116 have been sent back to their own parishes under escort, 46 have been punished by the correctional tribunal, and 50 yet await trial. Count Tarnoroski, condemned by court-martial to eight years' hard labour in chains, has had his punishment remitted to eight years' simple 'reclusion.' Eight Austrian subjects condemned by the tribunals of Warsaw have been restored to their country on the request of the Austrian Consul. With regard to the late disturbances in Venetia, the greater part of the persons arrested will be tried by the civil tribunals instead of courts-martial. A detachment of the Austro-Mexican force has left Trieste in the Indiana, numbering 1,220 men; the total of the troops sent to Vera Cruz since the 20th ult. is 5,700 men.

SPAIN.

This country has passed through a Ministerial crisis of some severity. The Narvaez Ministry, in a cabinet council, decided to announce the abandonment of Santo Domingo in the speech from the throne. The Queen, however, absolutely refused her consent to such a course: the Ministry had no alternative but to resign. Señor Pavia then attempted to form a Cabinet, but was obliged to give up the undertaking on the refusal of the Queen to accept certain of the proposed members. Another attempt was then made by SS. Isturitz and Miraflores, but with no more success. The Queen was therefore obliged to summon General Narvaez again, who has accordingly returned to office with the whole of his Cabinet. The Government has been informed that England has resolved to recognise the insurgents of Santo Domingo as belligerents, that decision being founded on reserves made by her at the time of the reannexation of that island, and on the fact that the Spanish forces have not established an effective blockade. M. Pereire has agreed with Spain for a loan of 3,000,000*l.* at a price which gives him about 14 per cent. It is secured on the North of Spain Railway, and will, it is hoped, be used for the reestablishment of Spanish credit in Europe.

GREECE.

The failure of the olive crop, the continual dismissals of able and tried servants from public offices, and the appointment of inefficient and unworthy persons in their stead, have tended to weaken the public mind in the Ionian Islands to such a degree that the people look upon the new dynasty most unfavourably. Some disorders have taken place in Zante, in which a few persons were wounded. The weather is very bad in the Adriatic. A terrific hurricane is shortly expected to visit Venice, and then to pass over Corfu. From the continent the news is scarcely more satisfactory. Brigandage and assassinations continue. A band, commanded by a man named Drakos, which infested Attica, has had six men killed in an encounter with the National Guard. Another band in the same district retreated in good order before the troops sent against it. A change of Ministry is supposed to be imminent; the Minister for Foreign Affairs has already resigned, and Signor Bedueni takes his place.

MEXICO.

The French troops have landed at Mazatlan and occupied that town. The Imperial forces have been defeated by Alvarez, if we may believe the intelligence from New York, and that general proceeded to march on Acapulco. The Emperor Maximilian returned to the capital on October 30, after his long journey through the provinces. He was received by the population of the city with a spontaneous cordiality which he duly appreciated. The ex-President General Miramon has been sent to Berlin on a special mission from the Emperor. A circular has been addressed to the prefects of the provinces, which gives the administrative programme of the new Government. It declares that every Mexican who confines himself within the limits of the law, whatever may be his party, has a right to the protection of the Emperor. It further asserts for every Mexican, rich or poor, a right of access to the representatives of the Government. Justice is to be prompt, clear, and legal. No one must remain in prison without being informed of the reason for his detention as quickly as possible. Preventive arrests may only be made in cases of extreme danger. Besides this circular three decrees have been published, one proclaiming the right and supremacy of the Emperor, the second reestablishing a proper system of registration of births and deaths, and the third instituting a rural guard for the extermination of brigandage. On the last subject a letter has been written by the Emperor to his Minister of State, Señor Velasquez de Leon, in which he declares that all persons found in arms against the Imperial power in Mexico will be treated as bandits, and executed without mercy. Letters have been received from the Emperor of Russia and the President of the Republic of Switzerland recognising the Empire of Mexico.

SOUTH AMERICA.

The Congress of Lima has resolved to commence its sittings on the 14th inst. Seven States are already represented therein; viz. the Argentine Republic, Bolivia, Chili, Columbia, Equador, Peru, and Venezuela. The object of it is to assert the independence of South American States from European control, and to concert measures for their protection in case of need.

The difficulty which arose at Montevideo in consequence of the arbitrary determination of the Brazilian Admiral to search foreign ships for contraband of war, has been arranged by a conference held on board the French man-of-war Astræa, at which the Brazilian Admiral renounced all his pretensions. Hopes are entertained that the dispute between Brazil and Uruguay may be stopped without having recourse to arms.

MADAGASCAR.

A quarrel has taken place in this country between the French and the natives, in consequence of some insults passed upon two French merchants by some native officers. The merchants were knocked down and were in some danger, when they were saved by the timely arrival of the English Consul, Mr. Pakenham, on the scene. The English and French Consuls made a united demand for satisfaction for the outrage, and an indemnity to the injured men. The Government of Madagascar gave the satisfaction willingly, as it only involved the condemnation of the officers to penal servitude; but with regard to the indemnity they suggest that England had better pay it, as it is in consequence of the teaching of her missionaries that the outrage was committed. After that go and evangelise a set of savages!

CHINA AND JAPAN.

Sir Rutherford Alcock, British Ambassador to Japan, has been recalled for a few months in order to advise on our future relations with Japan. The Emperor of China has instituted the Order of the Dragon as a reward for the Frenchmen employed by him to fight the Taepings. It will consist of a yellow riband, suspending a five-clawed imperial dragon, with the inscription 'Before it the lion turns pale, and the tigor silent.' It is not stated whether any of these decorations are to be bestowed on the English troops. The Franco-Chinese force is to be reorganised and increased.

PRESIDENT LINCOLN'S ANNUAL MESSAGE.

THE following message was delivered to the Federal Congress on the 6th inst.:—

Fellow-citizens of the Senate and House of Representatives,—Again the blessings of health and an abundant harvest claim our profoundest gratitude to Almighty God.

The condition of our foreign affairs is reasonably satisfactory. Mexico continues to be a theatre of civil war, while our political relations with that country have undergone no change. We have at the same time maintained neutrality between the belligerents.

At the request of the States of Costa Rica and Nicaragua a competent engineer has been authorised to make a survey of the river San Juan and the port of San Juan. It is a source of much satisfaction that the difficulties which for a moment excited some political apprehensions, and caused a closing of the interoceanic transit route, have been amicably adjusted, and that there is a good prospect that the route will soon be reopened with an increase of capacity and adaptation. We could not exaggerate either the commercial or the political importance of that great improvement. It would be doing injustice to an important State not to acknowledge the directness, frankness, and cordiality with which the United States of Columbia have entered into intimate relations with this Government. A Claims Convention has been constituted to complete the unfinished work of the one which closed the session in 1861.

The new Liberal Constitution of Granada having gone into effect with the universal acquiescence of the people, the Government under it has been recognised, and diplomatic intercourse with it has arisen in a cordial and friendly spirit.

The long-deferred Ares Island claim has been satisfactorily paid and discharged.

Mutual arrangements have been made of payments awarded by the late joint commission for the settlement of claims between the United States and Peru. An earnest and cordial friendship continues to exist between the two countries, and such efforts as were in my power have been used to remove misunderstanding and avert a threatened war between Peru and Spain.

Our relations are of the most friendly nature with Chili, the Argentine Republic, Bolivar, Costa Rica, Paraguay, San Salvador, and Hayti. During the past year no difference of any kind has arisen with any of these republics; and, on the other hand, they sympathise with the United States, and are constantly expressing cordiality and earnestness.

The claim arising from the seizure of the cargo of the brig Macedonian in 1821 has been paid in full by the Government of Chili. Civil war continues in the Spanish part of San Domingo, apparently without prospect of an early close.

Official correspondence has been freely opened with Liberia, and it gives us a pleasing view of social and political progress in that republic. It may be expected to derive new vigour from American influence, improved by the rapid disappearance of slavery in the United States. I solicit your authority to furnish to the republic a gunboat at moderate cost, to be reimbursed to the United States by instalments. Such a vessel is needed for the safety of that State against the native African races; and, in Liberian hands, it would be more effective in arresting the African slave trade than a squadron in our own hands. The possession of the least organised naval force would stimulate a generous ambition in the republic, and the confidence which we should manifest by furnishing it would win forbearance and favour towards the colony from all civilised nations.

The proposed overland telegraph between America and Europe by way of Behring's Straits and Asiatic Russia, which was seconded by Congress at the last Session, has begun under very favourable circumstances by an association of American citizens, with the cordial goodwill and support of this Government, as of those of Great Britain and Russia. Assurances have been received from most of the South American Governments of their high appreciation of the enterprise, and their readiness to cooperate in constructing lines tributary to that world-encircling communication. I learn with much satisfaction that the noble design of a telegraphic communication between the eastern coast of America and Great Britain has been renewed, with full expectation of its early accomplishment. Thus, it is hoped that, with the return of domestic peace, the country will be able to resume with energy and advantages our former high career of commerce and civilisation.

Our very popular and estimable representative in Egypt died in April last. An unpleasant altercation which arose between the temporary incumbent of the office and the Government of the Pasha resulted in a suspension of intercourse. The evil was promptly remedied on the arrival of the successor in the Consulate, and our relations with Egypt, as well as our relations with the Barbary Powers, are entirely satisfactory.

The rebellion which has so long been flagrant in China has at last been suppressed, with the cooperating good offices of this Government and of the other Western commercial States. The judicial consular establishment there has become very difficult and onerous, and it will need legislative action for the extension of our commerce and the more intimate intercourse which has been interrupted with the Government and people of that vast Empire.

China seems to be accepting with hearty goodwill the conventional laws which regulate commercial and social intercourse among the Western nations.

Owing to the peculiar situation of Japan and the anomalous form of its government, the action of that Empire in performing treaty stipulations is inconstant and capricious. Nevertheless, good progress has been effected by the Western Powers moving with enlightened concert.

Our own pecuniary claims have been allowed or put in course of settlement, and an inland sea has been reopened to commerce. There is reason, also, to believe that these proceedings have increased rather than diminished the friendship of Japan towards the United States.

The ports of Norfolk, Fernandina, and Pensacola have been opened by proclamation. It is hoped that foreign merchants will now consider whether it is not safer and more profitable to themselves, as well as just to the United States, to resort to these and other open ports than it is to pursue through many hazards and at vast cost a contraband trade with other ports which were closed, if not by actual military occupation, at least by a lawful and effectual blockade.

For myself, I have no doubt of the power and duty of the Executive, under the law of nations, to exclude enemies of the human race from an asylum in the United States. If Congress should think that proceedings in such cases lack the authority of law, or ought to be further regulated by it, I recommend that provision be made for effectually preventing foreign slave-traders from acquiring domicile and facilities for their criminal occupation in our country.

It is possible that if it were a new and open question, the maritime Powers, with the light they now enjoy, would not concede the privileges of a naval belligerent to the insurgents of the United States, destitute as they are, and always have been, equally of ships of war and of ports and harbours.

Disloyal emissaries have been neither less assiduous nor more successful during the last year than they were before that time in their efforts, under favour of that privilege, to embroil our country in foreign wars. The desire and determination of the Government of the maritime States to defeat that design are believed to be as sincere, and cannot be more earnest, than our own. Nevertheless, unforeseen political difficulties have arisen, especially in Brazilian and British ports, and on the northern boundary of the United States, which have required, and are likely to continue to require, the practice of constant vigilance and a just and conciliatory spirit on the part of the United States, as well as of the nations concerned and their Governments.

Commissioners have been appointed, under the Treaty with Great Britain, on the adjustment of the claims of the Hudson Bay and Puget Sound Agricultural Companies in Oregon, and are now proceeding to the execution of the trust assigned to them.

In view of the insecurity of life and property in the region adjacent to the Canadian border, by reason of assaults of desperadoes, committed by inimical and desperate persons who are harboured there it has been thought proper to give notice that after the expiration of six months, the period constitutionally stipulated in existing arrangements with Great Britain, the United States must hold themselves at liberty to increase their naval armament on the lakes if they shall find that proceeding necessary, and the condition of the border will necessarily come into consideration in connection with the question of continuing or modifying the rights of transit from Canada through the United States, as well as the regulation of imports, which were temporarily established by the reciprocity treaty of June 5, 1854. I desire, however, to be understood, while making this statement, that the colonial authorities of Canada are not deemed to be internationally unjust or unfriendly towards the United States, but, on the contrary, there is every reason to expect that, with the approval of the Imperial Government, they will take the necessary measures to prevent new incursions across the border.

The Act passed at the last Session for the encouragement of immigration has, so far as was possible, been put into operation. It seems to need amendment, which will enable the officers of the Government to prevent the practice of frauds against the immigrants while on their way and on their arrival in the ports, so as to secure them here a free choice of avocations and places of settlement. A liberal disposition toward this great national policy is manifested by most of the European States, and ought to be reciprocated on our part by giving the immigrants effective national protection. I regard our immigrants as one of the principal replenishing streams which are appointed by Providence to repair the ravages of internal war and its wastes of national strength and health. All that is necessary is to secure the flow of that stream in its present fulness, and to that end the Government must in every way make it manifest that it neither needs nor designs to impose involuntary military service upon those who come from other lands to cast their lot in our country.

The judicial affairs of the Government have been successfully administered during the last year. The legislation of the last Session of Congress has beneficially affected the revenue, although sufficient time has not yet elapsed to experience the full effect of several of the provisions of the Acts of Congress imposing increased taxation. The receipts during the year from all sources upon the basis of warrants signed by the Secretary of the Treasury, including loans and the balance in the Treasury on July 1, 1863, were $1,394,796,007 2c., and the aggregate disbursements, upon the same basis, were $1,298,056,101 89c., leaving a balance in the Treasury, as shown by the warrants, of $96,739,905 73c. Deduct from these amounts the amount of the principal of the public debt redeemed and the amount of issues in substitution therefor, and the actual cash operations of the Treasury were—Receipts, $884,076,646 77c.; disbursements, $865,236,087 86c., which leaves a cash balance in the Treasury of $18,842,558 71c. Of the receipts, there were derived from Customs $102,316,152 99c.; from lands, $588,533 29c.; from direct taxes, $475,648 96c.; from internal revenue, $109,741,154 10c.; from miscellaneous sources, $47.511,448 10c.; and from loans applied to actual expenditures, including the former balance, $623,443,929 13c. There were disbursed for the civil service, $27.505,599 46c.; for pensions and Indians, $7,517,930 97c.; for the War Department, $60,791,841 97c.; for the Navy Department, $85,733,292 77c.; for interest of the public debt, $53,685,421 69c.; making an aggregate of $865,234,087 86c.; and leaving a balance in the Treasury of $18,842,558 71c., as before stated. For the actual receipts and disbursements for the first quarter, and the estimated receipts and disbursements for the three remaining quarters, of the current fiscal year, and the general operations of the Treasury in detail, I refer you to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury.

I concur with him in the opinion that the proportion of moneys required to meet the expenses consequent upon the war derived from taxation should be still further increased, and I earnestly invite your attention to this subject, to the end that there may be such additional legislation as shall be required to meet the just expectations of the Secretary.

The public debt on the 1st day of July last, as appeared by the books of the Treasury, amounted to $1,740,690,489 49c. Probably, should the war continue for another year, that amount may be increased by not far from five hundred millions. Held as it is for the most part by our own people—a substantial branch of national, though private property—for obvious reasons the more equally this property can be distributed among all the people the better. To favour such general distribution greater inducements to become owners might, perhaps with good effect, and without injury, be presented to persons of limited means.

With this view I suggest whether it might not be both competent and expedient for Congress to provide that a limited amount of some future issue of public securities might be held by any bonâ fide purchaser exempt from taxation and from seizure for debt, under such restrictions and limitations as might be necessary to guard against abuse of so important a privilege.

This would enable every prudent person to set aside a small annuity against a possible day of want. Privileges like these would render the possession of such securities, to the amount limited, most desirable to every person of small means who might be able to save enough for this purpose.

The great advantage of citizens being creditors as well as debtors with relation to the public debt is obvious. Men readily perceive they cannot be much oppressed by a debt which they owe to themselves.

The public debt on the 1st of July last, although somewhat exceeding the estimate of the Secretary of the Treasury made to Congress at the commencement of last Session of Congress, falls short of the estimate of that officer, made in the preceding December, as to its probable amount at the beginning of this year, by the sum of $399,509,731. This fact exhibits a satisfactory condition and conduct of the operations of the Treasury.

The national banking system is promising to be acceptable to capitalists and to the people. On November 5, 584 National banks had been organised, a considerable number of which were conversions from State banks. Changes from State systems to the National systems are rapidly taking place, and it is hoped that very soon there will be in the United States no bank of issue not authorised by Congress, and no bank-note circulation not secured by the Government. That the Government and the people will derive great benefit from this change in the banking system of the country can hardly be questioned. The National system will create a reliable and permanent influence in support of the national credit, and protect the people against loss in the use of paper money. Whether or not any further legislation is advisable for the suppression of State bank issues it will be for Congress to determine.

It seems quite clear that the Treasury cannot be satisfactorily conducted unless the Government can exercise a restraining power over the bank-note circulation of the country.

The report of the Secretary of War and the accompanying documents will detail the campaigns of the armies in the field since the date of the last annual Message, and also the operations of the several administrative bureaus for the War Department during the last year. It will also specify the measures deemed essential for the national defence, and to keep up and supply the requisite military force.

The report of the Secretary of the Navy presents a comprehensive and satisfactory exhibit of the affairs of that department, and of the naval service. It is a subject of congratulation and laudable pride to our countrymen that a navy of such vast proportions has been organised in so brief a period and conducted with so much efficiency and success. The general exhibit of the navy, including vessels under construction on December 1, 1864, shows a total of 671 vessels, carrying 4,610 guns, and of 510,396 tons, being an actual increase during the year, over and above all losses by shipwreck or in battle, of 88 vessels, 167 guns, and 42,427 tons.

The total number of men at this time in the naval service, including officers, is about 51,000. There have been captured by the navy during the year 324 vessels, and the whole number of naval captures since hostilities commenced 1,374, of which 267 were steamers. The gross proceeds arising from the sale of condemned prize property thus far reported amount to $14,396,250 51c. A large amount of such proceeds is still under adjudication, and yet to be reported.

The total expenditures of the Navy Department of every description, including the cost of the immense squadrons that have been called into existence from March 4, 1861, to November 1, 1864, are $238,647,262 35c. Your favourable consideration is requested to the various recommendations of the Secretary of the Navy, especially in regard to a navy yard and suitable establishment for the construction and repairs of iron vessels and the machinery and armour on our ships, to which reference was made in my last annual Message.

Your attention is also invited to the views expressed in the report in relation to the legislation of Congress at its last Session in respect to prizes on our inland waters.

I cordially concur in the recommendation of the Secretary as to the propriety of creating the new rank of Vice-Admiral in our naval service.

Your attention is invited to the report of the Postmaster-General for a detailed account of the operations and financial condition of the Post Office Department. The postal revenues for the year ending June 30, 1864, amounted to $12,438,253 78c., and the expenditures to $12,644,786 20c., the excess of expenditures over receipts being $206,652 42c. The views presented by the Postmaster-General on the subject of special grants by the Government in aid of the establishment of a new line of ocean mail steamships, and the policy he recommends for the development of increased commercial intercourse with adjacent and neighbouring countries, should receive the careful consideration of Congress.

It is of noteworthy interest that the steady expansion of population, improvement, and governmental institutions over the new and unoccupied portions of our country have scarcely been checked, much less impeded or destroyed, by our great civil war, which at first glance would seem to have absorbed almost the entire energies of the nation. The organisation and admission of the State of Nevada has been completed in conformity with law, and thus our excellent system is firmly established in the mountains which once seemed a barren and inhospitable waste between the Atlantic States and those which have grown up on the coast of the Pacific Ocean.

The Territories of the Union are generally in a condition of prosperity and rapid growth. Idaho and Montana, by reason of their great distances and the interruption of communication with them by Indian hostilities, have been only partially organised; but it is understood that these difficulties are about to disappear, which will permit their Governments, like those of the others, to go into speedy and full operation.

As intimately connected with and promotive of this material growth of the nation, I ask the attention of Congress to the valuable information and important recommendations relating to the public lands, Indian affairs, the Pacific Railroad, and mineral discoveries, contained in the report of the Secretary of the Interior, which is herewith transmitted, and which report also embraces the subjects of patents, pensions, and other topics of public interest pertaining to his department.

The quantity of public lands disposed of during the five quarters ending the 30th of September last was 4,221,342 acres, of which 1,538,614 acres were entered under the Homestead Law. The remainder was located with military land warrants, agricultural scrip certified to States for railroads and sold for cash. The cash received from sales and location fees was $1,019,446. The income from sales during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1864, was $678,007 21c., against $136,077 95c. received during the preceding year. The aggregate number of acres surveyed during the year has been equal to the quantity disposed of, and there is open to settlement about 134,000,000 acres of surveyed land.

The great enterprise of connecting the Atlantic with the Pacific States by railways and telegraph lines has been entered upon with a vigour that gives assurance of success, notwithstanding the embarrassments arising from the prevailing high prices of material and labour. The route of the main line of the road has been definitely located for 100 miles westward from the initial point at Omaha City, Nebraska, and a preliminary location of the Pacific Railroad of California has been made from Sacramento eastward to the great bend of Turkee River in Nevada.

Numerous discoveries of gold, silver, and cinnabar mines have been added to the many heretofore known, and the country occupied by the Sierra Nevada and Rocky Mountains, and the subordinate ranges, now teems with enterprising labour, which is richly remunerative. It is believed that the product of the mines of precious metals in that region has, during the year, reached, if not exceeded, $100,000,000 in value.

It was recommended in my last annual Message that our Indian system be remodelled. Congress, at its last Session, acting upon the recommendation, did provide for reorganising the system in California, and it is believed that under the present organisation the management of the Indians there will be attended with reasonable success. Much yet remains to be done to provide for the proper government of the Indians in other parts of the country, to render it secure for the advancing settler and to provide for the welfare of the Indian. The Secretary reiterates his recommendations, and to them the attention of Congress is invited.

The liberal provisions made by Congress for paying pensions to invalid soldiers and sailors of the Republic, and to the widows, orphans, and dependent mothers of those who have fallen in battle or died of disease contracted or of wounds received in the service of their country, have been diligently administered. There have been added to the pension rolls during the year ending the 30th day of June last the names of 16,770 invalided soldiers, and of 271 disabled seamen, making the present number of army invalid pensioners 22,767, and of navy invalid pensioners 712.

Of widows, orphans, and mothers, 22,198 have been placed on the army pension rolls, and 248 on the navy rolls. The present number of army pensions of this class is 25,435, and of navy pensions 793. At the beginning of the year the number of Revolutionary pensioners was 1,430. Only twelve of them were soldiers, of whom seven have since died. The remainder are those who under the law of ——— receive pensions because of relationship to Revolutionary soldiers. During the year ending June 30, 1864, $4,504,616 92c. have been paid to pensioners of all classes.

I cheerfully commend to your continued patronage the benevolent institutions of the District of Columbia, which have hitherto been established and fostered by Congress, and respectfully refer for information concerning them, and in relation to the Washington aqueduct, the Capitol, and other matters of local interest, to the report of the Secretary.

The Agricultural Department, under the supervision of its present energetic and faithful head, is rapidly commending itself to the great and vital interest it was created to advance. It is peculiarly the people's department, in which they feel more directly concerned than in any other. I commend it to the continued attention and fostering care of Congress.

The war continues. Since the last annual Message all the important lines and positions then occupied by our forces have been maintained, and our armies have steadily advanced, thus liberating the regions left in the rear, so that Missouri, Kentucky, Tennessee, and parts of other States, have again produced reasonably fair crops.

The most remarkable feature in the military operations of the year is General Sherman's attempted march of 300 miles directly through the insurgent region. It tends to show a great increase of our relative strength that our General-in-Chief should feel able to confront and hold in check every active force of the enemy, and yet to detach a well-appointed large army to move on such an expedition. The result not yet being known, conjecture in regard to it is not here indulged.

Important movements have also occurred during the year to the effect of moulding society for durability in the Union. Although short of complete success it is much in the right direction that 12,000 citizens in each of the States of Arkansas and Louisiana have organised loyal State Governments with free constitutions, and are earnestly struggling to maintain and administer them. The movement in the same direction, more extensive, though less definite, in Missouri, Kentucky, and Tennessee, should not be overlooked.

But Maryland presents the example of complete success. Maryland is secure to liberty and union for all the future. The genius of rebellion will no more claim Maryland. Like another foul spirit, being driven out, it may seek to tear her, but it will woo her no more.

At the last Session of Congress a proposed amendment of the Constitution abolishing slavery throughout the United States passed the Senate, but failed for lack of the requisite two-thirds vote in the House of Representatives. Although the present is the same Congress and nearly the same members, and without questioning the wisdom or patriotism of those who stood in opposition, I venture to recommend the reconsideration and passage of the measure at the present Session.

Of course, the abstract question is not changed, but an intervening election shows almost certainly that the next Congress will pass the measure. Thence there is only the question of time as to when the proposed amendment will go to the States for their action, and as it is to so go, at all events, may we not agree that the sooner the better? It is not claimed that the election has imposed a duty in members to change their views or their votes any further than as an additional element to be considered. Their judgment may be affected by it. It is the voice of the people, now for the first time heard upon the question. In a great national crisis like this, unanimity of action among those seeking a common end is very desirable and almost indispensable, and yet no approach to such unanimity is attainable unless some deference shall be paid to the will of the majority simply because it is the will of the majority. In this case the common end is the maintenance of the Union, and among the means to secure that end, such will, through the election, is most clearly declared in favour of such constitutional amendment. The most readable indication of public purpose in this country is derived through our popular elections. Judging by the recent canvass and its results, the purpose of the people within the loyal States to maintain the integrity of the Union was never more strong nor more nearly unanimous than now. The extraordinary calmness and good order with which the millions of voters met and mingled at the polls gave strong assurance of this. Not only those who supported the Union ticket, so called, but a great majority of the opposing party, may be fairly claimed to entertain and to be actuated by the same purpose. It is an unanswerable argument to this effect, that no candidate for any office whatever, high or low, has ventured to seek votes on the avowal that he was for giving up the Union.

There has been much impugning of motives and much heated controversy as to the proper means and best mode of advancing the Union cause. But in the distinct issue of Union or no Union the politicians have shown their instinctive knowledge that there is no diversity among the people.

In affording to the people the fair opportunity of showing one to another, and to the world, this firmness and unanimity of purpose, the election has been of vast value to the national cause.

The election has exhibited another fact not less valuable to be known—the fact that we not approach exhaustion in the most important branch of national resources—that of living men. While it is melancholy to reflect that the war has filled so many graves and caused mourning to so many hearts, it is some relief to know that, compared with the survivors, the fallen have been so few. While corps, and divisions, and brigades, and regiments have formed and fought and dwindled and gone out of existence, a great majority of the men who composed them are still living. The same is true of the naval service. The election returns prove this. So many voters could not else be found.

The States regularly holding elections, both now and four years ago—to wit, California, Connecticut, Delaware, Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Kentucky, Maine, Maryland, Massachusetts, Michigan, New Hampshire, New Jersey, New York, Ohio, Oregon, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, Vermont, West Virginia, and Wisconsin—cast 3,982,017 votes now, against 3,070,222 cast then, showing an aggregate now of 3,982,011, to which is to be added 33,762 cast now in the new States of Kansas and Nevada, which States did not vote in 1860, thus swelling the aggregate to 4,015,773, and the net increase during the three years and a half of war of 145,751. A table is appended showing particulars.

To this should be added the number of all soldiers in the field from Massachusetts, Rhode Island, New Jersey, Delaware, Indiana, Illinois, and California, who, by the laws of these States, could not vote away from their homes, and which number cannot be less than 100,000.

Nor yet is this all. The number in the organised Territories is triple now what it was four years ago, while thousands, white and black, join us as the nation at arms press back the insurgent lines.

So much is shown affirmatively and negatively by the election. It is not material to enquire how the increase has been produced, or to show that it would have been greater but for the war, which is probably true. The important fact remains demonstrated that we have more men now than we had when the war began; that we are not exhausted nor in process of exhaustion; that we are gaining strength, and may, if need be, maintain the contest indefinitely.

This as to men: Material resources are now more complete and abundant than ever. The national resources then are unexhausted, and, as we believe, inexhaustible. The public purpose to reestablish and maintain the national authority is unchanged, and is, we believe, unchangeable. The manner of continuing the effort remains to be chosen.

On careful consideration of all the evidence accessible, it seems to me that no attempt at negotiation with the insurgent leader could result in any good. He would accept nothing short of the severance of the Union—precisely what we cannot and will not give.

His declarations to this effect are explicit and oft repeated. He does not attempt to deceive us. He affords us no excuse to deceive ourselves. He cannot voluntarily reaccept the Union; we cannot voluntarily yield it.

Between him and us the issue is distinct, simple, and inflexible. It is an issue which can only be tried by war, and decided by victory. If we yield, we are beaten; if the Southern people fail him, he is beaten.

Either way it would be the victory and defeat following war. What is true, however, of him who heads] the insurgent cause is not necessarily true of those who follow. Although he cannot reaccept the Union, they can.

Some of them, we know, already desire peace and reunion. The number of such may increase. They can at any moment have peace simply by laying down their arms and submitting to the national authority under the Constitution.

After so much the Government cannot, if it would, maintain war against them. The loyal people would not sustain or allow it. If questions should remain, we would adjust them by the peaceful means of legislation, conference, courts, and votes, operating only in constitutional and lawful channels. Some certain and other possible questions are and would be beyond the Executive power to adjust; as, for instance, the admission of members into Congress, and whatever might require the appropriation of money. The Executive power itself would be greatly diminished by the cessation of actual war. Pardons and remissions of forfeiture, however, would still be within Executive control. In what spirit and temper this control would be exercised can be fairly judged of by the past.

A year ago a general pardon and amnesty, upon specified terms, were offered to all except certain designated classes, and it was, at the same time, made known that the excepted classes were still within the contemplation of special clemency. During the year many availed themselves of the general provision, and many more would, only that the signs of bad faith in some led to such precautionary measures as rendered the practical process less easy and certain.

During the same time, also, special pardons have been granted to individuals of the excepted class, and no voluntary application has been denied; thus practically the door has been, for a full year, open to all except such as were not in condition to make a free choice—that is, such as were in custody or under constraint.

It is still open to all, but the time may come, probably will come, when public duty shall demand that it be closed, and that it be more rigorous than heretofore.

In presenting the abandonment of arms to the national authority on the part of the insurgents as the only indispensable condition to ending the war on the part of Government, I retract nothing heretofore said. As to slavery, I repeat the declaration made a year ago, and that while I remain in my present position I shall not attempt to retract or modify the Emancipation Proclamation, nor shall I return to slavery any person who is free by the terms of that proclamation or by any of the Acts of Congress.

If the people should, by whatever mode or means, make it an Executive duty to reenslave such persons, another, not I, must be their instrument to propose it.

In stating a single condition of peace, I mean simply to say that the war will cease on the part of the Government whenever it shall have ceased on the part of those who began it.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

CHARLES SUMNER AND SMITH OF OXFORD.

THE following is from the Philadelphia Age:—

There has been for some months past, floating about in this country, an Englishman named 'Goldwin Smith,' titular or actual professor of something at Oxford. He has always seemed to us a myth, we never, to our recollection, having heard of him till, in the flesh, he came among us. This may be very gross ignorance, but such is the fact. 'Smith' is not an impressive name, yet there have been clever, illustrious, and notorious 'Smiths.' We have all heard of 'Adam Smith' and 'Sydney Smith,' and 'Bobus Smith,' and 'Madeline Smith.' We have read of a 'Professor Smyth,' but he was of Cambridge, and his name was William. But 'Goldwin of Oxford' had escaped us. We have a moderate acquaintance, not as intimate as some of our contemporaries, but still well enough as far as it goes, with the names of Froude, and Keble, and Newman, and Hawkins, and Whately, and Denison, but 'Smith of Oxford' never crossed our visual ray till its owner came out to this country, consigned to the Leagues, and determined, with their assistance, to set everything to rights. Poor man! he must have had a hard time of it. Assuming him to be a gentleman, a scholar, and an orthodox man in the ordinary sense of the word, he has been condemned to see American literature only as developed in infidel New England, and blossoming in such garish flowers as adorn the pages of the Atlantic Monthly—he has seen the American Church turned into a huge spouting lecture-room, of which, however, we presume he don't complain, having played a part there himself. And when he has come here—to Philadelphia, we mean—his doom has been sadder still. He knows Philadelphia intelligence and education only as represented at such brilliant centres as the Union League or Brandy Station, within whose walls—we mean them both—there is not scholarship enough to get a youth half through Rugby or Harrow. If 'Mr. Professor Smith' were, in despair, to turn suddenly upon the Union League, and subject its members, big and little, to an examination on any elementary points of common scholarship, of history, ancient or modern, or even of American history, as to which they make such a pother, we wager that four-fifths of them would miss every question. Eight out of ten don't know the difference between a Jacobite and a Jacobin. Wearied with this dull existence, Mr. Smith has, it seems, at last revolted, and, making Mr. Sumner's Florida disquisition a reason or an excuse, has gone into print and published what we are most happy to describe as a gentlemanly and very sharp reply. His English spirit could stand this 'loyal' impertinence no longer; and after disposing in few but vigorous words of Mr. Sumner's sophistry, he thus concludes a reference to his authorities:—

'Suppose England to be as bad as you will—to be as base as your fathers thought her glorious—it is not in the presence of England alone that you stand in deciding between honour and dishonour. It is in the presence of the whole community of nations; and those who, instead of recalling to your minds at this most critical moment of your moral life the high principles of civilised morality and the brighter examples of your own history, divert your eyes to the bad precedents of evil times, conspire, however unintentionally, with that one of the two contending voices in the national breast which tempts you to take the downward path. There is a certain class of questions which when an honourable man is called upon to decide in his own case, he puts all equivocal precedents and everything else behind him but the thought of his own honour.'

This is very well put by Mr. Smith; and we do not at all wonder the Press and North American published his letter without comment, and the Bulletin not at all. But he might have put the scalpel in a little deeper. Of all men in America, Charles Sumner is the last who should assail England or Englishmen. Mrs. Stowe might do it more gracefully. In former days, he was, socially, the most persevering toady that ever cringed to Englishmen. If any one, especially if he were a man of rank, came to this country, his first volunteer visitor was Mr. Charles Sumner. Poor Lord Ashburton had no peace of his life till Mr. Webster stepped in to save him. Lord Morpeth had the same fate, but, being an Abolitionist, bore it meekly. Mr. Sumner went abroad as a young man, and having, with Judge Story's assistance, annotated certain Chancery reports, and being the Judge's pet, was accredited by his patron—the most enormous letter (of introduction) writer this country his produced. He basked gratefully in the sunshine of the English bench and bar, and returned to this country to scribble puffs of them. He was Anglior Anglis. But it was not until a later period that Mr. Sumner touched the lowest depths of lackeydom. When the senatorial outrage was committed, and Mr. Brooks cruelly cudgelled or whipped him at his desk, Mr. Sumner felt that the time had come when, as an anti-slavery martyr, and with such a viaticum, he could travel directly into the communion of the highest English aristocracy; and he at once packed up his bloody shirt in his portmanteau, and set out on a pilgrimage of pity. And he was welcomed most kindly; the natural hospitality (who that has enjoyed it will ever disparage it?) of English men and women was stimulated by sympathy with his personal grievances, and not less with his political opinions. Could the Duchess of Argyll withhold her tears when Mr. Sumner spread his bloody garment on her drawing-room table, and pointed out to her and the mother (Mrs. Stowe's friend) the exact spot where the brutal slave-owner hit him hardest? Could Exeter Hall, or Lambeth, or Richmond House, or Cuddesdon, do less than open their doors very widely to the lacerated victim of slavery? To do Abolition England, or even England herself, justice, she did welcome the suffering stranger; and from that day till this war broke out, nay, until long after this war began, Mr. Sumner was a pet. No American tasted hospitality in London without having it marred by enquiries after 'our dear friend Mr. Sumner.' If his own portfolio or copybook could be searched, more letters to 'my dear Duke,' 'or 'my dear Marquis,' or 'my dear Lord' This or That, or to 'my dear Mr. Sumner,' would be found than ever American wrote or had before. In short, England treated him with affection. So much the worse, it seems, for England; for now who stands more prominent among her revilers—and this Mr. Goldwin Smith has at last discovered—than Mr. Charles Sumner? He is 'Princeps' of the anti-Anglicans. If Mr. Seward, restrained by the responsibilities of office, bullies mildly, Mr. Sumner goes ahead of him. If there is any chance of the Administration doing a politic, or decorous, or amicable thing towards Great Britain or any European Power, in jumps Mr. Sumner, and threatens, and scolds, and 'commonplaces.' Nor does he mind disaster or rebuff. He rallies under any catastrophe, physical or mental. 'Senator Sumner,' says Mr. Russell in his diary, 'his face lighted with pleasure, came to tell me the good news. M'Dowell has carried Bull Run without firing a shot. Seven regiments attacked it at the point of the bayonet, and the enemy immediately fled.' This was more than three years ago, and he has been at it ever since. When the Trent was seized he thought it a mere trifle, and told the same Mr. Russell, with the solemn emptiness with which he now talks, that it 'could only be a matter of mediation, and not for any peremptory demand, as the law of nations has no exact precedent to bear upon the case, and there are many instances in which Sir William Scott's decisions appear to justify Captain Wilkes.'

But we have said enough on this medley. Of all American shams, Yankee shams are the hugest; and of all Yankee shams (this Mr. Goldwin Smith seems at last to have found out) Mr. Charles Sumner is the chief. The question of the restitution of the Florida has been settled by a shorter process than 'the bad precedents of evil times' suggest. It is a purely Cis-Atlantic operation. Mr. Sumner had better turn his attention to the matter of compensation. For ourselves, we do not believe the Administration caused the sinking of the Florida, for the simple reason that it makes the entanglement much more difficult of solution, though we admit it has an ugly look. When the nobles picked up Prince Arthur dead in the moat of Northampton Castle, one does not wonder they thought it 'the graceless action of a heavy hand,' and distrusted the tears of him who was the keeper and should have been the guardian; for, says the poet,

> Villany is not without such rheum':
> And he, long traded in it, makes it seem > Like rivers of remorse and innocency.

A SEVERE CROSS-EXAMINATION.

THE following is an extract from a letter published in the Liverpool Mercury, and emanating from a writer who styles himself a 'coreligionist of Mr. Bright, and not one of the upper classes:'—

To the Editors of the Liverpool Mercury.

Gentlemen,—Will you allow me the privilege of asking, through the medium of your columns, a few questions relative to the war now being waged on the territory of the once United States of North America—questions which, though they may have been put before, I have never seen answered to my satisfaction?

The first question I shall put is, 'For what purpose is the war being carried on?' And the reason why I put it is because Mr. Lincoln to the Mayor of Baltimore (soon after his having asked leave of the latter for the first batch of troops to pass through Baltimore for the protection of Washington early in 1861) expressed himself thus:—'I declare that I have no purpose, directly or indirectly, to interfere with the institution of slavery in the States where it exists. I believe I have no lawful right to do so, and I have no inclination to do so. . . . . The right of each State to order and control its own domestic institutions according to its own judgment exclusively, is essential to the balance of power on which the perfection and endurance of our political fabric depended.'

Because Mr. Lincoln about the same time, in a conversation with Mr. Mallory, expressed himself thus:—'Mr. Mallory, this war, so far as I have anything to do with it, is carried on on the idea that there is a Union sentiment in those States which, set free from the control now held over it by the presence of the Confederate or rebel power, will be sufficient to replace those States in the Union. If I am mistaken in this, if there is no such sentiment there, if the people of those States are determined with unanimity, or with a feeling approaching unanimity, that their States shall not be members of this Confederacy, it is beyond the power of the people of the other States to force them to remain in the Union; and,' said he, 'in that contingency—in the contingency that there is not that sentiment there—this war is not only an error; it is a crime.'

Because Mr. Seward, in his late speech at Auburn, says: 'Only two courses are open before us; the one is perseverance in our war to suppress the rebellion, the other is the abandonment of these efforts.' 'The Government must suppress rebellion with all the agencies of civil and military power.' 'What remains for me to say is to warn you against misrepresentations of the issue. There is no question before you of abandoning the war measures against slavery, and substituting for them a policy of conservation or concession to slavery. Those measures are a part of the war.' 'Are you prepared to give up the conflict? You say, "No, never." Why? Because in that case you give up the national life.'

And because Mr. Cobden, in his late speech at Rochdale, says: 'They have decided, after years of war, and after almost every household has lost a relative or an inmate, the contest that arose between General M'Clellan, who desires to put down the war without making the abolition of slavery a condition, and Mr. Lincoln, who desires to put down the war and extirpate slavery from the South. Notwithstanding that that was the appeal made to the whole people, they have preferred acting in the interests of humanity, for that can no longer be questioned; they have preferred the continuance of war rather than the continuance of degrading slavery. Let us have no more of the late talk that this is not a war to put down slavery. Everybody now admits that, whatever is the issue of the struggle, slavery will be abolished. I have said that it would be far easier for Essex and Kent to carry off the mouth of the Thames, and set up an East Anglian kingdom, than for Louisiana to carry off the mouths of the Mississippi and set up for an independent State. There are some few hundreds of thousands in the counties of Kent and Essex, but the Valley of the Mississippi will become the home of 200,000,000, and this makes it infinitely more impossible that the United States should allow the mouths of the Mississippi to be carried off than that England should suffer the mouth of the Thames to be taken away. Why should they do so, when they can so easily, by the smallest expense, retain possession of it? for a few gunboats could easily blockade the outlets of that river.

We see from the above utterances that Mr. Lincoln declared he had no intention and believed he had no right to interfere with slavery, and stated to Mr. Mallory that the only object of the war, so far as he was himself concerned, was to set free a 'Union sentiment' supposed to exist in the rebel States; adding, that in the contingency of there being no such 'Union sentiment,' the war would be not only an error, but a crime; that Mr. Seward says the war is for the suppression of the rebellion, refers to slavery and to the 'national life;' that Mr. Cobden desires 'no more of the late talk that this is not a war to put down slavery,' and also speaks of the mouth of the Mississippi. Can any one, therefore, explain the purpose for which the war is being carried on by the North—whether for the extinction of slavery, for the setting free of a 'Union sentiment' in the rebel States, for the suppression of the rebellion, for the preservation of the national life, the retention of the mouth of the Mississippi, or what? I am puzzled among so many authorities to know the real object for which it is being carried on; and, to make the difficulty of comprehending it still greater, General Butler the other day in New York added a sort of Russo-Caucasian element to it when he recommended that if the Southerners did not give in on his proposed amnesty before the 8th January next, they should be driven out of the country immediately, and their property divided among the victorious Northern soldiery. This, therefore, may be his view of the objects of the war from this time forward.

The next question I would ask is: Why is the war being carried on by the North at all? Seeing it is set forth in the Declaration of Independence 'that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness; that to secure these rights, governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed; that whenever any form of government becomes destructive of these, it is the right of the people to alter or to abolish it, and to institute a new government, laying its foundations on such principles, and organising its powers in such form, as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness,' &c., &c., and bearing in mind that at the time this manifesto was issued slavery was an institution of the country.

Seeing that Mr. Lincoln—at the time (I believe) when the Hungarian insurrection was under discussion in 1848—said from his place in Congress that 'any people, anywhere, being inclined and having the power, have the right to rise up and shake off their existing Government and form a new one that suits them better.' He even went further than this, and added that 'any portion of such people that can may revolutionise, and make their own of so much of the territory as they inhabit.'

Seeing that Mr. Seward declared about the same time, in a lecture he delivered at Baltimore, 'That if ever the North and the South separated, they would give the world a noble example of the benefits of a republican form of government by agreeing to separate peaceably and without bloodshed.'

Seeing that Horace Greeley in 1860, quoting and approving the memorable words of Mr. Jefferson in the Declaration of Independence, that government derived its just powers from the consent of the governed, contended that if this doctrine, in which he heartily concurred, 'justified the secession from the British Crown of 3,000,000 of colonists in 1776,' it would also 'justify the secession of 5,000,000 of Southerners from the Federal Union in 1861.'

And that Mr. Lincoln said in 1861: 'Suppose you go to war, you cannot fight always; and when, after much loss on both sides, and no gain on either, you cease fighting, the identical questions as to terms of intercourse are upon you.'

Now, in the face of all these weighty sayings, can any one answer my question—Why is the war being carried on by the North at all? Mr. Lincoln says it (the North) has no right to fight for the putting down of slavery. The 'Declaration' and Mr. Lincoln agree in saying that the South has a right to rebel and set up for itself. Mr. Seward foreshadows the noble example the North would give the world in separating peaceably, if ever separation was desired. Horace Greeley asserted that the South had as good a right to secede from the North in 1861 as the colonies had to secede from Great Britain in 1776. And yet this is the man to whom my coreligionist, Mr. Bright, writes a letter such as we have all seen or heard of, wherein, if he does not encourage the prosecution of the war in words, he counsels the keeping in office those who are carrying it on.

A CONTRAST.—A gentleman who was in the train from this city to Petersburg, a very cold morning not long ago, tells us his attention was attracted by the efforts of a young soldier with his arm in a sling to get his overcoat on. His teeth as well as his sound hand were brought into use to effect the object; but, in the midst of his efforts, an officer rose from his seat, advanced to him, and very carefully and tenderly assisted him, drawing the coat gently over his wounded arm and buttoning it up comfortably; then, with a few kind and pleasant words, returning to his seat. Now, the officer in question was not clad in gorgeous uniform, with a brilliant wreath upon the collar and a multitude of gilt lines upon the sleeves, resembling the famous labyrinth of Crete, but he was clad in 'a simple suit of grey,' distinguished from the garb of a civilian only by the three stars which every Confederate colonel in the service, by the regulations, is entitled to wear. And yet he was no other than our chief general, Robert E. Lee, who is not braver and greater than he is good and modest. On General Grant's recent return from New Jersey to the Army of the Potomac and James, by the detention of the train he was forced to stop in Philadelphia. Being recognised by a soldier, he was so crowded by the gaping multitude—ever ready in Northern latitudes to lionise every military hero of the hour, be he M'Clellan, Hooker, Burnside, Pope, or Grant—that he was forced to take refuge in the Mayor's office. Well, General Lee comes to Richmond, visits the War Department and the President, attends divine worship at St. Paul's almost every week, and, though our people love him as our fathers did George Washington, yet he is never subjected to any annoyance, save a look from each passer-by, which silently says: May God protect and bless you!—Richmond Whig.

FEDERAL BARBARITY.—The Federal journals record from day to day, with unhesitating cheerfulness and implicit approval, that every town and village which is traversed by Sherman is burnt behind him. It is not suggested that any military advantage is gained by the process of devastation; and even if Sherman is provided with an excuse for acts of destruction, his admirers at home fail even to perceive the need of an apology. Curious moralists would willingly test the limits of Northern toleration for warlike excesses. If it were reported that Sherman or any other favourite leader had crucified the inhabitants of a Confederate town, the Republican papers of New York would probably abstain from a hint of censure, and the Federal organ in London, which hastened to defend the seizure of the Florida at the risk of being disavowed by its patrons at Washington, would immediately attempt to prove that some English officer in former times had been guilty of more culpable cruelty. It must be admitted that the Federal Government has not yet risen to the height of Mr. Cobden's warlike fervour by cutting the dykes of the Mississippi and deluging Louisiana. If any general or admiral in command at New Orleans were to discover, like Admiral Porter, that his father had been harshly treated fifty or sixty years ago, he might perhaps adopt Mr. Cobden's suggestion in the hope of provoking English censure, and in the well-founded confidence that English partisans would be found to excuse him.—Saturday Review.

PROSPECTS OF THE FEDERAL TREASURY.

(From the New York Daily News, December 6.)

THE Congress is now about to meet, and the first and most important matter that will engage its attention is doubtless the finances. These require earnest and prompt attention, not as a mere means of raising money, but to preserve from ruin the credit of the Government and, with it, the safety of the people. The paper system has been pushed to an extent that makes return impossible; the current is moving to ruin with an hourly accelerated pace, and will soon fall into the abyss of bankruptcy. The attempts of the Treasury to cause a fictitious fall of gold, in order that the public may be misled by the indicator, are like those of an insane engineer who should smash his steam gauge because it indicates approaching explosion. The fearful and irresistible power is nevertheless at work, and expansive force gives momentary token of acquired strength.

The expenses of the Government for the past year have been as follows, per official returns:—

Increase of debt	$750,000,000
Customs (in gold $99,181,221) in currency	150,000,000
Internal revenue	100,000,000
Total	$1,000,000,000
Add arrears unpaid	200,000,000
Total (per day $3,300,000)	$1,200,000,000

This is about $4,000,000 each secular day. The customs were by law, when in excess of the interest, applied to a sinking fund, but they have, in defiance of all laws, been used for general expenses. The internal revenue gave, in 1863, $37,000,000; in 1864, in round numbers, $100,000,000, and the increased taxes will give this year, it is estimated, $175,000,000. The customs, however, will not give more than $50,000,000. Now, owing to the rise in prices, the expenses of the year 1865 will be 20 per cent. more than those for 1864, and will reach $1,500,000,000, which must be met by borrowing. This will be plain, if we analyse the only two sources of revenue, viz. the customs and the internal revenue. The customs gave last year, in round numbers, $100,000,000; of this, $40,000,000 were paid for interest, and the remainder, as we have said, in violation of law, was expended for general purposes. The value of $60,000,000 expended in currency was $90,000,000. Thus, there was a sum of $190,000,000 derived from customs and internal revenue. This year the gold interest has risen to $60,000,000, and the customs have declined to $50,000,000. To make good that $10,000,000, even if no more gold interest stock is issued, will require $25,000,000 of currency, to be paid out of the internal revenue, which will reduce it to $150,000,000 in currency, which is now worth but $66,000,000 in gold, whereas the $100,000,000 collected last year was worth $71,000,000. In short, the increased tax bill has not given so much money as the old one by $5,000,000. The taxes will be comparatively as follows, for general purposes:—

Internal taxes	$100,000,000	$175,000,000
Customs, surplus	90,000,000	deficit, 25,000,000
Total	$190,000,000	$150,000,000
Specie value	130,000,000	68,000,000

This is the result after paying interest on the public debt. Now if the expenditures are the same as last year, the amount to be borrowed will be 1864.	1865.

Taxes	$190,000,000	$150,000,000
Loans	750,000,000	790,000,000
Total	$940,000,000	$940,000,000

It will be observed that, in consequence of the depreciation of the currency, prices rise so as to swell the expenses of the Government by a sum greater than the increase of the taxes.

This great cause of financial ruin has now just begun to work. The poison infused into the system by Mr. Chase is now just developing its fatal effects. The National Banking system that he created for personal political purposes has now won the mastery over the old specie paying system, and the whole is being swept down the paper torrent like an avalanche. The national law exonerates the banks from paying specie for their notes, from local taxation, and from all those local restraints which an experience of sixty years showed to be necessary to the public safety. The new banks have the right to issue $300,000,000 of circulating notes, redeemable only in legal tender, of which $600,000,000 are outstanding. Their notes are a legal tender for all dues to and from the Government, except customs and interest. There is, therefore, no call for redemption, since they are not required to pay gold. They deposit their capitals in stock with the Controller, and get six per cent. per annum interest in gold, or fifteen per cent. in paper, and ninety per cent. in circulation, which they lend at seven to ten per cent. per annum. The exemption from local taxation is worth three per cent. more. The use of the Government money paid in by the local tax-gatherers is worth two per cent. more. Thus a National bank may, as compared with a local bank, make 30 per cent. per annum, while a State bank, labouring under the disabilities, must earn 20 per cent. per annum to pay 8 per cent. dividends. It costs them 12 per cent. in taxes and expenses before they can pay any dividend.

The late election took away all hope of any repeal or modification of the national law, and there remains no alternative but for the whole to cut loose from specie payments, and drift on the paper flood. The banks of Philadelphia (capital $16,000,000), and those of Boston ($38,000,000), have already determined to embrace the new system. In New York, three banks (capital $13,000,000) have gone into it, and although the old conservative institutions hang back, they must go or wind up. The most stable foundations will be swept away in the torrent. The aggregate capital of the three cities is $125,000,000. The law requires at least one-third of this to be deposited with the Controller, in United States bonds. The banks, however, hold already $130,000,000 of United States securities, consequently they will not have to change investments; but by simply lodging those bonds with the Controller, they will get $112,500,000 of notes to circulate, independent of State laws, and not to be redeemed in specie. The results will be as follows:—

	Capital.	Circulation.
As State banks	$125,000,000	$13,000,000
As National banks	125,000,000	112,500,000

Thus they will circulate $100,000,000 more than they do now. In all parts of the country the same movement is progressing, and the whole $300,000,000 authorised will probably be taken up by the spring. With this interest operating upon Congress their limit will be removed, and any amount of paper will be issued. As a Treasury National banker remarked, 'the people will have as much currency as they demand.'

Now, it is to be observed that these issues of paper will have the direct effect of raising prices of all commodities, and, consequently, of the Government expenses, while the issues of the banks will not aid the Government a dollar. These bank movements will cost the Government 200,000,000 per annum, or more than the whole tax revenue. At the same time the Government will pay the banks 18,000,000 per annum in gold for making the issues!

In the midst of this movement the Treasury, to carry on the war, must borrow $800,000,000. How? will it borrow by issuing more paper, or by issuing more gold stock? If the former, the depreciation will become ruinous; if the latter, how is the interest to be paid? Oh, but, it is said in some quarters, 'the taxes will be increased.' We have already seen the increased taxes will no longer swell the revenue. The duties were doubled in May and June, and the receipts are one-third less than before. The internal revenues give nominally more, but really much less. The trade of the country is now rapidly declining, and therefore the taxes are less. The income-tax will give give far less than last year. This is a well-known process. Où il n'y a rien le roi perd ses droits.

The paper issued by the Treasury would have brought ruin sufficiently early, but the National banks were invited to share the plunder, and they devour like the locusts. As the trade of the country declines, all money transactions resolve themselves into heavy operations. Nearly all the loans of these banks are made to the Government directly or indirectly. The city banks will have one hundred millions of dollars more circulation to lend; to whom? the Government; on what? its bonds, which can again be placed with the Controller for more notes to circulate. This may be carried to any limit. Thus, suppose the whole National bank currency—three hundred millions of dollars—was loaned five times to the Government, the result will be as follows:—

	Six per cent. Gold Stock.	Currency Issued for it.
First Loan	$300,000,000	$270,000,000
Second Loan	270,000,000	243,000,000
Third Loan	243,000,000	218,700,000
Fourth Loan	218,700,000	196,200,000
Fifth Loan	196,200,000	176,580,000
Total	$1,227,900,000	$1,104,480,000

The banks would then hold $1,227,900,000 of stock, for which they would draw $73,674,000 in gold interest per annum, while they had exacted a forced loan of $1,104,480,000 from the people on bank notes. If it were possible to push currency to this extent, the paper would be worth perhaps two cents per dollar, and a pound of sugar be worth $18,000, and the present month's pay of a soldier be represented by $1,350,000. It will explode long before that point is reached.

A SLIGHT REBUFF.

THE following letter has been published by the Daily Telegraph. The writer, the Rev. George Gilfillan, is well known as an ardent Abolitionist, and his works, which possess acknowledged merit, have met on more than one occasion with the warm approbation of the Emancipation Society:—

Dundee, Dec. 13, 1864.

Dear Sir,—I have your printed circular requesting me to be one of a deputation to present, next Thursday, Mr. Adams, the American Minister, with a congratulatory address on the occasion of Mr. Lincoln's reelection to the Presidency of the United States. It is impossible for me to be present, but I deem it right to say that, even though I could have been there, I would not have been a party to any such measure. I look upon the reelection of Mr. Lincoln as a heavy blow and great discouragement to the real interests of America—as a pledge for the continuance, with increased ferocity, of a wretched and hitherto useless contest, which has already appalled the civilised world, and sown curses and calamities broadcast in the fairest countries of the earth—as a renewed proclamation of war to the knife with a people who, though deeply guilty in the matter of slavery, and in other respects besides, have covered their multitude of sins by a courage, a constancy, a self-denial, a unity, and a generosity of conduct which have seldom been paralleled in the history of nations—of a war, too, which has notoriously been carried on by the North under false pretences, and which, though gilded over with fine and even sacred names, is in reality a contest for supremacy, for ambition, and for commercial purposes, and has been fought principally by mercenary hands, and in forms of savage ferocity at which humanity blushes for shame. I feel my hatred of slavery as strong as ever, and my hope of its speedy abolition more sanguine than at any former period; but I have no sympathy with Mr. Lincoln's policy, and I hear no music in the clash of that bloody gauntlet he has thrown down with such violence on the floor of the West.

I am yours, &c.,
GEORGE GILFILLAN.

T. W. Chesson, Esq., Hon. Secretary to the Emancipation Society.

TWO RECRUITS.—Our readers will remember the letter of President Lincoln to Mrs. Bixby, condoling with her on the loss of her five sons in this war. He speaks of 'the solemn pride that must be hers, at having laid so costly a sacrifice upon the altar of freedom.' This kind of sympathy is cheap, and easily manufactured; and when one reflects that the man who is thus ostentatiously shedding his tears over the remains of Mrs. Bixby's five sons has two sons who are old enough to be laid upon 'the altar,' but whom he keeps at home in luxury, we can easily understand the hypocrisy of all this sympathy for the poor bereaved widow. Why is it, we ask, that Mr. Lincoln's sons should be kept from the dangers of the field, while the sons of the labouring man are to be hurried into the harvest of death at the front? Are the sons of the rail-splitter porcelain, and these others only common clay? Or is it that Mr. Robert Lincoln, the young gentleman whose face is so familiar at watering-places, and billiard-rooms in the metropolis, has taken his younger brother into the speculation of cultivating cotton on Island No. 10, through the agency of slave labour, and they can't be spared from their business?—Philadelphia Age.

TO OUR FRIENDS AND SUBSCRIBERS.

THE INDEX was established in May 1862, in the darkest hour of Confederate fortunes, by earnest friends of Southern Independence, with the distinctly expressed object of being the representative, in English journalism, of a gallant and struggling people appealing to the world not only for political, but still more for moral recognition. Since accepting this great trust, THE INDEX has unceasingly laboured, by the combined aid of English and of Southern writers, to enlarge and extend the common ground upon which two nations may cordially meet, which need only to understand each other in order to cherish the warmest mutual appreciation and lasting friendship. The chief and almost the sole difficulty has been, and is still, the callous indifference of the British Government on the one hand, and, on the other, the perplexity, to the European mind, of the unsolved and unprecedented problems involved in the management and education of four millions of the African race, intermingled with a population of the highest Caucasian type. This difficulty could be met only by a liberal fairness to every shade of honest opinion, by an inflexible adherence to truth under all circumstances, and by a bold avowal of convictions, even though ill received. THE INDEX does not claim to be neutral, but it claims to be independent in the highest sense of that word. It is because it must reflect and appeal to, at one and the same time, the public opinion of two countries as yet only imperfectly acquainted, that this somewhat unusual self-description is called for.

Thanks to arrangements now in successful operation, by which the Letters of regular Correspondents and Newspapers from all parts of the Confederate States are received within from twenty-five to thirty days from their date, THE INDEX is always enabled to present the very Latest Direct News from the South, as well as a faithful reflex of the tone and spirit of the Southern Press.

All communications intended for publication should invariably be addressed to 'the Editor of THE INDEX, 291 Strand, W.C.,' and unless authenticated by a responsible name, can receive no attention.

Advertisements should be sent and Money Orders made payable to J. B. HOPKINS, INDEX Office.

THE INDEX.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 22, 1864.

The War.

EVERY mail from America confirms more fully the view taken from the first in these columns, that SHERMAN's expedition through Georgia was to be regarded as a retreat. We have now news from Georgia down to the 2nd inst. At that date SHERMAN had been twenty days on the march, and had reached Millen, a station on the Georgia Central Railway. He had avoided every fortified town, and had confined his offensive efforts to the destruction of one or two undefended towns, and of the railroad along which he passed. A portion of his troops had made a dash upon Macon, and were repulsed; another body had felt their way towards Augusta, and found the road unsafe; so the two columns effected a junction some five miles north-west of Millen, and then SHERMAN seems to have rested a day or two for concentration and reorganisation, with the ultimate design of forcing his way to the coast. Millen is a station on the railroad from Augusta and Macon to Savannah. It is situated in an utterly desolate pine region, and everybody who knows anything of that district of Georgia laughs at the idea of SHERMAN choosing that spot for the collection of supplies. The simple truth is that the Federal general has chosen the line of country pursued by the railways as offering the greatest facilities for rapid progress, and that Millen is the point where HOWARD'S and SLOCUM'S columns would, in the natural course of things, make a junction. The question is at what point he will strike after leaving Millen, and at present the weight of evidence directs us to Savannah. This is his nearest point, being just seventy-nine miles distant along the line of railway. On the 3rd inst. he is reported to have advanced some miles south of Millen, so that his intention would seem to be to strike at Savannah, or some town still further to the south, perhaps Darien, at the mouth of the Athamaha River. On the other hand, the Federal General FOSTER had endeavoured to push inland from Hilton Head, and had marched as far as Grahamsville, South Carolina, in close proximity to the Charleston and Savannah Railway. His object may have been merely to occupy the attention of the Charleston garrison, or to cut the line between that town and Savannah; but in this respect he appears to have failed, for his forces were met and badly defeated before they reached the railroad. Nor is there any confirmation of the rumour that he had destroyed the railway bridge at Pocotaligo. Moreover, it was announced a week ago that a detachment of SHERMAN'S cavalry, sent out to open communication with Beaufort, had been driven back with serious loss; and the subsequent defeat of KILPATRICK at Waynesboro' seems to settle the question of an advance towards Port Royal. We may fairly assume, then, that SHERMAN means to make for the coast far below Charleston, and it seems to us that he is likely to choose the most direct and easiest route, that which will bring him out in the vicinity of Savannah. But if he marches along the Savannah River he will have not only to fight a battle, but to assault a fortified town on his way, and it remains to be seen whether his army, weakened as it must have been by straggling, by sickness and exposure, and by hard fighting, will be in a position to capture, by a coup de main, works defended by at least 20,000 Southern soldiers, one-half of whom we may fairly set down as veterans. Yet on the success of a sudden assault SHERMAN'S safety depends. If he attempts a siege, he is lost.

The Federals point with an air of doubtful confidence to the fact that as yet SHERMAN'S army has encountered no great army in the field as an earnest of his future success. But a very little consideration will suffice to show that it would have been little short of madness on the part of the Confederate generals to risk everything on a great battle. No one pretends that 50,000 veterans could be spared to defend Georgia; and to oppose some 10,000 veterans and 30,000 militia to SHERMAN'S united columns, would have been to play into the Federal commander's hands. But it was impossible, for the first twenty days of SHERMAN'S march, to say where he would strike a blow. He threatened Macon and Augusta, Mobile and Charleston. These were important points in the armour of the Confederacy. The first object was to secure them, and they were secured. SHERMAN was beaten back from Macon, frightened from Augusta, and compelled to direct his march through unfortified towns. By the end of the month, however, it must have become evident that SHERMAN aimed at the sea, that Augusta and Macon were safe. We may take it for granted that the garrison of Macon was mobilised, and that the forces at Augusta were held ready to be despatched at a moment's notice to Savannah. The real effort of the Confederates was yet to come, in fact; and there is very little doubt that SHERMAN has yet to fight a great battle before he reaches the coast. Now we have no good data for determining the numbers of the forces the Confederate generals can bring into the field, but they are not inconsiderable. The State militia of Georgia, South Carolina, Florida, and Alabama can scarcely be estimated at less than 40,000 men. We know that BRAGG has moved southward with a regular force; that HAMPTON, one of the very best cavalry commanders in the South, is in the field; that WHEELER commands a cavalry corps which has two or three times beaten KILPATRICK'S command; that JOHNSTON, and HARDEE, and BEAUREGARD, and TAYLOR are busy organising the defence of the approaches to the coast. SHERMAN'S force is said to be the pick of the South-western Federal army, no doubt a splendid material. But a march of 300 miles through a hostile country must have told terribly on its morale. It must have suffered in effectiveness and in numbers. It is short of provisions. Its transport can only be carried on by heavy toil, utterly unsuited to an army whose safety depends on rapid marches and brisk movements. The Confederates have every road, have had time to choose the best spots for defence, and to determine the most efficacious methods of retarding SHERMAN'S advance. Can it be doubted that if on the day of battle the hostile armies meet in anything like equal numbers, almost every condition of success will be in favour of the Confederate soldiers? Whatever may be the ultimate result, this is certain, that the most arduous part of SHERMAN'S programme commenced when he left Millen. Up to that point he had marched through a rich country. From Millen to Savannah his course lay through pine forest and swamp, where neither forage nor food was to be had, and where the exertions of a few hundred negroes, backed by 2,000 or 3,000 veterans, might delay him for days. The next mail ought to enable us to form a tolerably accurate opinion as to the chances of SHERMAN'S escape. That his expedition has proved a blunder and a failure there can be no doubt even at the present moment.

In the meantime HOOD is marching northward as if no such general as SHERMAN were in existence. He has all but invested Nashville; his batteries command the river by which supplies reach the Federal garrison; his troops have cut the railroads from Nashville southward; Murfreesborough and Chattanooga are isolated, and the whole of the State of Tennessee south of Nashville is in the hands of the Confederates. Decatur and Huntsville, which cost the Federals thousands of lives and millions of dollars, are once more Confederate towns. Pulaski, Columbia, and Franklin fly the Confederate flag. FORREST, with his fine cavalry, is reported to be pushing into Kentucky, while THOMAS is beleaguered at Nashville, and BURBRIDGE is compelled to march the Federal forces out of the State in order to hold Cumberland Gap and save Knoxville. SHERMAN'S advance, then, has already had this undesirable result—it has given back to the Confederates two-thirds of the State of Tennessee, and the Federal General must obtain some success far more brilliant than any he has yet achieved to counterbalance the loss of the whole of Northern Alabama and the humiliating spectacle of the army of invasion driven day after day by a Confederate force, and finally shut up in Nashville. It is not improbable that at this critical juncture GRANT may make another attempt at a diversion. The last news indicates a repetition of his old and somewhat stale manœuvre, an attack of the two extremities of LEE'S lines, north of the James River and at Stony Creek. Possibly the Dutch Gap Canal may also be brought into requisition. We can only say that the oftener and the more pertinaciously he attacks, the better it will be for the Confederacy.

Mr. Adams and the Emancipation Society.

IF indignation were not sufficiently strong to overcome laughter, the temptation would be great to treat the action of the Emancipation Society as a capital joke. Instances are on record in which a man invested with absolute authority—a party in the moment of triumphant supremacy—even a sect, armed rather with bluster than with real influence—has ventured to speak in the name of a nation. But perhaps the height of audacity was reached when some individuals, representing neither autocratic power, nor party, nor even sect, but realising the idea of personified isolation, dared to speak in the name of 'the backbone and sinew' of the British nation. Efforts of this kind would but deserve contempt, were it not that fanaticism is a formidable weapon even when wielded by agents whose numerical inferiority finds a parallel in the stubborn obliquity of their moral vision.

On Thursday, December 15, a deputation waited upon Mr. ADAMS to present to him an address adopted by the Committee of the Emancipation Society. The purport of the address was to congratulate Mr. LINCOLN on what was termed his reelection to the Presidency of the United States. The language of this remarkable manifesto exposed with startling accuracy the passions of the clique from which it emanated. 'It is an honour,' say these flatterers of Mr. LINCOLN to their idol, 'to you and to your fellow-citizens, that no prisoners have been put to death for the mere fact of being taken in arms against your Government.' 'Justice,' they would declare, 'has commanded you to kill every man who has dared to resist the authority of the best, the most pure, the most free Government upon earth. Had we, members of this Society of Emancipation, wielded the sword of M'DOWELL, of POPE, of BURNSIDE, or of HOOKER, we would have smote to the earth every one of the sons of Amalek, with their wives and their children, their oxen and their sheep; they all should have been offered up as one vast sacrifice of blood upon the altar of emancipation. They are rebels of the blackest dye, accursed slaveholders, who, by sinning against nature, have forfeited the right to be treated as men. Yet you, Mr. LINCOLN, in spite of the just anger of those faithful generals, TURCHIN, M'NEIL, and MILROY, who have executed righteous vengeance on your foes, have shown all possible forbearance, have left to your contemporaries and to posterity the grateful task of placing your moderation in noble contrast with the deplorable and sanguinary ferocity of European despots, for you being an American, and therefore a despot of humanity and longsuffering, have not murdered your prisoners in cold blood. Justice bade you strike, but mercy arrested your uplifted arm. Your fame shall live for ever.' It is at first sight scarcely credible, but it is true, that the address can find no single topic of admiration in the four years of Mr. LINCOLN'S administration, except that he has not killed his prisoners. There is an allusion to the favour bestowed on the Sanitary Commission, and that is all. There is not even a word about the achievements of Mr. LINCOLN in the task of emancipation. Barren indeed of virtues must be that despot whose single excellence is that he has not committed 50,000 brutal murders. If fanaticism did not blind the memory, it might have occurred to the minds of these votaries that the balance of prisoners has for the most part been in favour of the South, and that there is such a word as retaliation.

But the address of the Committee was not the only exponent of the views of the Emancipation Society. Not a few of the deputies aired their powers of speech on the occasion in a style which must fairly have astounded Mr. ADAMS by its marvellous resemblance to the eloquential tours de force of his own countrymen. Not even the persuasive EVERETT, when he elevated the manners of Mr. LINCOLN from the coarseness of a rail-splitter to the elegance of a Castilian duke, committed himself to a more preposterous hyperbole than did the Hon. and Rev. Baptist NOEL when he spoke of the proposal of BUTLER as 'magnanimous, generous, and Christian-like.' The same orator lauded the American people because they were confident that their domestic liberties were safe in the hands of a ruler who but six days before had ransacked hotels, private saloons, and boarding-houses in a hunt for the objects of his illegal oppression. Sir CHARLES LYELL spoke of a contest between a higher and a lower civilisation, possibly under the notion that this same BUTLER represented the former and ROBERT E. LEE the latter. Similar extravagance and a similar disregard of facts were displayed by other orators; but it is difficult to gaze on a spectacle so revolting as that presented by inhabitants of England urging on a man who ought to be the guardian of a free and peaceful country in a wild career of war and oppression.

In the hope of better things, we turn to the reply of Mr. ADAMS. We discover from his own lips that the Minister of the Northern Government has, with wise precaution, written down his ideas on paper. His position was a delicate one; he had no desire to be misunderstood, and therefore was determined to speak plainly. Most assuredly he has succeeded in the accomplishment of his resolution. Of course he had thanks and compliments cut and dried for his audience. He also had the good sense to wind up with an invective against slavery such as must have warmed the heart of JABEZ BURNS and Professor NEWMAN. He spoke of the vast regions of the cotton States as the immediate theatre of hostilities just as Mr. SEWARD designated the war as a slight disturbance in certain places adjacent to the Gulf of Mexico. He placed the Democratic party in absolute communication with the Confederates, in charming oblivion of the fact that his accusation, if true, would reduce his own party to the position of a mere faction in the American nation, and he seemed to regard the late election as the model of constitutional purity. These sentiments were, however, mere trifles, heralds and poursuivants adorning the progress of a more splendid spectacle. Mr. ADAMS, in his official character as a Minister to the Court of St. James's, deliberately threatened England with war. It is true that his exhibition of unmannerly audacity would fall sweet as honey on the palates of the Northern people. It may be that the taste was not unpleasant to the lips of an audience whose avowed preference of the institutions of the Model Republic argues an indifference to their own country. Yet it was a strange act for a man whose mission ought not to be that of bearding the Lion in his own den. 'I cannot disguise from myself,' says Mr. ADAMS, 'or from you, the painful fact that an opposite disposition has been manifested here in very influential circles, and that the knowledge of this has given rise to a general impression among my countrymen that the whole British nation really desires the disruption and consequent downfall of the power of the United States. Hence has sprung up a corresponding degree of ill-will which bids fair, if not counteracted, only to increase with time. If such passions be permitted a full indulgence between two nations, it needs little sagacity to foretell that in the long run the end is war.' The argument is brief and to the point. England must abstain from sympathy, even the sympathy of words, with the foes of the United States, or she must fight. What nation then is this that threatens England with the fierceness of her wrath? Is it the chivalrous soldiery of France or the heavy onslaught of 40,000,000 Germans before which England is to crouch and pray for pardon and peace? The bluster comes from the Minister of those States which, with a population of 20,000,000, with vast material resources, the command of the seas, and the aid of 200,000 mercenaries, has hopelessly failed to subjugate or even to overrun the territory of seven millions of people. Are twenty-six millions less powerful than seven millions? Is the Atlantic Ocean more easily traversed than the Rapidan or the Alleghany Hills? The presumption of Mr. ADAMS is great, but not without some justification; for while men high in power in England have spoken with abject horror of war, it was no marvel that a menace should be regarded as a suitable instrument for the enforcement of an unreasonable compliance.

Mr. Lincoln's Own.

THE Annual Message of President LINCOLN is the most grotesque literary effort extant. Though devoid of ornament, it is not devoid of style; but the style is unprecedented and inimitable. It is the perfection of vulgarity and muddle-headedness. The best comparison we could hit upon is to suppose that the apprentice of a village shopkeeper, fresh from a charity-school, being engaged in the noble work of self-improvement, enters on a Micawber correspondence with all sorts of people on all kinds of topics, and that some heavy joker prints the letters together to form an essay. Mr. LINCOLN opens with two lines of gratitude to God for health and an abundant harvest, and then rushes into a quaint dissertation upon the foreign affairs of the United States. At this season of the year we are reminded by this funny commencement of the appearance of the clown after the transformation scene, who, blinking his eyelids and putting his hand upon his stomach, assures the gallery that he is all right, and that he has had a good dinner. But the end is quite as funny as the beginning. Mr. LINCOLN concludes with an abruptness that would have shocked the literary taste of Sam Weller. After a series of paragraphs upon emancipation, from which it might naturally be inferred that emancipation was the sole condition of peace, Mr. LINCOLN writes: 'In stating a single condition of peace, I mean simply to say that the war will cease on the part of the Government whenever it shall have ceased on the part of those who began it;' and then Mr. LINCOLN signs his name. Well, we think it very likely that if one of the belligerents gives up the contest there will be peace, and that Mr. LINCOLN is justified in assuming that there must be two parties to a quarrel. But we need not dwell upon the peculiarities of Mr. LINCOLN'S style, and our comments upon the substance of the Message shall be as brief as possible. In his observations upon foreign affairs Mr. LINCOLN pays court to King Mob—that is, he panders to the Yankee hate of England and France. England is threatened with an increase of force on the Canadian lakes on the flimsy pretext that Confederates use Canada to fit out expeditions against the Federals, while France is snubbed through Mexico. Mr. LINCOLN says that Mexico is still the theatre of civil war, and that his Government maintains neutrality between the belligerents; therefore that it continues to recognise the JUAREZ Administration, although it is not able to discharge any of the functions of government, and is without an army, without a capital, and without organisation. It would be just as reasonable for England to continue to recognise FERDINAND as King of Naples. Mr. LINCOLN thinks it possible that if it were an open question the maritime Powers would refuse to recognise the Confederates as a naval belligerent, 'destitute as they are, and always have been, equally of ships of war, of ports, and harbours.' This is coming it very strong indeed. If the Confederates had no ships, it would be a matter of supreme indifference whether they were or were not recognised as naval belligerents; though there is no precedent for recognising a Government as a military belligerent only. But the Confederates have not been, and are not, destitute of ships. Mr. LINCOLN may forget, but Europe remembers, the fight in the Hampton Roads, when the Confederates gained a memorable victory, and demonstrated the superiority of ironclad over wooden vessels. The fight outside Charleston Harbour, when the Federal blockading squadron was put to flight, is not forgotten. Admiral FARRAGUT can tell Mr. LINCOLN when, in the autumn, he had a naval combat in Mobile Bay and gained the victory, that the Confederates had ships of war, and fought them manfully. When Mr. LINCOLN'S Message was delivered, the New York Chamber of Commerce was discussing the scandalous seizure of the Confederate war-ship Florida, which ship was disposed of in a manner that shook even the faith of GOLDWIN SMITH in the integrity of the Northern Government. Is the Alabama clean forgotten as a dead man out of mind? Is Mr. LINCOLN ignorant that Confederate cruisers are still on the ocean, and that Federal shipowners are forced to transfer their ships to neutral flags, and that Federal merchants prefer to ship their goods in neutral bottoms?

Mr. LINCOLN thus sums up the military operations of the past year. He says: 'Since the last Annual Message all the important lines and positions then occupied by our forces have been maintained, and our armies have steadily advanced.' What are the facts? Texas and Florida have been freed from the invader. The greater part of Louisiana that was occupied by the Federals is in the possession of the Confederates. It has been the same in Mississippi and North Carolina. The Federal hold in the western part of the State of Virginia has been relaxed. In Arkansas the Federals only retain two or three military posts. Nearly the whole of Tennessee has been liberated from the military control of the invader. During the past year the Confederates have recovered quite two-thirds of the territory they had lost in previous campaigns; the efforts of the Federals to take Charleston and Mobile have proved abortive; and neither GRANT nor SHERMAN has been able to overcome the Confederate armies. Yet Mr. LINCOLN says the Federals have maintained their position, and have steadily advanced,

Mr. LINCOLN elects to go on with the war, and declares that the resources of the North are inexhaustible, and that the North cannot consent to disunion. Here Mr. LINCOLN is guilty of unconscious plagiarism. If Mr. LINCOLN were an educated man, he would know something of history, and that the 'inexhaustible' and 'non possumus' arguments are as stale as they are untenable. When Spain was waging war with her colonies, she was vehement in her assurances to foreign nations that there was no limit to her resources, and that she could not give up her colonies; but for all that her colonies became independent. During the first war of American independence GEORGE III. declared he could not give up his colonies, and it was asserted by his Ministers that the resources of England were equal to any prolongation of the contest. Yet England did acknowledge the independence of her revolted colonies. Not contented with this brag, Mr. LINCOLN, for the hundredth time, tries to frighten the Confederates into submission by telling them that the door of mercy will one day be closed. The Confederates scorn the mercy of the Government which directed or approved the barbarous warfare of SHERIDAN and SHERMAN. When will Mr. LINCOLN learn that the first step towards skinning the lion is to catch him? SHAKSPEARE represents the French as sending the herald over and over again to HENRY V. for ransom before the battle of Agincourt. The last time, the herald warned HENRY that the gates of mercy were closed. It happened, however, that a few hours later the same herald came to HENRY, not to offer but to ask for mercy. Since Mr. LINCOLN has been President, he has heard of SHAKSPEARE and seen one of his plays. It would be well if some of his friends could induce him to read 'Henry V.' He might then be convinced of the folly of offering terms of amnesty to an unconquered enemy.

Mr. LINCOLN'S observations on the financial position of his Government are an odd comment on his theory of inexhaustible resources. He thinks that next July the public debt will amount to about 450,000,000*l.* sterling. In this he does not include the debts contracted by the several States, which are certainly not less than 100,000,000*l.* sterling. At the high rate of interest paid by the United States Government, the annual charge will constitute a debt heavier than that of England. Meantime the war is going on, and will go on so long as Mr. LINCOLN can find the means. It is evident that every six months of war diminishes the value of the Government currency, and the greater the discount of greenbacks the more rapidly does the Federal debt increase.

Mr. LINCOLN enunciates some curious views on the subject of finance, which point out pretty clearly how this huge debt is to be disposed of. He proposes that there shall be an issue of public securities exempt from taxation, which is a clumsy way of paying an exorbitant rate of interest. He also proposes that such securities shall not be liable to seizure for debt, so that the holder of them may get credit and refuse to pay his creditors and defy them to touch his property. Messrs. COBDEN and BRIGHT have lustily abused the law of entail, on the ground that it enabled the holder of an estate to cheat his creditors. But since Messrs. COBDEN and BRIGHT have for Mr. LINCOLN'S sake given up their free-trade and peace principles, they will no doubt approve Mr. LINCOLN'S outrageous parody on the English law of entail.

The significant observation of Mr. LINCOLN is this. He writes: 'The great advantage of citizens being creditors as well as debtors with relation to the public debt is obvious. Men readily perceive they cannot be much oppressed by a debt which they owe to themselves.' Certainly we never heard of a man dunning himself or bringing an action against himself for debt, or causing himself to be arrested for what is due from himself to himself, and for the obvious reason that the combination of debtor and creditor in one person has no existence save in the brain of Mr. LINCOLN. But this observation of Mr. LINCOLN foreshadows the kind of argument that will be used to justify repudiation of the Northern debt. The holders of public securities will be told that they will lose nothing, because repudiation merely cancels a debt they owe to themselves.

One more remark, and we have done with this Message. At the beginning of November it was announced, in the Washington and New York papers, that Mr. LINCOLN was engaged in the preparation of his Annual Message, and that for a few weeks he did not wish to receive any visitors at the White House. The Message bears witness that it is the unaided work of Mr. LINCOLN, and that it was sent to Congress without being submitted to the revision of any member of his Cabinet. It is a thoroughly characteristic document. It is worthy of Mr. LINCOLN. It is worthy of the cause he represents. It is, undoubtedly and entirely, 'Mr. LINCOLN'S own.'

THE THIRD YEAR OF THE WAR.*

WE have here the third volume of Mr. Pollard's history of the Southern War of Independence. It is marked by most of the same faults which characterised its predecessors—a recklessness of imputation not creditable to a journalist, and utterly unpardonable in an historian; a bitter animosity to the statesmen who form the Confederate executive, and especially to President Davis; an entire absence of temper, moderation, and intelligence in criticising the conduct of foreign nations, and generally a degree of prejudice and perversity which render the author's statements reliable only when they concern matters of fact, of which he, in common with others, had personal cognisance or positive information. If we were to believe Mr. Pollard, we must suppose that the South has shown an imbecility in the choice of her leaders second only to that of the North; that, so far from being one of the greatest statesmen of this century, Mr. Davis is a perverse, self-opinionated, wrong-headed blunderer; that instead of his having done infinite service to his country in organising her strength, making her resources available to the uttermost, providing substitutes for what could not be had, and utilising all that could, insisting on the gravity of the emergency, and forewarning the people of the probable duration of the war, the South has suffered grievously from the improvidence, negligence, and extravagant hopefulness of the President; that he neglected preparation, snubbed his advisers, and discouraged efforts to provide for a desperate struggle; that the enthusiasm and devotion of the people, unruled and undirected, supplied all deficiencies—discovered what had to be done and the means of doing it, built powder-mills, rolling-mills, and cannon-foundries; while the President could hardly be persuaded to accept the fruits of popular foresight. Every disaster is attributed to the President; every success solely to the people, the general, or the army. We need not waste words on a theory like this. Whatever motive power popular enthusiasm may supply, organisation and direction must come from the Government; and the admirable organisation of the South, and the thoroughly wise direction of her strength to the right points, sufficiently prove that the capacity of the chief was fully equal to the energy and devotion of the nation. We notice the vehement hostility of Mr. Pollard to the Government at Richmond, because it removes all suspicion that might otherwise attach to his evidence, which, even when given in a most unfriendly tone, affords important testimony in their favour on several important points. It is always to be borne in mind that our author, although a Southerner, is an opponent of the Confederate Government, and by no means scrupulous in his opposition. Therefore, his testimony, when it tells in their favour, may be received with as much confidence as would that of Seymour or Vallandigham to the merits of Mr. Lincoln, especially when, as often happens, it is given by way of censure or animadversion.

The second year of the war, according to Mr. Pollard's reckoning, closed with the great triumphs of Fredericksburg and Chancellorsville. From the latter field, as has almost always happened throughout this war, the defeated army escaped unbroken, however demoralised, and took up a strong position, from which Lee was unable to dislodge it. For this and other reasons he determined on a northward march, crossed the Potomac, passed through Maryland, and entered Pennsylvania. Hooker had been removed from the command, and the army which broke up and followed Lee was commanded by General Meade. Its vanguard was encountered by Lee at Gettysburg on July 1, 1863. On the next day the main army of the Federals came up, and took its position on a range of hills behind the town, forming a crescent-shaped line, concave towards the enemy. The Confederates attacked with desperate courage, and, after an obstinate conflict of many hours, were repulsed. That night the order was given to retreat; and in perfect order, carrying with them all their artillery, trains, and wagons, laden with the plunder of Federal depots, they returned to Virginia. A few stragglers, worn out with fatigue, and two pieces of cannon which stuck fast in the mud, were all the trophies of the Federal 'victory' and pursuit. But this was the first time that Lee had lost a pitched battle; and it was a sore disappointment to the expectant citizens of Richmond.

Worse news followed on the next day after the news of Gettysburg arrived there. General Grant, with an overwhelming force, had been sent against Vicksburg. That city contained about 25,000 men, and Johnston, with a force considerably smaller, was operating in the interior of Mississippi. When Grant left the river, and marched into the State, with a view of cutting off the communications and taking Vicksburg in the rear, Johnston summoned Pemberton, who had already left Vicksburg with its garrison on an expedition planned by himself, to take a part in a concerted plan which, placing the invaders between two fires, might probably have destroyed them. Pemberton neither carried out his instructions nor adhered to his former scheme; he struck out a new course, which miscarried entirely. Johnston was worsted and forced to withdraw; Grant turned on Pemberton and beat him, and his force rather fled than retreated to Vicksburg, abandoning without a blow a strong position on their route. From this time Johnston considered Vicksburg as lost, and was anxious to withdraw its garrison. The force under Pemberton was hardly adequate to man the extensive fortifications of the place against an enemy besieging it on all sides; the place was not provisioned for a siege—a circumstance which Mr. Pollard ascribes to gross negligence on Pemberton's part—and its fall appeared to the experienced general who commanded in Mississippi to be merely a matter of time. He did not think it worth while to sacrifice 25,000 men for the advantage of delay. The Government at Richmond and General Pemberton himself took a different view, and the place was held during a six weeks' siege. On the 4th of July, while a large quantity of provisions still remained, Pemberton capitulated, 'to save the effusion of blood'—an event which caused as much indignation in the South as triumph in the North, and the circumstances of which still await a thorough investigation and an impartial judgment, which, it is needless to say, they do not receive at Mr. Pollard's hands. His universal theory accounts for all such disasters. Mr. Davis would appoint General Pemberton, and of course, being a favourite of Mr. Davis, General Pemberton was half-coward and half-traitor. The fall of Vicksburg was followed by the fall of Port Hudson, and the occupation by Federal troops of great part of Arkansas. Mississippi also was overrun. Jackson, its capital, which had been taken by Grant on his previous march into the interior, was captured by Sherman and wantonly burnt. The fortunes of the Confederacy had reached a very low ebb.

Some successes in Louisiana and the expedition of Morgan, which, though it ended in disaster, yet spread a panic terror throughout Ohio and Indiana, and, as Mr. Pollard says, 'taught the South the value of adventure,' were the first events that tended to raise their drooping spirits. Next came the siege of Charleston, commenced with enormous force, with loud threats, and with great parade, but ending in total failure. One single outpost, Battery Wagner, after long and desperate fighting, and after several Federal assaults had been repulsed with heavy loss, was evacuated by the Confederates, as being untenable against an enemy who had possession not only of the sea, but of the ground in front. An attack on the dismantled ruins of Fort Sumter resulted in a great disaster, and the capture of the old flag hauled down by Major Anderson, and brought by the Yankees to be hoisted once more over the 'birthplace of secession.' It was a glorious trophy for the Carolinians. Gilmore earned execration by the brutality which led him, when defeated in his attempts on the defences, to bombard the city at a distance of five miles, in the hope of killing women and children, negroes and non-combatants. But his diabolical endeavour did but little harm, and the siege, after languishing for a long time, was at length practically abandoned.

Three Federal expeditions of considerable importance ended in still more signal discomfiture. Sherman, with 35,000 men, moved from Vicksburg, aiming at Selma in Alabama, and thence probably at Mobile. But this expedition, though supported by a large force of cavalry on the one hand, and by a simultaneous excursion from New Orleans on the other, resulted in the retreat of the invaders, with heavy loss, and in great confusion, after doing no further damage than to devastate the country in their line of march, burn houses, destroy crops, and carry off negroes. General Banks's march up the Red River, with a force of all arms, supported by several gunboats, brought him face to face with a Confederate army under Kirby Smith, who, after two days' fighting, completely routed him, destroyed the greater part of his command, failed only by an accident to capture the flotilla, and so thoroughly shattered the Federal power in Louisiana that from that time forth the invaders have never stirred beyond the neighbourhood of New Orleans. The third expedition was sent into Florida rather for political than for military purposes; it also was encountered and defeated by the Confederates, and the remnant were glad enough to make their escape out of the State. In any other war three such victories as these would have been considered quite enough for a year's work; but in this battle of giants such conflicts as these are mere episodes, incidental only to the main action of the twofold drama being played out in Tennessee and Virginia.

Rosecrans had the command of the Federal army at Chattanooga, on the borders of Georgia. His attack on Bragg, at the Chickamauga, after the Southern general had been reinforced by the arrival of Longstreet, brought his army to the verge of destruction; and the opinion of Longstreet and of the army of the West seems to have confirmed the judgment pronounced by Mr. Pollard, that, had General Bragg been more prompt and energetic in the pursuit, the enemy might have been almost annihilated. As it was, either the skill of Thomas, or the delay of Bragg, or both together, saved the Federal army; and the opportunity was lost for ever. Longstreet was despatched by Bragg to attack Knoxville, where Burnside was placed in support of Rosecrans. But during the absence of that general and his corps, Grant, who had superseded Rosecrans, attacked the Confederates in their position at Mission Ridge, in front of Chattanooga, stormed their lines, and forced them to retreat into Georgia. Longstreet, left to himself, was unable to besiege Knoxville, and, after an unsuccessful attempt to take it by a coup de main, eventually rejoined the army before Richmond. Bragg gave way to Johnston, and he in his turn to Hood, in command of the army in Georgia, which, after several combats in which the advantage rested with the Confederates, was gradually forced back upon Atlanta. At that city the history leaves them, Hood still in possession, and Sherman threatening the place.

Before the Federal army moved from Chattanooga, Grant had been called to another sphere of action. Meade, having with a large force reconnoitred the position of General Lee, declined to attack it; and the Government at Washington had to find another officer to lead their army of the Potomac once more 'on to Richmond.' Grant came, and accepted the command, with the rank of Lieutenant-General, on the conditions annexed. He led his army straightforward against General Lee, resolved 'to fight it out on that line if it took him all the summer.' At the same time Butler moved forward from Fortress Monroe against Petersburg. Beauregard, who had left Charleston to undertake the defence of that little city, gave battle to Butler, and drove him back into his lines at Bermuda Hundred, where he waited the arrival of Grant. What Grant was doing is still fresh in the recollection of our readers; how he rushed on Lee's lines, and was thoroughly beaten; how he tried to get round those lines by a flank movement, again found Lee in his front, again attacked, and was again beaten; and how this manœuvre was repeated until, after sacrificing some fourscore thousand men, Grant found himself where he might have landed at first, on the south side of the James river, in communication with Butler.

So ended the third year of the war. It had begun in disaster and alarm. The Confederacy was cut in two; the western half seemed almost lost; Tennessee was gone, Georgia threatened, Alabama in danger, Mississippi overrun, Charleston menaced with a siege. The Western States had cleared themselves of the enemy, who held nothing but a post or two in Arkansas, and a strip of land in Louisiana. Charleston was safe, Mississippi and Alabama recovered; Confederate guerillas were scouring Tennessee. The two armies still faced one another in Virginia; but the Confederates had added another half-dozen victories to their score. Only in Georgia had they lost ground. The South was as strong as ever; the resources of the North in men and money showed signs of failing. The year that had opened in calamity certainly closed in hope.

There are two subjects on which Mr. Pollard furnishes us with evidence that ought not to be passed over in silence—first, as regards the treatment of prisoners on either side; secondly, as to the fate of negroes falling into Northern hands. Our readers may be aware that the North has repeatedly attempted to excuse its brutal cruelties to Southern prisoners (which no Northerner, save General Neal Dow, has ventured to deny) by accusing the South of maltreating her prisoners, starving them, and leaving them without shelter. Now Mr. Pollard, as a partisan of the Opposition, brings a series of railing accusations against the Richmond Government on this very subject. First, that while Southern prisoners were denied the comforts and necessaries of life, the Northerners captive in the South have always fared as well as Southern soldiers, and often, when supplied by their countrymen, better than Confederate Ministers of State. Secondly, that when Morgan and his comrades were treated as felons in Ohio, no retaliation was inflicted, and that of similar cases of outrage no notice whatever was taken. Thirdly, that where, in half a dozen enumerated instances, Confederate prisoners were deliberately murdered in cold blood, and redress refused by the Federal Government, no retribution was exacted. Charges like these, made and angrily pressed by a political opponent, are the best answer to the slanders of the North regarding the treatment of prisoners in the Southern States.

The following passages, as to the treatment of the negroes captured by the Federals, require no comment from us. The evidence, be it remembered, comes chiefly from Northern witnesses:—

In the winter of 1863-64 the Governor of Louisiana, in his official message, published to the world the appalling fact that more negroes had perished in Louisiana from the cruelty and brutality of the public enemy than the combined number of white men in both armies from the casualties of war. In illustration, he stated that when the Confederate forces surprised and captured Berwick's Bay, last summer, they found about two thousand negroes there in a state of the most utter destitution, many of them so emaciated and sick that they died before the tender humanity of the Confederates could be applied to their rescue from death.

A letter to the Massachusetts paper said:—'There are, between Memphis and Natchez, not less than fifty thousand blacks, from among whom have been called all the able-bodied men for the military service. Thirty-five thousand of these, viz. those in camps between Helena and Natchez, are furnished the shelter of old tents and subsistence of cheap rations by the Government, but are in all other things in extreme destitution. Their clothing, in perhaps the case of a fourth of this number, is but one single worn and scanty garment. Many children are wrapped night and day in tattered blankets as their sole apparel. But few of all these people have had any change of raiment since, in midsummer or earlier, they came from the abandoned plantations of their masters. Multitudes of them have no beds or bedding; the clayey earth is the resting-place of women and babes through these stormy winter months. They live, of necessity, in extreme filthiness, and are afflicted with all fatal diseases. Medical attendance and supplies are very inadequate. They cannot, during the winter, be disposed to labour and self-support, and compensated labour cannot be procured for them in the camps. They cannot, in their present condition, survive the winter. It is my conviction that, unrelieved, the half of them will perish before the spring. Last winter, during the months of February, March, and April, I buried, at Memphis alone, out of an average of about four thousand, twelve hundred of these people, or twelve a day.'

Another Yankee correspondent wrote as follows respecting the negroes who had come into Vicksburg after the surrender of General Pemberton:—'About the 1st of August the military authorities became alarmed lest a pestilence should break out among them and extend to the army. Peremptory orders were issued to at once remove across the river all negroes of every age and sex, whether sick or well, who were not in some employment. One morning I went out to inform a certain Lieutenant W——, who with an inadequate force was executing the order, that one of those in the Baptist church was dead, and that another, a woman, was lying behind a fence dying. He told me that he had detailed for the purpose of removing the negroes twenty army wagons; that he had hauled them, well, sick, and dead, with all their traps, to the river, where he had a steamer to convey them across to a point opposite the lower part of the city; that he had one wagon to haul the dead, and that on some days he found as many as twenty; that in one house he found six dead bodies, with living ones sitting and lying around them, apparently unconscious of their situation. Holes were dug in the river's bank, and the dead buried. The searching out and removal of these negroes consumed about fifteen or twenty days. About 300 were thus removed to the low grounds opposite Vicksburg, and there left in the weeds, without any shelter, under the care of a man who was appointed to organise them into a camp, and separate small-pox cases from the rest. The chaplain told me that these negroes had suffered and were still suffering untold want and wretchedness; that nearly 400 had died since he had taken charge of them; that from sixteen to twenty died daily. Sometimes they would crawl off into the woods, where their bodies would be found only by the stench which arose from their decay. That there was no white man with them but a nephew of his; that their rations were furnished by the Government, but sometimes he had difficulty in getting them over the river. That once they were five days without receiving any food, and the negroes in their despair threatened to kill him, thinking that the fault was his. He also stated that they had no tents or shelter, except brush, to shield them from the sun, or storm, or dews of night. Captain A. stated to me that there were in his camp 2,000; at Young's Point, 8,551; on Passau Island, where he proposed gathering most of them, 2,800; and on Black's plantation on the Yazoo, 2,400; in all over 16,000. One morning I went among the wretched masses, where they were hauled to the bank of the river preparatory to being sent across. I tried in vain to find some women who were able to work, as we wished their labour at our house. All were either sick or taking care of the sick. I saw nothing but one sad scene of misery.'

The friends of the North would fain persuade us that this war is waged on the ground of slavery—that Northern treasure is lavished, and Southern towns and homes burned, for the sake of emancipating the slave. If it were so, which would be entitled to the sympathy of mankind—the Southerner who fights for the right of keeping the negro in a servitude where he is well fed, well clothed, well housed, cared for in childhood, sickness, and old age, and far better off than an English peasant, in return for his labour; or the Yankee who fights for the satisfaction of massing thousands of these unhappy creatures together in swamps and woods, unsheltered and half fed, to die of want and disease, in unutterable wretchedness, by the gift of a liberty they do not want and cannot use?

THE CONFEDERATE CAUSE IN FRANCE.

FROM A CONFEDERATE CORRESPONDENT.

PARIS: December 21.

WHILST Sherman's campaign excites the admiration of the strategists of Le Temps and Le Siècle, M. Aucaigne has undertaken to prove to the readers of La Patrie that this pretended triumphant march was in fact but a retreat. Commencing with Sherman's departure from Atlanta, he follows him step by step, and proves, by a strict analysis of events, that the movement of the Federal general was simply and solely an evacuation of territory.

I do not think that I have read, either in the London journals or in those of New York, a more substantial or more comprehensive summary of Sherman's operations than that furnished by M. Aucaigne. The young writer of La Patrie seems to penetrate, as it were, the inmost thoughts of the Federal general, and to exhibit his intentions in open day. He represents him as entering Atlanta 'after having had more frequent recourse to fire and pillage than to cannon-balls or bullets,' and as finding himself there with his communications cut off, and exposed to the reiterated attacks of the light troops of the South.

The position of affairs (continues La Patrie) afforded the Federal general but this unfavourable alternative, either to remain in Atlanta and there make a useless employment of his troops, or else to evacuate the town with all his men and to beat a retreat towards the North on regaining Chattanooga, after having broken through the army of Beauregard, should that General attempt to check his progress.

Evidently this latter plan was the more prudent and the more practicable; but then Sherman would be compelled to avow that he had been deceived in affirming that Atlanta would form an excellent basis for operations against the South; he would expose himself to the rage of the Northerners, become all the more furious since they had loudly declared Atlanta to be the heart of the Confederacy, which, said they, would not exist twenty-four hours after the capture of the town. On the contrary, however, the South still lived, and was better than ever; its backbone not being even yet broken. It invaded a large portion of the Federal territory, at the same time keeping Sherman in check at Atlanta, Sheridan at the Potomac, and Grant before Petersburg.

In order to avoid this anger of the Unionists, and to save his own credit, Sherman had recourse to a subterfuge. He made a great stir, truly, and pretended that he had been sent not only to capture Atlanta but also to conquer Georgia; that consequently he should employ his whole army in this enterprise. The General, as is evident, spoke neither of any change in the base of operations, nor of retreat. The Northern journals, however, apply the former expression to his movement; but it is for our readers to judge if the latter was not better suited.

After this irrefutable demonstration, La Patrie consoles the Federals whom its remarks may have saddened by telling them that 'there have been glorious retreats—retreats which have immortalised the names of the generals who conducted them.' This behaviour is certainly very polite, and the friends of the North will probably take it kindly on the part of M. Delamarre's journal.

You are no doubt aware that the Confederate commissioners have received, through Cardinal Antonelli, the answer of the Papal Government to the manifesto of the Richmond Congress which has been sent by them to each of the European Cabinets. The Mémorial Diplomatique, in publishing this fact, adds that the messenger who conveyed the despatch of the Confederate commissioners to His Holiness was received by him with the greatest distinction, and that neither the Pope nor Cardinal Antonelli concealed their sympathy for the Southern cause.

The Opinion Nationale hastened to reproduce this intelligence; and as the special mission of this journal is to pulverise priests and slave-dealers, it conceives that nothing could be more natural than that the sympathy of the Church should be shown towards the cause of the South, since Bossuet himself was a pro-slavist. If you wish to know what Bossuet has to do with the matter, you must ask it of the writer whose signature is attached to this article, M. Labbé, a young man whose physiognomy portrays candour, and who, in spite of his name, becomes furious at the bare mention of the name of priest. Formerly M. Labbé's mind was infested by this one hatred only, and it allowed him to live without tormenting him very greatly; but his friend M. Malespine thought it right to inoculate him with a hatred for slave-dealers also, with which he is himself possessed, and since that time this unfortunate young man has become a prey to each of these inhuman passions. To the ravages which these feelings commit upon his mind are to be attributed, they say, M. Labbé's unequal step and the extraordinary glare which his eyes sometimes assume.

Nevertheless, since M. Malespine has succeeded in imparting to the minds of others a little of the hatred by which he is himself animated towards the Confederate cause, he has become somewhat more calm; indeed, it sometimes happens that he treats the friends of the South, if not with politeness, at least with impartiality. Thus, when noticing the excellent pamphlet of M. Bourgeois on the American question, he did full justice to the work by exhibiting its many merits. M. Malespine does not, certainly, carry his impartiality so far as to acknowledge M. Bourgeois to be altogether right in his statements; still he fully admits the ability of the author. Such an avowal as this from the pen of M. Malespine is not without its weight, since it cannot be denied that he has a thorough knowledge of the American question.

The substance of Mr. Lincoln's Message, which we received on Monday evening, does not satisfy La Patrie:—

The President of the States, formerly United (says this journal), acknowledges that the South rejects all negotiation having for its base the reestablishment of the Union, and he declares that the North will never agree to peace unless the Union be reestablished. Never is saying a great deal. It is clear that the Washington Cabinet flatters itself with the idea that the resources of the country are inexhaustible, and that these resources will permit an indefinite continuance of the war.

But the Federal populations are far from sharing this opinion. The prospect of an eternal war, which Mr. Lincoln is pleased to offer, does not find so easy an acceptance with the people of the North; more especially when this country, so full of resources, has a budget which, according to the President's speech in partibus, balances receipts amounting to $788,000,000, by an outlay of $1,400,000,000.

The Temps considers the case to be otherwise; it has, however, some misgivings respecting the financial resources of the North, and thinks that the American finances too much resemble those of Europe. This journal also states, not without some show of satisfaction, that it does not appear to be the intention of the Cabinet of Washington to change its policy with regard to Mexico. The same remark is made by the Opinion Nationale.

I have noticed this week in La France, amongst other articles on the American question, a very good comparative table of the Northern and the Southern finances.

The Journal Illustré, one of M. Millaud's popular journals, has published, on the first page of its last number, the portraits of all the officers of the Florida. These portraits, which are of a striking resemblance, were drawn from photographs taken by MM. Mage Frères, of Brest.

The Journal Illustré has no right to talk politics; on this occasion, however, the chief editor of that journal has thought himself justified in departing from the rule imposed upon him, and remarks as follows:—

As is well known, our pencil, the mute spectator of political events, may represent them without any accompanying reflections; in the present case, however, it may be permitted to deplore the manner in which a Northern vessel achieved this easy victory. She has, moreover, been disavowed by her Government.

Homage, therefore, to the glorious vanquished ones!

The Journal Illustré, without any acceptance of party, owes the monument of its engravings to that which is noble, good, useful, courageous—

To the conquered of the Florida!

CONFEDERATE CAUSE IN LANCASHIRE.

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

MANCHESTER: December 21, 1864.

HERE, as elsewhere, President Lincoln's recent Message to Congress is the great topic of conversation, and is yet fruitful of leading articles in our daily press. A critical examination of the document impresses the Guardian 'strongly' with the conclusion that it is Mr. Lincoln's own composition. That newspaper derives this inference from the fact that the Message is instinct throughout with a bewilderment and confusion which may most naturally be supposed to constitute the personal mental condition of the unhappy man upon whom fate has imposed a burden and a responsibility so painfully beyond his strength. Its ludicrous affectation of calmness only heightens the effect of the perplexity which it vainly endeavours to conceal. The little that the President condescends to say upon the war is by no means exact, and were it true it would still be singularly little. 'The war,' he observes, 'still continues.' Possibly, says the Guardian, he might have supposed that some of his hearers required to be reminded of that circumstance. 'Since the last annual Message,' he goes on, 'all the important lines and positions then occupied by our forces have been maintained, and our armies have steadily advanced, thus liberating the regions left in the rear, so that Missouri, Kentucky, and Tennessee have again produced reasonably fair crops.' This remarkable statement furnishes the Guardian with the real text for its article, and the writer proceeds to discourse upon it as follows:—

This, we repeat, is not a true statement of the facts, little as it amounts to. Within the year the Federals have entirely lost their hold of Texas. They have been beaten by regular military operations out of large districts of country previously held by them in Louisiana, North Carolina, and Florida, and, with the exception of the recovery of Plymouth in North Carolina, have made no attempt to redeem their losses. The States which the President indicates as having been 'liberated' and left in the rear of the Federal armies are unfortunately chosen.

Nor does the same journal hold the President's logic conspicuously sound when he said of General Sherman's march that it 'tends to show a great increase of our relative strength that our general-in-chief should feel able to confront and hold in check every active force of the enemy, and yet to detach a well-appointed large army to move on such an expedition;' and, as to the future, that 'the result not being known, conjecture in regard to it cannot here be indulged.' The Guardian respectfully observes that the 'result' which is not yet known is exactly the thing which must determine the character of General Sherman's movement as a proof either of the power of the Federal arms or of the wisdom of the Federal policy. After all, however, the President's language is certainly not hopeful; 'but that,' concludes the writer, in the same tone of quiet sarcasm that pervades the whole article, 'will do Mr. Lincoln no harm if General Sherman's good fortune exceeds reasonable expectation, while it will be all the better for him if the result should be disastrous.'

The Courier, the daily Conservative newspaper in this city, treats, inter alia, that portion of the Message in which President Lincoln seems to anticipate a great change in the public opinion of the South on the termination of President Davis's tenure of office. Mr. Lincoln appears to fancy that when released from the government of Mr. Davis, the Confederates will be, perhaps not more disposed, but more able, to entertain conditions of submission; and he assumes that the people of the South have revolted on 'compulsion,' and that there are many quite disposed and ready, when a suitable opportunity presents itself, to return into the Union. Upon this the Courier argues as follows:—

Why Mr. Lincoln should so perversely continue to hug this wild delusion, it is impossible to say. He must know that those who want opportunities very often make them, and that there is nothing so fortuitous in the retirement of Mr. President Davis that it need be waited for, or would be waited for, if the people of the South wished to be free from his power and influence. Besides, Mr. Lincoln has tried this 'liberating' experiment over and over again in various shapes. It was intended (or pretended) that the very first armed expedition into the Southern States should be for the purpose of 'liberating' Northern sympathies; and what came of it? Why, the Confederates drew their swords and flung away the scabbards; and those swords have never been sheathed since for an instant, so long as the seasons were favourable for fighting. Mr. Lincoln surely does not suppose that those Northern sympathies have been strengthened by anything that has happened since in the course of the war; by the military despotism under which New Orleans was placed; by the raining of 'Greek fire' upon the non-combatant inhabitants of Charleston; by the ill-usage of women and children that has ever attended on a Northern advance; or, more recently, by the devastation that has been expressly ordered and executed by General Sherman during his retreat from Atlanta to the seacoast.

The Examiner, in treating the President's mode of dealing with foreign (English) affairs, has an article much in the tone a coward would adopt in thanking a bully for refraining for once from bethumping him with hard words.

'Those,' saith that high-spirited and truly patriotic journal—'those who are best acquainted with the present temper of the American people, will also be best fitted for appreciating the calm and measured tone in which Mr. Lincoln has treated of these irritating subjects. We are compelled to believe that he would have found it an easy task to stir up the national resentment to a degree which would have placed the peaceful relations of the two countries in imminent peril. To have done so it would not have been necessary for him to create a grievance. The Vermont raid alone would have furnished him with an occasion for uttering a few fiery sentences, which would have set the passions of millions in a flame. Let us do justice to the serene temper, the deep sense of justice, the steady perception of international interests, which characterise this much-abused man. He possesses some at least of the highest and rarest qualities of a statesman, and his reelection to the Presidential chair is an event upon which we may sincerely congratulate the friends of peace in both countries.

The feeling on 'Change on receipt of the Presidential Message is thus described on the authority of the Manchester Guardian:—

The anxiously expected advices from India and America have now both arrived, and yet, united, have failed to give that buoyancy of tone to our market which the arrival of either was expected separately to call forth. If we are to forego all hope of a moderate supply of American cotton until the restoration of the Union by force, or until another Presidential election (that of the South) may, in a couple of years, according to Mr. Lincoln, give a chance of peace, the prospect is indeed dreary for the trade of this district, and may well account for the subdued feeling which was apparent on our Exchange to-day.

The affairs of the Southern Independence Association are reported to be in a prosperous condition. New members continue to enrol themselves, and old ones are renewing their expressions of unabated sympathy with the Confederate cause. An influential supporter of the Association in his own county writes as follows:—

St. Leonard's-on-the-Sea, December 17, 1864.

My zeal in behalf of Southern independence has not cooled. It has always been quite clear from the beginning of the American war that it never could end but in one way, viz. in the independence of the South. It has also been clear that the sympathies of Englishmen have all been with the heroes of the South, and not with the savage, braggart, blustering Yankees. Why then is Lord Russell allowed to override the plain wish of the country? There can be no doubt that a timely acknowledgment of 'Southern independence' would tend to put an end to a war which is a disgrace to humanity.

The Secretary of the Association (Mr. T. B. Kershaw) is, I believe, about to resume his lecturing campaign. Last Thursday evening he was down at the Potteries, and delivered a lecture in the Town Hall, Hanley.

Last evening, Mr. Matthew Chadwick, one of the members of the Committee of the Independence Association, delivered a lecture in the large hall at Ashbury's Works, near Manchester, to an audience chiefly composed of mechanics. The 'lecture' consisted of a narrative of Mr. Chadwick's experience in the Confederate States during the past year, and it was listened to with marked attention throughout. Many thousands of men are engaged at or in the neighbourhood of the works. Arrangements have been made for a series of lectures on the right of the South to secede, and the injustice to the Confederacy and to England of disregarding their right to recognition.

LETTER FROM NEW YORK.

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

NEW YORK: December 6, 1864.

CONGRESS reassembled at Washington yesterday. A quorum appeared in both Houses. Only some formal business was transacted, as it was announced that the President's Message would not be sent in until to-day. It will begin to come over the wires at 12 o'clock, and will reach you in full by the papers which go out in the steamer from Boston to-morrow. It will, I fear, be too late in reaching here to be made the subject of comment by correspondence from New York.

It is understood that the two most important of the annual reports—that from the War Department and that from the Treasury—are not ready to accompany the Message. General statements from each, as furnished to the President, will be given as usual, but the reports in detail, with the accompanying tables, cannot be expected for some time. The usual monthly report for November was not published by the Treasury Department. The condition of the Treasury is acknowledged to be very bad. The particulars, so far as the Government will disclose them, are looked for with a great deal of uneasiness. The glimpses we have of it, from the givings out of those who are supposed to have accurate information, are very far from encouraging. The internal taxes under the old law are now said to have produced only about $85,000,000 for the present year ending on June 30, and under the new taxation the revenue, instead of $1,000,000 a day, is but a little over $500,000—at the utmost not over $600,000—a falling-off from the estimated receipts of $146,000,000 a year.

That this gloomy view of the finances will be sustained by the Government reports, when they come in, is evident from the frankness with which the Administration press, now that the elections are secure in their favour, are speaking out on the appalling necessities of Government. The New York Times—which, more than any other paper in this city, has confidential relations with the Executive at Washington—is preparing the public mind to receive a disheartening account of the Treasury affairs. The case is stated in the best light in which partisan hopefulness can place it, in the columns of that paper, a day or two ago, as follows:—'We are spending at a frightful rate. Our taxes are stretched almost to the extremity. The gold-bearing loans will soon come to an end from the limit fixed by the gold returned in duties. New loans will be placed and readily taken, but they cannot meet probably one-half of our daily expenditure. Production itself—the measure of our wealth—is already feeling the effect of the loss of labour, and has diminished in the most important cereals about 7 per cent. during the last year, instead of increasing, as we had hoped it would do. It is true that the most remarkable and fortunate development of our mineral resources during the last three years, in the produce of the mines of Colorado and Nevada, and the sudden discovery of petroleum in immense quantities, give us much hope for the future. Still we are spending on a gigantic scale. There is a limit even to the power of this nation in bearing a public debt. It should always be borne in mind that national bankruptcy is among the things possible. Of the crushing of the rebellion there can be no doubt, but it may be gained through the destruction of the public credit. Bankruptcy in the Free States would be a calamity of which, in all the material evils of this war, we have never yet experienced even the resemblance.'

'We are spending,' adds this journal, 'perhaps four times our income. What we fear is that the Governmental expenditure is too large for our means, and must in some way or other be reduced, or the whole system will plunge into the abyss of bankruptcy.'

It is under this warning from a devoted friend of the Administration—the editor of the Times was the executive head of the national party organisation which reelected Mr. Lincoln—that this Congress meets.

The election is taken as a peremptory direction that the war is to go on; the Congress are now invoked to consider, under these fresh instructions from the people, how to find the means for carrying it on with bankruptcy staring them in the face, and the prospect clearly developed before them that no success in the war is to be anticipated which will bring a peace that will relieve the finances materially of the enormous burden of annual expenditure and the frightfully accumulating debt.

Some of the journalist financiers are demanding an increase of taxation to the full amount of the estimated expenditures for carrying on the war without adding to the debt, and talk with spread-eagle grandeur of the patriotic alacrity with which the people will meet the infliction of a taxation which, as they estimate it, will reach about $800,000,000 a year. It is a small estimate—the expenditures for the coming year will certainly be not less than $1,000,000,000—but it is a huge draft to be made on the means and patience of a people who have already so much disappointed the Government expectations of a much smaller sum adjusted to their assumed zeal for contribution and calculated means.

A tax on lands, and other taxation in the nature of direct taxes, have been much discussed; but the project is, I believe, discarded as utterly impracticable, from the unequal severity with which it will operate. The Constitution of the United States provides that direct taxes shall be apportioned among the States according to their representation in Congress—that is, according to population, and not according to capital or productive capacity. Some of the wealthiest States are least populous. A land-tax, for example of its operation, would exact from the agricultural State of Iowa, with large territory and a poor population, three times as much as from Rhode Island, which is an enormously rich State and is growing richer in her immense manufacturing establishments by the expenditure of the war, which is exhausting and impoverishing Iowa. The experiment of raising taxes by means which produce numerous inequalities of this sort in very oppressive degrees against a population already seriously discontented, is too hazardous to be tried. The genius of the Federal financiers is to be exercised upon new schemes for adding to the list of indirect taxation, and the hope of finding productive sources is extremely faint.

The war will go on—there is no help for that—till the final crash of the Government credit, to defer which these palliatives are sought after. The expenditure will continue, even be increased in the expansion of the paper currency which is inevitable. The debt will accumulate till it reaches the 'limit of the power of the nation in bearing a public debt,' and then comes the bankruptcy, which the Times foresees with a shudder as the possible cost of crushing the rebellion—a cost of calamity of which, in 'all the material evils of this war, we have never yet experienced even the resemblance.'

This savage resolve to continue the war upon the South, even at the cost of the national bankruptcy, which is dimly foreshadowed as imminent, was expressed a few days since by the same high Republican authority, in expounding the policy of the next Presidential term as based on the popular judgment assumed to have been passed upon Mr. Lincoln's policy by the results of the election of November. I transcribe for you a portion of the article, to illustrate the temper of the dominant party, and to call your attention to the explicit avowals, made without reservation at last, of the true nature of the contest as it is waged by the North, and is understood North and South. The question which the Times discusses is this—'What is the South fighting for?' And this is its answer:—

'There is a prevalent opinion here in the North that it is fighting for slavery. It is erroneous. Though a passion for slavery was the immediate occasion of the war, it does not now sustain the war. The South would buy triumph to-morrow, if it could, by a complete sacrifice of slavery. It would now yield though it could take "a bond of fate," that by yielding it could save slavery. What Jeff. Davis told Colonel Jacques, in his confidential interview, is perfectly true—that slavery had now nothing to do with the war, and that the only question now involved is the question of Southern independence; that is to say, the independence of the "Confederacy." There seems, then, to be substantial agreement, both by Jeff. Davis and his opponents of every shade, that the sole object of the South is to vindicate and for ever establish State independence and sovereignty. It is precisely that for which the South is fighting—exactly the converse of this national principle for which the North is fighting. We can tell the South, in all sincerity, that the Northern people will carry this war to any extremity rather than let the nationality be broken. This is the unalterable determination of nine-tenths of the Northern people, whether supporters or opponents of President Lincoln's Administration. They know that sooner or later they will break down the fighting power of the South. They know, too, that they can afterwards maintain the national authority over the South, if not with Southern acquiescence, on a basis of mutual respect, and good will, and civil equality, then by a throwing open of all the lands of the enemies of the Government to the permanent possession of every actual settler, from whatever quarter of the world, and the repeopling of the South by a loyal population. We are not willing to believe that the madness of the South will be so prolonged as to drive the Government to that resort. But that resort will be used, and even others sterner yet, if need be, sooner than let the nation be divided and destroyed. The national unity is our only safety. The South may be sure that it will be maintained at all costs.'

Some time ago your Earl Russell deeply offended the Northern people by describing the American conflict as one for empire on one side and independence on the other. It was British calumny to intimate that the North is capable of attempting to found an empire by the power of the sword over eleven sovereign States and eight millions of free Americans. His definition is now the accepted exposition of the Northern idea. A union of States is discarded for a unity of territory, and this territorial unity of empire is to be maintained at the cost of national bankruptcy at home, and, if necessary and possible, by the seizure of all the lands and property of the Southern States, parcelling it among conquerors, and driving out the population at the point of the sword. The spirit of Butler has entered into the whole body of the Administration, and there is a furious demand on all sides for more men, more paper money, more taxes, more blood, to carry out this undisguised lust for empire 'at all costs.' 'Flectere si nequeo Superos, Acheronta movebo.'

You will also observe that unconscious credit is given to the Southern people for the unity of purpose with which they are moved, and the readiness with which they make slavery a secondary question, inferior in interest to the single great issue to which they are devoted, of maintaining their political separation from the North. It is a true confession, for which the people of England ought to have been prepared by the events of this war, if not by the political history of the times which preceded it, to which their attention was little drawn, the conflict being for the most part read in the light of an ephemeral strife among parties rather than a grave conflict about the fundamental principles of government. The abolition of slavery was originally agitated mainly by politicians at the North, as a means for securing a party predominance in the Federal Government, and for establishing such theories of government and administration there as would put the South for ever at the mercy of the North; and the war in its whole progress has proved that slavery is only the incident for the development of a radical conflict of ideas on the true nature of government, and the means by which civil liberty can be preserved for populations and among States. The North, maddened at the obstruction which its schemes of universal dominion met with in the resistance of the South, has discarded all other thought but that of maintaining them by force of arms, and erecting empire over conquered provinces by means which embrace without remorse universal rapine and the expulsion, if need be, from the country of the whole race of its inhabitants, as noble and brave and enlightened a race of free-born men as ever drew sword to protect their native land. If the power were equal to the will, there would be no peace until the South is overborne by these invading hordes and the whole population in exile; for while a remnant remains to keep alive the sense of wrong and the thirst for vengeance, there will be no peace. But in all this there is the desperate miscalculation that the fury of aggression will outlive the capacity and spirit to resist, and that the swift ruin which is threatening to overtake the North will wait the long years which it would take, under the most auspicious advances possible, to overrun, depopulate, and occupy the South.

The illusions of peace to come from Southern submissiveness in any quarter have now totally disappeared. The last attempt to mislead was the report, stated with minuteness from Philadelphia, and since countenanced by telegrams from Washington, that the Governors of Georgia, Alabama, and Mississippi have been jointly tendering proposals for a separate peace to be made with General Sherman. It was an impudent canard, got up to create the impression that General Sherman's advance from Atlanta eastward was the advance of a conqueror instead of the device of a baffled general seeking to cover by a brilliant dash the evident failure of the great object of his whole summer campaign. The story had hardly got abroad before it was met by the proofs of the determined adherence of Governor Brown and all Georgia to the fortunes of the Confederacy in the attempt to obstruct, pursue, and destroy the retreating army of Sherman. Governor Watts, too, of Alabama, whose name had been forced into this Northern list of suppliants for peace, had just (November 17) been delivering his annual message to the Legislature of Alabama reassembled at Montgomery, in which he reasons at great length against all projects of peace negotiations except through the Confederate Government, on the basis of Confederate independence, as fallacies to be discarded, mere illusions of imagination in the South, or plottings at the North for the purposes of a Northern partisan intrigue. The language of Governor Watts is the more worthy of note, that he was, in former party times, a very decided adversary of the Democrat party, and was the candidate, at the last election preceding secession, of the 'Conservative Union' party for Governor of Alabama, against the 'Breckenridge' candidate. A man of that position, of great personal worth, and acknowledged moderation of character, addresses the Legislature on the suggestion of a possible reconstruction of the Union in the following language:—

'A reconstruction with the States from which we deliberately separated in the beginning of this contest! Who among us would advocate or propose it? Who in Alabama, however much he may have been opposed to Alabama's secession, would now, after three years' development of Yankee character and Yankee barbarity and despotism, entertain such a proposition? Who would desire a political union with those who have murdered our sons, outraged our women, and with demoniac malice wantonly destroyed our property, and now seek to make slaves of us? The voices from the graves of 200,000 fallen heroes would blanch the cheeks of the recreant who would propose it. The hoarse shout of 400,000 living heroes now with arms in their hands, fighting for liberty and independence, would forbid it! If attempted by those at home, away from the danger and carnage of battle, the consequence would be fearful. . . . . Let us have faith and confidence that our President and Senate will make every effort for peace a lofty patriotism can demand. Let us nerve ourselves with the courage which fired the hearts of the heroes of 1776; and let us bear with patience and fortitude the trials and the perils which await us, trusting in the justness of our cause—in the strong arms and stout hearts of our soldiers, and relying on God who rules the affairs of men and nations.'

At the very time Governor Watts was addressing these resolute words to the people of Alabama, the telegrams from Washington were busy, with the indirect countenance of the Government, in circulating the report here that he had an agent in search of Sherman begging for peace.

Mr. Foote of Tennessee will, however, keep talking in the Confederate Congress in countenance of impossibilities, by encouraging the idea that the North can be persuaded into peace negotiations, on the basis of State sovereignty, with the consent of the two subsisting Governments. On the 2nd inst. he offered in the Confederate Congress a series of resolutions which, while declaring the exclusive authority of the Confederate Government over the question, and the obligation to support its authority, proposed to invite a convention of the Confederate States for the purpose of appointing commissioners from each to confer with each other and with the Confederate Government on the best means for closing the war on terms 'compatible with the honour, the safety, and the permanent happiness of the Confederate States.' The scheme for adding an extraordinary council to the Executive Department of the Government was laid on the table immediately by a vote of 63 to 13. It seems to have been a party movement against the Administration, rather than any real effort to advance peace negotiations, which are evidently laid aside now by both sides as unattainable.

To-morrow (first Wednesday in December) the electoral colleges will assemble at the several State capitals to cast formally the electoral vote as decided by the elections in November. The majority for Mr. Lincoln is so great in the vote of the colleges, that all interest has been lost over the progression of the legal forms for recording and making it effective. It would have been very different if the Democrats had succeeded in their hope of obtaining for General M'Clellan the certificate of election from a sufficient number of designated States to enable them to go before the people and deny the lawfulness of Mr. Lincoln's election, on the ground that his majority was made up by votes of States unlawfully cast and admitted, or vitiated by violent, unlawful, and arbitrary practices, by which the freedom of choice was destroyed. But with only 21 votes out of 234, the whole plan of operations is frustrated. The moral argument against Mr. Lincoln is very little weakened, because meagre majorities, not exceeding in number one-fourth of the direct stipendiaries in his pay, dependents on his bounty, and subjects to his will as the source of patronage and the absolute chief of the army, have concurred in shutting out of the electoral colleges in some places, by flagrant acts of arbitrary power and the shameless use of his military position, all expressions of the wishes of an apparent minority amounting to not less than two millions of voters. But a success so complete as Mr. Lincoln has won is not to be invalidated as a fraud by arraigning the man and his acts for the special results which can be cited and substantiated as proofs. The vice and the crime penetrates the whole system, and it is the system which must be assailed not less than the man. The Democrats must be suddenly silent, or concede in terms what their whole canvass implied to be in issue in the election—that the Republican theory has failed to correct the worst of evils, or vindicate and reestablish lost principles; and that there is not virtue enough in the people to remove a corrupt Government, nor strength enough to protect themselves and their liberties against a daring and ambitious one.

The course of the Administration in the Florida case is doubtless foreshadowed by the despatch which J. W. Webb, the American Minister in Rio, wrote to the Brazilian Government immediately on being notified officially of the transaction at Bahia. He disavowed, on his own part and the part of his Government, having authorised or approving of the conduct of Captain Collins, and undertook on behalf of Government that 'all reparation which honour and justice exact will be very freely offered.' I cannot doubt that this tender, which, notwithstanding its apparent amplitude, is nicely shaped so as to leave very much to be decided as to what honour and justice do require, will be repeated by Mr. Seward.

Whether Mr. Seward will venture to approve directly, or by silent sanction, the impertinent and insulting terms with which the American Minister at Rio weaves into his note to the Brazilian authorities an elaborate assault upon the English nation and Government, may not so easily be predicted. Mr. Seward himself, in his treatment of the Trent affair, while conceding what was demanded by the British Government, accompanied his concession by a plea, expressed in due terms of courtesy, against the general consistency of England with regard to the points involved, and a subdued protest against the rightfulness of the claim he was allowing. In his correspondence, through Messrs. Adams in London and Dayton in France, he has, moreover, frequently advanced the same line of argument as that so elaborately presented against these Powers, and more particularly against England as the author and prompter, by Mr. Webb at Rio, that the concession of belligerent rights to the Confederate vessels at sea was a hasty step of unfriendliness to the United States not warranted by public law. But Mr. Seward never humiliated his own country quite so deeply as to avow, without reserve, that this recognition was a cause of war, which would have been prosecuted against England, only that she was supported by other great Powers, with whom the United States were unable to cope—in plain terms, that they submitted to wrong only because they were not able to repel it. Nor would Mr. Seward, with all his constitutional hardihood in perverting and suppressing facts, have ventured to declare the Florida a ship constructed in an 'English port' by 'English mechanics' with 'English funds,' 'armed and equipped by Englishmen,' with an 'English crew to navigate and fight,' going out of an 'English' port, with an 'English flag,' to destroy the commerce of a friendly Power, without ever having entered a rebel port. The Florida, all the world knows, left England as a merchantman, without arms or equipments; was stopped in Nassau by the British, and after full investigation there discharged; went from there into the 'rebel' port of Mobile, received her armament, equipments, and commission there, and sailed forth under the Confederate flag. The assertions of Minister Webb are a tissue of falsehoods, clothed in the language of bullying insolence, of insult towards Great Britain, with whom his Government professes to desire to live on terms of amity; and, being addressed in the name of his Government to a third person, seem to require of Mr. Seward some decided mark of his displeasure, unless he is willing to be considered as adopting for the Cabinet at Washington the ruffianism of its representative in Rio. Webb, who came to much discredit two years ago by his attempt to get up a brawl with Mr. Christie, the British resident at Rio, and who doubtless feels the sting of Lord Palmerston's calm disclaimer in the House of Commons of a personal intimacy of which Mr. Webb had boasted, seems to have been eager to seize an opportunity to vent his spiteful animosity upon the English. As specimens of diplomatic correspondence, can there be anything more maladroit than the offensive condescension of Mr. Webb in repeatedly assuring the Brazilian Government that the American Government will deal generously and tenderly with it, because Brazil is weak, and has been duped by more cunning and powerful nations into patronising rebellion and piracy?—or more absurd than the expression of the gasconading wish that the seizure had been made within the waters of England instead of the waters of Brazil; having, in a few paragraphs above this vaunting declaration, lamented that the United States have already submitted to England on this point, because they are not in a condition to resent or resist? We shall see whether there is the manliness and self-respect at Washington to dismiss this impudent braggadocio and marplot.

There have been no discoveries—at least there are none made public—as to the authors of the supposed plot to burn all the hotels ten days ago. The journals in Richmond have heard of the attempt, and heap ridicule on the assumption that it was a rebel plan organised from that city. They do not think the abolitionists too good to have concocted a scheme which they could contrive to make harmless, for the double purpose of firing the Northern heart against the South here, where it has most well-wishers, or at least most generous enemies, and of excusing meditated plans for putting the city under military dictatorship for ulterior purposes. Until there is clear proof to the contrary—which is very slow in forthcoming—many thousands of people here, good Northern men in their ideas of the merits of the rebellion, have ideas on the subject very like those more bluntly expressed in Dixie than they dare express them in this 'free' country, where an unguarded word, offensive to the powers that be, may send the most loyal man to a dungeon.

This letter has grown so long under my hands that there is no room left for any comment upon the military situation. The position in Tennessee and in Georgia is very critical. That in Georgia involves the question whether General Sherman, having discovered how fruitless was the capture of Atlanta, and unable to retain it, will be able to reach the seacoast for the purpose of reorganising a new campaign on another base or suffer a terrible loss. The chances of his escape seem at the last accounts to be inclined in his favour, and the result will of course be heralded as a brilliant achievement, even though it abandoned Georgia and Tennessee to the reoccupation throughout by the Confederates. In Tennessee, the other branch of the same problem is to be worked out before Nashville, to which the Confederates under General Hood have advanced, and where one more success will replace the whole of Tennessee and North Alabama up to the Federal forts which are protected on navigable waters by gunboats, again under the Confederate flag.

LETTER FROM WASHINGTON.

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

WASHINGTON: December 2, 1864.

MILITARY affairs look much more gloomy for the Federal cause than they have for nearly a month past. It was supposed that the Florida difficulty was settled by a complete surrender of the Florida and her crew; an abject apology made by her captor to the Brazilian Government; and a severe reprimand, if not dismissal, of the captain of the Wachusetts. Mr. Lincoln has had no such good luck, nor can he whilst such crazy legislators as now form his cabinet surround him. The Florida, as you have already heard, was sunk by an army transport running into her. With remarkable skill the Administration has managed so far to keep all the particulars of the affair quiet. We only know, and that by mere street rumours, that a storm coming up the Florida was ordered to leave her anchorage near Fortress Monroe, and go to smoother water at Newport's News. She sailed in the night; the accident happened; the people on board were saved; and the Florida sank in fifteen fathoms This is all that is known, and there is a deeply-grounded belief that the whole thing was done by design, as a piece of diplomacy to cut the Gordian knot by getting the Florida out of the way and then making an apology, sufficient atonement for the wrong. The Florida's crew are now in Fort Warren. The greatest anxiety is felt in Washington to see the end of this affair, and a quarrel with England or France appears inevitable. No one seems to care for poor Brazil.

But, bad as is the phase taken by the Florida affair, the appearance of matters in Sherman's department is much worse. I think that the Government will be perfectly satisfied if Sherman manages to reach a point of safety with but half his army. Finding that Grant intends to keep quiet, every energy of the Confederacy has been concentrated for Sherman's defeat. The remarkable skill with which they have managed is just showing itself. Sherman's raid is already defeated, and now the only question is whether he will get off in safety. Hood and Breckinridge have no little part in the great campaign of the South-west. Breckinridge has shown great ability. He defeated Gillem, and all the Federal troops in East Tennessee, so badly that they could neither invade South-western Virginia during his absence, nor leave Knoxville to help the garrison at Nashville. All Gillem could do was to keep quiet at Knoxville. Breckinridge then sent a small force, making a great show, north to Cumberland Gap. At once Burbridge collected every available Federal regiment in Kentucky, and rushed off to that remote corner of the State to defend the Gap. Burbridge was thus prevented from aiding the Federal troops, either at Knoxville or Nashville. As soon as the Confederate force sent to Cumberland Gap was well on its way, Breckinridge with his main body started on a swift march due south into Georgia, to assist in opposing Sherman. He would have to go about 140 miles before reaching Sherman's line of march against Augusta. He started on November 15. By November 28, at the rate at which he would move, he could easily be in position to operate against Sherman.

Hood, too, has done well. It was long thought that he was nowhere within reach of Nashville, and that Forrest led that portion of the Confederate army. But Hood was there, and by his quick movements has shut up Thomas in Nashville; cut off communication with Chattanooga; compelled the abandonment of nearly all the country south of Nashville; and by destroying the railroads has made it impossible for Thomas, even if unmolested, to give any aid to Sherman. These things being secure, Beauregard at an early date began his arrangements for the direct opposition to Sherman. As quickly as possible he loaded his army on the cars at Corinth, Mississippi. He moved the trains to Atlanta by two routes, one through Mobile, the other through Selma. A small force was sent overland by way of Rome to watch the Federal rear. Wheeler, with the advance of the main army from Corinth, reached Macon on November 18. From that time until the 22nd troops were continually arriving, and on that day Beauregard himself reached Macon. Wheeler, with all the forces he could gather, and Howell Cobb and Gustavus Smith, intrenched themselves twenty miles north of Macon. Slocum's Federal column, after an almost uninterrupted progress from Atlanta, was checked by these troops, and Slocum encamped until the 20th, getting his troops up, and apparently not very certain what he would do. Kilpatrick came down with his Federal cavalry to a point twelve miles east of Macon, captured Milledgeville, but made no attempt on Macon. Suddenly Slocum decamped. He moved eastward, and on November 21 began his march towards Howard's column, which had been sent from Atlanta against Augusta. Kilpatrick moved on the same day. He crossed the Oconee, abandoned Milledgeville, and on November 22 he and Slocum were reported thirty miles east of Macon, moving north-east as fast as they could go. A Confederate reconnaissance went on that day to Griffin, thirty miles south of Atlanta, and found no Federal troops; they had all gone east of that line. Macon was safe; every one breathed freely; gold went up; and Beauregard, with all his army, started in pursuit of Slocum. He was following Slocum when last heard from, and harassing his rear.

Equally skilful were the Confederate movements in opposition to Sherman's other column. Howard had gone many miles east from Atlanta on the direct road to Augusta when he was suddenly brought up by a large Confederate force posted in a strongly defended position forty miles west of Augusta. The Confederates had taken care of this part of Sherman's expedition. From Florida, Charleston, Savannah, and Wilmington, large numbers of regulars had been sent to Augusta. General Ewell, it is said, left Lee's army with his corps, and reached Augusta before November 22. Howard halted; the Confederate force in front of him was very strong, and he began at once to intrench. Sherman, seeing the successful opposition made to both his columns, appears to have changed his plan. Instead of hoping to capture Macon and Augusta, he gave up the expeditions against both. Slocum was sent for to march with all possible celerity to reinforce Howard, and there is every indication that Howard has turned aside from his path, and that now Augusta is safe. No effort has been made, so far as is known, to cross the Savannah River, so that Charleston is not the next point that Sherman will hope to reach. Slocum and Howard probably effected a junction about November 30. They then no doubt turned southward to try and get to Savannah. Fatigued, and to a certain extent broken up by the long marches, Sherman's army would then have had but a poor chance of doing anything. Beauregard and Forrest from Macon, Bragg and Ewell from Augusta, would follow him down to the seacoast, and you as easily as I can tell his plight upon reaching it. Sherman's raid has done its worst, and now the only question is whether Sherman can save himself.

Yesterday every one was astonished by a series of magniloquent despatches from Nashville. One of them was signed by General Schofield, one of Thomas's corps commanders, who had been stationed at Franklin, eighteen miles south of Nashville, to oppose Hood. It was in these words:—

'Franklin, Tennessee, November 30.

'To Major-General Thomas.—The enemy made a heavy persistent attack with about two corps, commencing about four o'clock in the afternoon, and lasting until after dark. He was repulsed at all points with very heavy loss, probably 5,000 to 6,000 men. Our loss is probably not more than one-tenth of that number. We captured about 1,000 men, including one brigadier-general.'

This despatch told the old story—'our loss one-tenth the enemy's,' and every statement modified by that unfortunate little word 'about.' So the people patiently waited for the truth, and this morning it has come along. That Hood may have been repulsed in some minor assault I do not doubt, but the result of the whole affair was the driving of the Federal troops out of Franklin, its occupation by Hood, and the retreat of Thomas to Nashville. It is another act in the great drama so rapidly closing to Sherman's defeat. The history of the battle is briefly this. General Thomas had his extreme outpost at Franklin, eighteen miles south of Nashville. For several days he had been collecting all the troops from Kentucky and Tennessee that he could procure, and concentrating them at Nashville. Franklin had a strong garrison, perhaps 15,000 men, under Schofield. On the afternoon of November 30, Hood began his attack. He divided his army into two columns. One was to attack Franklin in front, the other to make a long detour to the eastward and get in the rear. At four o'clock in the afternoon of November 30, Hood attacked Franklin in front. Schofield fought until dark, holding his own, and then ordered a retreat. This retreat was accelerated by hearing of Hood's flanking column, which had crossed the Harpeth River a few miles east of Franklin, and was rapidly advancing on Nashville, driving a Federal cavalry division, commanded by General Wilson, before it. Dark saw the battle over, and Schofield now claims only 3,000 Confederate loss, and the captured Confederate brigadier turns out to have been but a colonel. Schofield's loss is said to have been 750. Future despatches, I have no doubt, will show his loss to have been greater than Hood's. During the night Schofield retreated towards Nashville. Hood entered Franklin. The Confederate column which was pursuing General Wilson on December 1 had driven him to an intrenched position eight miles south of Nashville. Here our accounts close. Thomas was in Nashville. Hood was rapidly bringing up his army and concentrating it eight miles south of the city. It is scarcely probable that Hood will attack Nashville; it is very strongly fortified. He will rather pass his time in completely destroying the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad, which he has already cut, and which is now at his mercy. There are rumours to-day that he has already sent a strong detachment to Murfreesborough, a town on the railroad about thirty-five miles south-east of Nashville, to begin this destruction. Hood is now in a position to do as he pleases, and he may compel the abandonment of Chattanooga, just as his destruction of the Atlanta Railroad caused the evacuation of Atlanta.

All appearances of an advance upon Richmond by Grant have died away. The Dutch Gap Canal is now believed by nearly every one to be a failure. There is a great state of uncertainty as to what will be done in the Federal camp, Grant's own forces believing that he is concentrating troops on the north bank of the James to make an attack in that direction, and the Confederates believing that Grant is sending large bodies of men to his extreme southern flank on the Weldon Railroad, in order to make a new attempt to capture the Southside Railroad. All these reports, however, seem to have no foundation, and the only serious occupation of Grant's troops probably is the preparation of winter quarters. General John Pope is now at City Point, and it is said he is to have command of the army corps recently given up by Hancock. If Lincoln or Grant have any sense, however, after the woful experience they have had of John Pope, they will do no such foolish thing as this. Roger A. Pryor is now in Fort Lafayette, New York. His capture was made most unfairly; but, even if it was fairly done, there is no reason why he should be treated differently from the other Confederate prisoners.

You have doubtless heard of a Confederate attack upon New Creek and Piedmont, two stations on the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, about 100 miles west of Harper's Ferry. The telegraph, as is usual in such cases, made out that the raid was but a trifling affair, and the Confederates were driven off with great slaughter. The truth about this has at length come out. The Confederates lost scarcely any one, and carried off with them 300 Federal prisoners and six or seven cannon, besides a large amount of plunder. The telegraph has become such a medium of lies that no one believes it any longer. The battle at Franklin, Tennessee, and this one at Piedmont and New Creek, are but two instances of the kind of news we daily receive. There is nothing doing in the Shenandoah Valley, and no change is reported in the position of the opposing armies. Near Washington the guerillas are acting as they choose. Two nights ago they came within six miles of Alexandria and captured some Federal officers.

From Louisiana is the only crumb of comfort the Federal authorities have had for a week. They, of course, make the most of it, and the newspapers have gone mad with sensational headings. I send it to you just as they have it, sure that, after the long recital of misfortunes, this gleam of hope will be allowed them. A cavalry expedition returned to Baton Rouge on November 22, with 200 Confederate prisoners, 700 horses and mules, and three cannon. The horses and mules were all ridden by contrabands, who, for all time to come, will have to be fed by the United States. This is the grand redeeming stroke which has made the 'loyal' heart glad, though even it, like the New Creek and Franklin affairs, may, in the light of subsequent details, take quite a different phase.

P.S. As I close this evening, the truth about the battle at Franklin, Tennessee, is being rapidly unfolded. There is nothing more said about captures and victories. It is all a story of fright at Nashville. Thomas and Schofield and all the Federal armies have retreated within the intrenchments of Nashville. The citizens and the huge army of Government labourers are under arms. These labourers are said to number at least 25,000, and their barracks form a town as large as Nashville itself. The Federal troops are drawn up in battle array three miles south of Nashville. Hood's army has advanced to within five miles, and heavy skirmishing is going on in the space between. Every one fears the capture of Nashville. I scarcely believe, however, that Hood will try an assault on an intrenched town, but that he will destroy the Atlanta and Chattanooga Railroad.

It is now certain that Sherman has abandoned all idea of capturing Augusta. Our latest Southern news is that he is on the march to the seacoast. There is a report that Burnside, at the head of 20,000 men, has sailed from Fortress Monroe to join him.

AFFAIRS FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

WEDNESDAY EVENING.

MONEY AND DISCOUNT MARKET.

THE money market is in a disturbed state, through the conclusion of transactions for the end of the year. In every direction the rate has worked up to 6 per cent., the official minimum, and hardly any engagements are completed below that quotation. It appears that the value of money will rule at this point for some little time to come, and that the public are not looking immediately for cheaper terms. Six per cent., for the present, is quite low enough, as it will permit the introduction of new loans and new projects. At the commencement of 1865, the state of affairs may allow of a reduction to 5 per cent., and if this shall be the case, there will, no doubt, be an endeavour to stimulate fresh enterprise. The markets for securities indicate most unmistakably the arrival of the season for recreation and holiday-making. Next week will be a very broken week—short hours, and as much leave to employés as possible. So the end of 1864 will wear out, and we shall be prepared for fresh activity in the spring. Saturday and Monday will be almost close holidays, but ordinary banking and finance must be attended to. The lowest rate for six months' bills is 6½ per cent. Money has been 'tight' at the Stock Exchange, in consequence of the withdrawals of loans to supply the demand in the discount market, and the effect has been to keep the terms for accommodation there up to 6½ and 6 per cent.

BULLION AND SPECIE MOVEMENTS.

There is no particular variation to notice in the state of the bullion market, but its position continues favourable. Notwithstanding that occasional parcels of gold are taken from the Bank, the total this week has not been large, and the balance is in favour of the Bank, the amount sent in being 162,000*l.*, and the withdrawals 99,000*l.* The arrivals of specie have not been large, only 147,160*l.*, all being from New York. The West Indian mail, which sailed this week, took out 14,500*l.* in gold from the London and Venezuela Bank for Caraccas; and the shipments of the precious metals to the East by the French steamer which left Marseilles on Monday amounted to no less than 662,514*l.*, viz. 454,874*l.* for Alexandria, and 207,640*l.* to India and China. Some apprehension is now felt for the safety of the ship J. E. H., from Melbourne, with 44,000*l.* on board; she left early in July, and has not since been heard of. Insurances upon her are now being effected at 50 guineas premium. The only other vessels known to be out are the Essex, with 84,500*l.*, out 82 days; and the Monarch, with 104,000*l.*, out 59 days. The silver market has not been particularly active; some bar silver has been disposed of at previous rates, viz. 61⅝*d.* per oz., and a limited amount of Mexican dollars has also been taken for China at 60¾*d.* per oz.

HOME AND FOREIGN SECURITIES.

Notwithstanding the reduction in the rate of discount on Thursday last, all the Stock Exchange markets have been very dull, with only a moderate amount of business doing, but this is to be attributed in a great degree to the near approach of the Christmas holidays and the termination of the year. And as the Stock Exchange will be closed on Saturday and on Monday next, it is not at all likely there will be much business doing till after the turn of the new year. As compared with last week there has been a decline in Consols of about ¼ per cent., but Exchequer bills have slightly improved. In foreign stocks business has also been far from active, and prices have only triflingly varied even in those descriptions most sensitive to political influences. The chief variation has been in Greek, which has improved ⅜ per cent. Mexican have declined ⅛, and Spanish about ⅛, but there has been a small advance in Turkish. The closing quotations this evening were:—Consols, for money 89 to 89⅛ ex div., and for the account 89¼ to 89⅜ ex div.; Exchequer bills, 4*s.* dis. to par; Greek, 23 to 23¼; Mexican, 29⅛ to 29⅜; Spanish Passives, 31½ to 31¾; do. Certificates, 13⅞ to 14⅛; Turkish Six per Cents. of 1854, 88 to 90; and the Four per Cents. 99 to 101.

AMERICAN SECURITIES.

The market for American Government and Railway securities still continues very inactive. There is no speculative movement in them whatever, but nevertheless prices continue fairly supported, though the tendency is, if anything, towards a decline. The official dealings are thus recorded:—United States Six per Cents., 1882, at 41⅞; Atlantic and Great Western Railway, New York Section, first mortgage, at 71¾, 72, 71½ and 72; ditto ditto, Pennsylvania ditto, first mortgage, at 71½ and 72; Erie, $100 shares, all paid, at 38¾, 38½, 39 and 38; Illinois Central Six per Cents. 1875, at 74; and ditto ditto, $100 shares, all paid, at 51, 51½, 52, 51¾ and 50½.

CONFEDERATE COTTON LOAN.

The market is steady, but, like all stocks this week, quiet on the approach of the Christmas holidays. We quote the price, 61 to 63.

IMPORTS FROM THE CONFEDERATE STATES.

The following table, extracted from the Customs Bill of Entry, is a statement of part of the imports of Southern cotton into England since our last number:—

MERCANTILE SUSPENSIONS.

The following suspensions have taken place since our last number:—Messrs. Berger & Co., in the metal trade; Messrs. J. M. Stanley & Co., of Sheffield, liabilities about 40,000*l.*; Mr. Humphrey Turner, of the Cardigan Works, Sheffield, who offers 10*s.* in the pound, liabilities about 38,000*l.*; Messrs. Clayton & Rorke, crinoline and steel manufacturers, of Sheffield, liabilities 8,000*l.*; Messrs. Burgen and Wells, iron and steel trade, of Sheffield, liabilities 18,109*l.*, assets 11,915*l.*

THE COURSE OF THE PRODUCE MARKETS.

The produce transactions for the most part are upon the limited scale usual on the approach of the Christmas holidays, with which the trading operations of the year are virtually closed. In a few exceptional articles called into requisition by Christmas consumption, business is temporarily brisk, but generally the desire is to curtail operations as much as possible, and to defer the opening of fresh engagements for the opening of the new year. The operations since our last have consequently been small, with very little variation in prices. The provision trade has been among the few exceptions where transactions have increased. Fine butters of all imports meet a tolerably brisk sale, American ranging up to 116*s.*, and Friesland to 128*s.* per cwt. Bacon sides are also in good demand, but in American there is very little doing, from want of supplies. For barrel middles there is not much enquiry. Small hams sell freely, but heavier sorts are not wanted. Lard is firmly held, but trade is anything but brisk. Cheese has been in good demand, and the best dairies of American have realised 56*s.* to 60*s.* per cwt. The sugar market is less active, and prices are barely so firm, although no actual decline can be quoted. Coffee is steady in value, but without much activity; the deliveries, however, continue very satisfactory, and holders have confidence in the general position of the market. In tea there has been no movement worth naming, and rates are nominally unaltered. Rice is well held, Bengal kinds more especially, in consequence of the small supplies here. Spices are for the most part steady; pepper is rather firmer. The only exception is in Bengal ginger, which, at 35*s.* 6*d.* per cwt., is 3*s.* lower. The grain markets continue generally dull, and for wheat prices rather favour buyers. American flour is in moderate supply, and maintains its value. Petroleum continues in steady demand at 2*s.* 1*d.* to 2*s.* 1½*d.* for American refined. Linseed oil is obtainable at 33*s.* to 33*s.* 3*d.* Palm oil still offers at 36*s.* for fine Lagos. Rape maintains the advanced price of 46*s.* 6*d.* to 47*s.* for foreign refined, and 43*s.* for brown. Cotton, since the receipt of the President's Message, has advanced ½*d.* to 1*d.* per lb. Jute sells slowly, but is not quotably lower. Dye goods in general are firm. Cochineal has again advanced 1*d.* per lb. on Teneriffee grain, and Bengal turmeric is held for enhanced rates. The metal market continues depressed. Scotch pig iron has declined to 50*s.*; spelter to 19*l.*; Straits tin to 87*l.* to 88*l.*; and Banca to 90*l.* to 91*l.* per ton.

LIVERPOOL: Wednesday, December 21.—Business in the cotton market, as is usual at this period of the year, has not been very active. There has, however, been a moderate demand, but rather considerable parcels having been pressed on the market, prices at one period exhibited a declining tendency, but within the last day or two there has been rather more doing, and quotations are a shade firmer. The late reduction in the value of money has created a better feeling, and caused some additional purchases to be made on speculation and for export. The chief demand has been for American and Egyptian, at an advance in prices. The sales this week have reached 63,000 bales, of which 28,000 were on speculation and for export. The total sales this year have been 2,660,874 bales, and to the corresponding period in 1863, 2,553,849 bales. There have been imported this year 2,203,617 bales; whilst last year the number was 1,592,161 bales. The trade have taken this year 1,572,872 bales, and to the same period in 1863, 1,237,536 bales. The exports this year have been 542,014 bales, last year they were 458,126 bales. There have been taken on speculation this year 538,898 bales, and in 1863 the number was 744,882. The estimated stocks at the present time are 376,214 bales, last year they were 236,342 bales. The closing quotations this afternoon were:— American descriptions, 23¾*d.* to 27¾*d.*; Pernambuco, 25½*d.* to 27½*d.*; Maranham, 27*d.* to 27¾*d.*; Maceio, 25¾*d.* to 26*d.*; Bahia, 25¾*d.* to 26*d.*; Egyptian, 16¼*d.* to 29¾*d.*; Smyrna, 20¾*d.* to 21*d.*; Surats, 12¼*d.* to 22¾*d.*; Madras, 15½*d.* to 15¾*d.*; Bengal, 17¾*d.* to 18¼*d.*; Scinde, 12¼*d.* to 13*d.*; China, 15¼*d.* to 16¼*d.*; and Japan, 18*d.*

The markets at Manchester, which had been very dull in the early part of the week, became much more animated and stronger on Monday, on the contents of President Lincoln's message becoming known; the policy indicated therein giving an impetus to both cotton and yarn, inasmuch as all idea of immediate peace is abandoned. Shipping yarns have been in considerable demand within the last two or three days, and buyers are now compelled to pay an advance of ½*d.* to 1*d.* per lb. on the quotations of last week. Yarns are at present very scarce, as spinners will only work to order; consequently, when any demand takes place, prices immediately advance. For home-trade yarns, the market has also recently been more active, at an advance of from ½*d.* to 1*d.* per lb., and a much larger business would have been transacted but for the high prices demanded. The cloth market has also been rather active, with considerable firmness in prices. The latest telegrams from India, although of a more favourable character, have not had the effect of improving business, few offers having in consequence been made, and scarcely any for large quantities. Manufacturers, however, have raised their prices to, in some instances, a considerable extent; but they have not been readily responded to. THERE are at this time many thousands of Confederate prisoners of war confined in the various forts and camps of the Northern States. A large proportion of them are wounded or sick, and all are in a state of destitution, the accounts of which, as given in private letters and in the newspapers, present a picture of human suffering, which has scarcely a parallel in modern times. The merest necessaries of life are wanting, and frequently the wounded prisoner has no raiment save that which is stark and stiffened with his clotted blood. Horrible as war is in all its features, assuredly it has no greater horrors than the long agony of the poor captive who, when the feverish excitement of the contest is over, is left to the bitter charity of strangers and foes, without one friendly hand to soothe the pains of body or friendly voice to whisper hope and comfort to his despairing mind. These men, cut off from the assistance of their kindred or the protection of their Government, have peculiar claims on the patriotism of their countrymen in Europe, and upon Christian benevolence everywhere. They did not recklessly or from choice embrace the profession of arms, but in exchanging the comforts, and often the luxuries, of home for the toils and hardships of a soldier's life, they obeyed a stern sense of duty and the call of their country in its extremest need. An unusual proportion, also, of those that fill the ranks of the Confederate armies belong to the higher walks of life, upon whom privations, such as are endured by prisoners in the hands of the North, fall with increased severity.

The Southern Prisoners' Relief Fund is intended to mitigate some of these sufferings which cannot altogether be relieved. Within little more than a twelvemonth, nearly £4,000 have been collected and expended in relief. The managers of the Fund are assisted in their efforts by self-devoted ladies in the principal Northern cities, who visit the sufferers and give them such aid as the means at their disposal render possible. Of late the Federal Government has granted permission that this Samaritan work may be done openly. It is earnestly hoped that all Southerners residing in Europe will support the Fund to the extent of their ability, and its objects may recommend themselves to all, irrespective of country or political convictions, who sympathise with the sufferings of their fellow-men.

Contributions will be received by J. H. ASHBRIDGE, Treasurer, Walmer Buildings, Water Street, Liverpool; or in London, by HENRY HOPE, Esq., 17 Savile Row, W.; in Paris, by H. O. BREWER, Esq., 6 Rue Circulaire; and DANIEL HUBBARD, Esq., 24 Rue Lord Byron.

Confederate Cruisers.

WE are authorised to publish the following Despatch of the Secretary of State at Richmond to the Secretary of the Navy:—

Department of State, Richmond:
September 8, 1864.

Hon. S. R. Mallory, Secretary of the Navy.

Sir,—I have the honour to acknowledge receipt of the following papers communicated by you to this Department on the 22nd ult. under the instructions of the President.

Confidential communication to be made to the officer in command of the 'Florida,' a vessel of war of the so-styled Confederate States.

First: That my attention having been drawn to the circumstance of the Martaban, a vessel with a British register and papers, having been burned at sea by the Alabama, I have issued the following instructions to the officers under my command.

To capture and send to England for adjudication in the Admiralty Court every vessel by which a British vessel (i.e. with legal British papers) is burned at sea.

You are further to acquaint him that, the right or otherwise of the Alabama to burn the Martaban being not altogether free from doubt, I referred the question on the 2nd of May last for instructions, which leads me to expect a reply by the next mail. Should a view different from that which I have found it my duty to take of the question be arrived at by my superiors, I shall not fail to communicate it to him with the least possible delay, should the Florida still be on the station under my command.

Second: That under these circumstances it will be very satisfactory to me, if he can find it consistent with his duty, to give you a written assurance of his intention to forbear from any act of the like description until he has received special instructions in regard to this question from his Government, and that I shall be obliged by his communicating the tenor of such instructions to me by the earliest opportunity which he finds convenient.

Third: That the view I take of the question, and which I submit for his serious consideration, is as follows:—

1st. That a belligerent has the right to burn the vessel of an enemy at sea.

2nd. That a belligerent has the right to capture and to send a neutral for adjudication in an Admiralty Court, but in no case to burn her at sea prior to condemnation; and that, if circumstances do not admit of his sending her in for adjudication in an Admiralty Court, then she should be dismissed.

Fourth: That the care with which officers in command of Confederate vessels of war have hitherto avoided giving just cause of offence to neutrals induces me to indulge in the belief that he will avoid any act which may produce consequences which would be matter of much regret alike to me and to my superiors; and that I beg to call his attention to the annexed opinion of Lord Stowell on this question, which I incline to think will find acceptance with the British Government.

J. HOPE, Vice-Admiral.

The paper annexed to the foregoing communication is in the following words:—

Opinion of Lord Stowell on Capture and its incidents.

'Upon the surrender of a vessel under an enemy's flag on the high seas, a belligerent may destroy her under the general law of nations; and if a captor is unable to bring her into port, he will be justified towards his own Government in destroying her. The instructions of his own Government may, indeed, require him to bring into port every capture which he may make, but he may be actually engaged on a service which will not allow him to put a prize-crew on board the vessel which he has captured, in order that she may be taken into port. Under such a collision of duties, Lord Stowell has held that nothing is left to the belligerent vessel but to destroy the enemy's vessel which he has taken; for she cannot, consistently with her general duty to her own country, or, indeed, under its express injunctions, permit enemy's property to sail away unmolested. If it should be impossible to bring her in, her next duty is to destroy the enemy's property. When it is doubtful whether it is enemy's property, and it is impossible to bring it in, no such obligation arises, and the safe and proper course is to dismiss. When it is neutral, the act of destruction cannot be justified to the neutral owner by the gravest importance of such an act to the captor's own State. To the neutral it can only be justified, under any circumstances, by a full restitution in value.'—Law of Nations, Dr. Twiss, 1863.

Remark.—It is to be observed that, should the Confederate States fail in establishing their independence, then the above-named restitution in value would be impossible.

I hold this consideration to be an imperative obligation for forbearance on the part of the belligerent and the dismissal of the neutral vessel.

J. HOPE, Vice-Admiral.

The answer of Lieutenant-Commanding Morris to the foregoing communication is as follows:—

C. S. steamer Florida,
St. George's, Bermuda, June 20, 1864.

Sir,—Having considered the confidential communication of Sir James Hope, I have no hesitation in assuring you that it has been, and is now, my intention to allow all neutral vessels (i.e. vessels producing legal papers) to pass, and that such are my instructions from my Government.

I am, Sir, respectfully, your obedient servant,
C. M. MORRIS, Lieutenant-Commanding.

J. W. Ashley, Esq., R.N.

After conference with the President, it has been deemed unnecessary to make extended comment on the paper signed by the Vice-Admiral, for the reason that it was evidently hazarded with distrust, until instructions could be obtained from his superiors. It can scarcely be assumed by us as possible that the British Government will concur in opinion with the distinguished naval officer that British Admiralty Courts have jurisdiction over the ships of war of a foreign Government with which Great Britain is at peace; or that the rights of this Government, as an acknowledged belligerent, can be affected by the fact that Great Britain has not chosen to recognise the independence of the Confederacy; or that the proper course for a professedly neutral nation, when complaining of alleged aggressions on its neutral commerce, is to commence hostilities on the high seas against one belligerent on the first occasion for complaint and without previous remonstrance or demand for redress, while remaining passive as to the other belligerent, after three years of constant and unavailing remonstrances against hundreds of outrages and aggressions.

The purpose of the President in requesting that the papers should be referred to this Department was to obtain for the guidance of the naval officers in command of our cruisers such further and fuller instructions for the discharge of their duties as the experience of the war has shown to be necessary. These instructions I have now the honour to forward to you for transmission to your subordinates.

Minute of Instructions.

The cases which occur for decision by our cruisers may be classified as follows:—

A. A vessel under enemy's flag without cargo, or with cargo, belonging exclusively to enemy.

B. A vessel under enemy's flag with cargo, wholly or in part belonging to neutrals.

C. A vessel really neutral with cargo wholly or in part belonging to the enemy.

D. A vessel ostensibly neutral, but really hostile, fraudulently placed under a neutral flag and furnished with fraudulent papers as a cover to protect her from capture.

A. The right of our cruisers to capture enemy's property on the high seas is of course unquestioned. No condemnation by an Admiralty Court is necessary to vest title to such property in this Government. The capture itself gives instant title to the captors. The property so captured should in all cases be at once destroyed if it be not in the power of the captors to dispose of it otherwise for the benefit of the Confederacy. Enemy's vessels thus captured may be armed by the captors and placed under command of any commissioned officer of the Confederate States, and used either as tenders to the captors or detached as independent cruisers. Such vessels, so armed and commanded, are as fully entitled to the rights of national armed vessels as if built and equipped in our own waters. On this point it may be proper to observe that the British Government, after violating this principle of public law by the seizure of the Tuscaloosa at the Cape of Good Hope, is understood to have admitted its error, and although it has not yet tendered us the satisfaction due for so violent an aggression on our rights, it published on the 2nd of June last instructions relative to the treatment of prizes captured by either belligerent; and while refusing them permission to enter British ports, makes an express exception in favour of 'a vessel which shall have been actually and bonâ fide converted into, and used as, a public vessel of war.'

B. A vessel under enemy's flag with cargo wholly or in part belonging to neutrals:—

Under ordinary circumstances this case would present no embarrassment. The captured vessel would be taken into a port of the captors, or of a neutral country; the portion of the cargo belonging to the neutral would be delivered to the owners, and the vessel, with such portion of the cargo as belonged to the enemy, would be condemned as prize.

The action of neutral governments has placed serious obstacles in the way of doing justice to their own people. They have closed their ports to the admission of captured vessels, and have thus rendered it impossible to make delivery in their own ports of the property of their own subjects found on board of the vessels of our enemies; while it would be exposing those vessels to almost certain recapture to attempt to bring them into our ports, for the captured vessels are almost invariably sailing vessels, and the enemy's cruisers off our ports are steamers. In most instances heretofore it has been found practicable to reconcile to a certain extent the exercise of our own just rights as belligerents with a due regard for the claims of neutrals, by allowing the vessels of the enemy when partially laden with neutral goods to be relieved on ransom bonds. But it is obvious that this is a mode rather of eluding than of solving the difficulty, and that we cannot allow to be established as a rule that our enemies may cover their shipping from capture during the war, by simply carrying neutral goods as a part of their cargo. If, for instance, Great Britain will not permit a captured enemy's vessel to be carried into one of her ports for the purpose of their delivering to a British subject his goods found on board, she would certainly have no just ground of complaint that the goods were not restored to their owner. If, therefore, on the renewed representations we are about to make, we find neutral nations persist in refusing to receive the property of their subjects in their own ports, when captured by us on enemy's vessels, it will become necessary to instruct our cruisers to destroy such property whenever they are unable to bring the prize into our ports. In the meantime it is deemed proper, as evidence of that respect for the rights of others, which has been so seldom extended towards us in this war, that the commanders of our national cruisers should be instructed to continue their former practice of allowing the enemy to ransom his vessel in cases where the neutral property on board is of large value or bears any considerable proportion to that of the enemy; but if a ransom bond is refused, or if the proportion of neutral property on board is small compared with the value of the vessel and hostile cargo, the whole should be destroyed, whenever the prize cannot be brought into a port of our own or of a neutral country.

C. A vessel really neutral, with cargo wholly or in part belonging to the enemy.

Under the law of nations as established prior to the year 1856, such a vessel would have been liable to capture, for the purpose of being brought into port, when the hostile cargo would be condemned as prize, and the neutral vessel and the neutral portion of the cargo would be liberated.

By the Paris Declaration of 1856 it was declared that 'the neutral flag covers enemy's goods, with the exception of contraband of war;' and this rule was adopted by th resolutions of Congress of August 13, 1861.

In the President's Message to Congress on December 7, 1863, he pointed out that this concession of belligerent rights in favour of neutrals had been made by the Confederacy in return for an obligation entered into by Great Britain and France, that they would comply with the rule of international law on the subject of blockades—also laid down in the Declaration of Paris—that both these Powers had failed to fulfil their promise, and that the Confederacy was thereby released from its obligations towards them. But the President at the same time declared that the principles established by the Paris Convention were 'more just, more humane, more consonant with modern civilisation than those belligerent pretensions which great naval powers have hitherto sought to introduce into the maritime code.' He announced, therefore, that it was the policy of this Government to forego its right to retract the assent previously given to this rule of maritime law.

The cruisers of the Confederacy will, therefore, allow vessels of neutrals to pass free, unless laden with contraband of war destined for the enemy's ports. When such vessels are found to be laden with goods contraband of war, the contraband goods, if not the property of the owner of the vessel, are to be taken out, if practicable, and transhipped or destroyed, and she is to be allowed to continue her voyage. But if the owner of the vessel has put on board contraband goods belonging to himself, destined for the enemy's country, he thereby forfeits the neutral character, and the ship is to be considered an enemy's vessel, and to be dealt with as such. No conflict with neutral Powers on this subject is to be apprehended, as they have with entire unanimity issued proclamations forbidding their subjects during the present war from engaging in contraband trade, under penalty of forfeiture of national protection.

D. A vessel ostensibly neutral, but really hostile, fraudulently placed under neutral flag and furnished with fraudulent papers to protect her from capture:—

Whenever, upon the seizure of such a vessel, she is admitted by those in command to belong to the enemy, and her neutral flag and papers are admitted to be a mere cover, there can be no difficulty in dealing with such a vessel as though sailing under an enemy's flag.

The embarrassment in actual practice may be considered as occurring almost exclusively in cases where an enemy's vessel has been since the commencement of the present war transferred to neutrals. The law of nations on the subject of the right of a belligerent to make legal sale to neutrals flagrante bello is not settled by universal concurrence. Great Britain and the United States maintain the validity of such sales when bonâ fide, while France and Russia, and perhaps other European continental Powers, hold that belligerent vessels sold to a neutral subsequent to the declaration of war are good prizes to the other belligerent, although bearing the neutral flag. The rule established in the United States was adopted prior to the secession of the Confederate States, and may be assumed to be binding on us until otherwise established by Congress.

Our cruisers ought therefore to be instructed that where a vessel of the United States has been sold in good faith to a neutral since the commencement of the war, and where the title is so absolutely transferred as to divest the enemy of any future interest in the vessel, she is free from capture. If, however, any enemy's interest in the vessel remain, if she be mortgaged or hypothecated to the enemy, she is as much liable to be dealt with as a hostile vessel as though no transfer to the neutral had been made.

Appended hereto is a list of the enemy's vessels transferred to neutrals since the beginning of the war, and known to be mortgaged to the enemy by the ostensible neutral owners. These and all other vessels in like condition are liable to capture by our cruisers as good prize of war.

It frequently occurs, however, that a belligerent makes simulated sales of vessels to neutrals with the view of protecting them from capture, and, under ordinary circumstances, when the other belligerent has reason to suspect the good faith of the transfer, the suspected vessel is brought into Court for adjudication by the Admiralty.

This course is now not open to our cruisers for the reasons above explained, and the only instructions, therefore, practically applicable, under the circumstances, are the following:—

The captor should in every case make rigid examination of the papers and documents of every vessel sailing under a neutral flag known to have belonged to the enemy at the commencement of the war.

He should take into consideration the nature of the trade in which the vessel is engaged, the national character of the master, the papers found on board, the place at which the alleged sale to the neutral took effect by delivery of the vessel, and every other circumstance tending to establish the true nature of the transfer, and to satisfy his mind whether the vessel be really neutral or merely disguised as such.

If the captured vessel has double sets of papers, or if papers have been destroyed, or subducted by her master during the chase, or if she has continued in the same course of trade and under the same master since the alleged sale to the neutral, it may be safely concluded that the property is still hostile and covered by fraudulent use of neutral flag.

In these and all other cases, when there is great and decided preponderance of evidence to show that the vessel is really enemy's property, the cruiser must act on his conviction and treat her as such, leaving to his Government the responsibility of satisfying any neutral claim for her value.

But whenever the evidence leaves serious doubt as to the true character of the transfer, it will be proper rather to dismiss the vessel if she cannot be brought into port, than to exercise a harsh and doubtful belligerent right.

There is reason to hope, however, that most of the embarrassment existing on this branch of the subject will soon be ended by a modification of the orders of the British Government, which will permit justice to be done to its own subjects. The attempt to cover the enemy's vessels from capture by the fraudulent use of neutral papers has been made almost exclusively by collusion between the enemy and British subjects. This has gone to such an extent that such vessels are familiarly termed by British naval officers 'white-washed.' In the report by Commander Wood of his interview with Vice-Admiral Hope in the harbour of Halifax, we are informed that the British officer enquired what were the instructions in the case of vessels which had recently changed flags or were 'white-washed;' that Commander Wood answered that 'unless the papers were clearly fraudulent he would let the vessel go;' that Vice-Admiral Hope then enquired if Commander Wood had seen his communication to Captain Morris of the Florida, and said that 'his Government required that in all such cases the vessel should be brought into an English port to have the case decided on or adjudicated.' Commander Wood is not certain whether the word 'decided' or 'adjudicated' was used.

If the British Government has, in the interests of its own subjects, become sensible of the impropriety and impolicy of shutting its ports to the introduction of prizes made by our vessels in all cases in which British claimants assert title to vessel or cargo, the instruction will be given to our cruisers to take into British ports all such vessels, there to remain until our Admiralty Courts have exercised their rightful exclusive jurisdiction over the prize questions involved in such captures. We have for the present no further information on this subject than the loose conversation above referred to, and this cannot be made the basis of action by our cruisers.

I have the honour to be, Sir,
Very respectfully,
Your obedient servant,
J. P. BENJAMIN,
Secretary of State.

Notes on Events of the Week.

AMERICA.

THE news from America per the Hansa is decidedly interesting, but exactly of that character which the less sensational of the New York press would call 'important—if true.' That it is reliable in its details, our experience with Federal war-bulletins forbids us to believe: and as to its principal features—the capture of Savannah with 11,000 prisoners—letters and papers received by this very same Hansa leave but little doubt that the report is simply a canard. The next steamer will doubtless bring the contradiction—the usual sequel to 'news' per the Bremen line of steamships. This report of the capture of Savannah is satisfactorily disposed of by our New York and Washington correspondents. The reported fall of Savannah rests simply upon the authority of a 'messenger' who came passenger on the Federal transport Varuna, which arrived at Annapolis on the 16th. The Varuna left Charleston on the 13th, and the 'messenger' reports 'that when coming out of the harbour, and when too late to communicate by signals, the whole fleet began to fire a salute. . . . . And the vessels were being gaily decorated with flags in honour of some great victory.' It was 'too late to communicate by signals,' and yet this keen-eyed Yankee messenger could see that the fleet was 'being gaily decorated with flags,' which event his Federal logic concluded was in honour of some great victory; and as he had satisfied himself it was in honour of some great victory, that 'victory' surely must be the capture of Savannah and 11,000 prisoners. But the Richmond Examiner of the 14th says that, 'up to yesterday forenoon (13th), no fighting had taken place between Sherman's army and the Confederate troops in the defence of Savannah.' The Examiner adds that the city was not even invested, and that 'we have no evidence that it stands in the least danger, either from assault or siege.'

According to the advices by this arrival, scouts from General Howard, who commands Sherman's right wing, arrived at Port Royal on the 12th, announcing the presence of the entire Federal army near Savannah. On Wednesday, the 14th, Sherman attacked and carried by storm Fort M'Allister, on the east bank of the Ogeechee, fifteen miles south-west of Savannah, near Ossabaw Sound. He had crossed to the east of the Ogeechee on the 10th, near Bloomingdale, some twelve miles from Savannah. The fall of M'Allister, it is said, puts the Federal commander in communication with the fleet, but this remains to be seen, as there are other forts higher up the river. M'Allister was merely an earthwork, but feebly garrisoned, and was erected only for the defence of the river against the Federal fleet, a service it did most effectively when attacked by the monitors in the spring of last year.

Sherman's present position is not so favourable for an attack upon Savannah as that to the north or west, both of which he has abandoned: and the fact that he has abandoned those positions must be attributed to the exhausted condition of his army and the consequent imperative necessity for him to seek to open communication with the fleet. From the Lower Ogeechee to Savannah is almost an unbroken stretch of swamp and creeks, very much of the character of the Delta of the Mississippi. If the necessary works have been erected, the city can be much more easily defended against an attack from the direction of the present Federal position than from almost any other. Should Sherman advance from the lower line of the Ogeechee, one of the battle-fields of the first revolution—the one in which the gallant Pulaski gave up his life to freedom's cause—is likely to be fought over again. That would be history repeating itself, truly. We incline to think that Sherman will wait for the cooperation of the fleet in an attack upon the river defences of the city, and the cooperating force will be, it is not unlikely, the expedition which recently sailed from Fortress Monroe under Butler and Porter.

GENERAL FOSTER has made another unsuccessful attempt to cut the Savannah and Charleston Railroad. Federal newspaper accounts claim that he effected a lodgment near the road and mounted guns in position to command the railway bridges over the Tullifinny and Coosawatchie; but the Southern papers assert that he was driven back to his gunboats after burning a bridge over the Tullifinny. The railway being still intact, leaves the Confederates an incalculable advantage in the ready concentration of troops. Beauregard, Hardee, Taylor, Bragg, Gustavus Smith, and other prominent Confederate generals, were at Savannah, or within easy striking distance of that city. Now that Sherman has developed his position, and that Savannah is really the threatened point, all the outlying Confederate columns that have hitherto been awaiting this 'development' can be hurried to the city by river and rail—down the Savannah or by railway to Charleston, and thence to the scene of danger.

IF we may credit the Federal accounts from Tennessee, there has been severe fighting between Thomas and Hood. On the 15th, Thomas says, he 'attacked Hood's left and drove it,' capturing guns and prisoners, and, renewing the attack on the following day, had driven Hood from all his intrenchments, and captured from 3,000 to 4,000 prisoners, and 30 to 40 cannon. When we have the other side of the story we shall not be surprised to hear that General Hood had voluntarily retired from his position in front of Nashville—possibly to effect a junction with General Breckinridge—and that the prisoners will be reduced in number to a few hundred stragglers, and the guns to a few pieces left in the Confederate trenches. General Canby reports the success of an expedition sent to cut General Hood's communications with Mobile. The expedition cut the Mississippi Central Railroad (to what extent is not stated); but the cutting of this road no more destroys Hood's communications with Mobile than would the cutting of the Illinois Central.

RICHMOND papers report a raid by General Stoneman on the East Tennessee and Virginia Railroad. They admit the capture of Bristol, Glade Springs, and Abringdon, but there is no confirmation of the capture of Saltville and the burning of the bridge over the Holston River, as stated in the Federal despatches.

BY way of New Orleans, we learn from the correspondence of the Associated Press—undoubted Federal authority—that Price claims to have accomplished all he intended in Missouri, and returned at his leisure with immense stores.

THE truth about the expedition of General Warren has come to light. Never was an enterprise more sedulously prepared, never was success more confidently anticipated. If numbers, material, and munitions could win victories, then was the success of Warren assured. He was, however, overcome by two obstacles—the foresight of General Lee and the gallantry of the Confederate soldiers. The movement, which was commenced on the 7th inst., was made by the whole of the 5th Corps, the third division of Hancock's corps, and General Gregg's cavalry, the whole somewhat over 20,000 strong. The column was provided with an amount of stores suitable for a long march, with a drove of oxen destined to supply the soldiers with fresh meat. The object of the expedition was to establish a new base at a point which would deprive General Lee of the use of the Petersburg and Weldon Railroad. If Weldon were reached, supplies could be obtained by the Roanoke River, or by rebuilding the Suffolk Railroad. Probably also it was thought that such an effort would necessitate such a movement on the part of General Lee as would weaken the defence of Richmond. However, General Lee was not to be outmanœuvred by General Warren, and when the latter reached Hicksford, on the Meherrin River, he found a force of Confederates ready to dispute his advance. Colonel Garnett was in command of the Southern troops, consisting, it is said, mainly of militia. General Warren did not attempt to advance, but having torn up a few miles of track returned to the place from which he had started, confessedly defeated in the purpose of his march. After Warren had left, a strong force, said to belong to General Longstreet's corps, attacked the right wing of Butler's division, drove in the pickets, and, after a thorough reconnaissance of Butler's position, retired unassailed.

WE regret to record the death of the gallant Major-General Cleburne, who fell at the battle of Franklin. His loss will be most severely felt by the army of Tennessee and the Confederacy at large. A more brave man or more skilful officer never led troops to the charge. Born in Ireland, the prolific mother of warriors, he entered the English army as a private soldier. Having inherited some property, he sold out, emigrated to America, and eventually practised as a lawyer in Arkansas. When the war broke out his knowledge of drill stood him in good stead, and his ardour in the cause of his adopted country speedily brought him into notice. With great rapidity he rose from the rank of a subaltern to the proud position of Major-General in the Confederate army. He has been present in all the principal battles of the West, and ever by his example and his genius inspired extraordinary enthusiasm in his men. He was a man for whom admiration was heightened by affection, and he now represents the latest, and not the least, sacrifice laid on the altar of the liberty of the South. May the memory of his virtues live to kindle again the fiery energy of Pat Cleburne's division! Generals Adams, Gist, Strahl, Williams, and Granberry fell on the same glorious but fatal field.

THE further hearing of the case of the 'St. Alban's raiders' came before Judge Coursal on December 15. Mr. Kerr pleaded to the jurisdiction of the court at some length, and the Judge, after an adjournment, proceeded to deliver his opinion on the question of jurisdiction. He held that the case came under the Imperial Act, and that as the provincial Act to carry into effect the Ashburton Treaty had not received the Royal sanction, it could not prevail against that of the Imperial Legislature. The Imperial Act required that the warrant under which the prisoners were arrested should be signed by the Governor-General. The prisoners must therefore be discharged. Mr. Devlin made a violent speech to induce the court to change its decision, basing his argument principally on political grounds. Mr. Rose, the counsel for the United States, also desired to speak, but the court refused to hear him after judgment pronounced. Immense cheering greeted the decision of the Judge. The men were then set at liberty and dispersed. From the intelligence brought by the Hansa, it appears that Attorney-General Cartier has ordered the rearrest of the men on the ground that the Judge of the Montreal court had made a wrong decision. The police were endeavouring to effect their capture. The Canadian Cabinet, according to the same intelligence, has denounced the Judge's decision, and there was some expectation that Mr. Justice Coursal would be dismissed. The truth of these averments must, however, be doubted. It is difficult to realise the notion of an interference on the part of the Executive with the Judiciary in a matter where the liberty of any person is at stake. In England no one could even contemplate the possibility of such an act. The dismissal of a judge whose office was tenable dum bene se gesserit for a decision, however wrong, if made bonâ fide, would be equally worthy of reprobation. Other steps seem to have been taken by the Canadian Cabinet in view of the situation, such as the appointment of stipendiary magistrates on the frontier, to take cognisance of similar attempts. The furious rage of the North at the escape of the band of Confederates has shown itself in various ways. General Dix has gone the length of issuing instructions to the military commanders on the frontier, the observance of which will certainly constitute a casus belli on the part of England. He orders the perpetrators of all such attempts as the attack on St. Alban's to be shot down. Should they escape across the frontier, the neutrality of the territory is to be disregarded, and the depredators are to be pursued to every place of refuge. In case of capture on Canadian soil, they are not to be delivered over to the Canadian authorities, but sent on to the army head-quarters for trial. Of course the action of the Federal Government is outstripped by the violence of the Federal press. The New York Times argues that inasmuch as the soil of Canada has been made the base of rebel operations, it has thereby lost its sacred right to inviolability, and is entitled to no more respect than the territory of Virginia or South Carolina. The wrath of England is to be wholly disregarded, and war, if it is to come, will be welcomed by the power of the North. In Congress also the same indignation prevails. Not only is the conduct of the Canadians denounced in the resolutions proposed, but the threatened claim for payment by the British Government for the cargoes and ships destroyed by the cruisers fitted out in British ports, has come again to the surface with increased earnestness.

BRIGADIER-GENERAL W. R. BEALE, of the Confederate army, who has been confined for some time in Fort Warren, has been paroled to act as the accredited agent of the Confederate Government to receive the thousand bales of cotton which are to be sent from the Southern States to exchange the cotton for 30,000 blankets, and to distribute them among the Southern prisoners. General Halbert Payne represented the Federal Government in the matter. The arrangements were nearly completed for the accomplishment of this work of humanity.

A BILL already introduced into the House of Representatives at Washington, and destined in all probability to become law, will give the prevailing ideas of the Government on the method of reconstruction of the Union. The Bill provides for the appointment by the President of provisional Governors of rebel States, who shall see that the laws of the United States and of the State before the rebellion are enforced. But no law or usage recognising slavery shall be recognised by any officer or court in such State. It emancipates all slaves in such State and their posterity for ever, and provides for the discharge on habeas corpus of persons held to service on pretence of ownership.

It provides for the punishment of attempts to reenslave emancipated persons. It declares that officers of the rank of colonel or higher in the rebel service are not citizens of the United States. The seventh section recognises the State of Louisiana as constituted under the Convention assembled at New Orleans in April last.

The Bill further provides for the calling of Conventions in States whose Governments have been usurped and overthrown, as soon as the military resistance to the United States shall have been suppressed, and the people shall have sufficiently returned to their allegiance. The Conventions are required to provide that persons in rebel civil or military service of and above the grade of colonel, shall not vote for or be a member of the Legislature or Governor.

Involuntary servitude is prohibited, and the freedom of all persons to be guaranteed in the said States. No debt, State or Confederate, created by the usurping power is to be recognised. If the Convention shall refuse to reestablish the State Government upon the above conditions, the provisional Government is to declare it dissolved, and another election of delegates is to be ordered.

ENGLAND.

AT a meeting of the Town Council at Sunderland on Wednesday, M. Niboyet, French vice-consul at that town, presented to Mr. James Allison, the ex-mayor, a magnificent box sent to that gentleman by His Majesty the Emperor of the French, accompanied by a letter from the Foreign Minister, expressing on the part of the Government of the Emperor a high sense of the cordial reception given in the month of October last by the authorities and the population of Sutherland to the commandant, staff, and officers of the Imperial frigate La Danaë. M. Niboyet addressed the meeting, and said that he had already had the opportunity of thanking Mr. Allison, while he held the office of mayor, in the name of Commodore Thoyon and the officers and crew of the Danaë. Now he had to announce to them that not only had the French ambassador at London been directed to express the thanks of the Government of the Emperor to the Government of the Queen, but that the Emperor had desired to preserve the recollection of the fêtes and manifestations which took place during the visit of the Commander-in-Chief of the French naval division of Iceland to that port by presenting a lasting acknowledgment of his sentiments in the shape of a handsome enamelled gold box, adorned with his portrait, to the ex-mayor. Mr. Alderman Allison addressed M. Niboyet, and thanked the Emperor for having made him the recipient, on behalf of the people of Sunderland, of this token of his regard; he hoped that the Emperor might long live, for as long as he existed the present friendly relations would exist between this country and France.

ON Thursday last a meeting of the South Staffordshire ironmasters was held at Birmingham to consider the propriety of reducing the wages of puddlers and millmen. After full consideration, it was decided to reduce puddlers' wages 1*s.* per ton, making the price of ordinary puddling 9*s.* 6*d.* instead of 10*s.* 6*d.*; and to reduce the wages of millmen and others employed in the ironworks of the districts represented 10 per cent. Since 1863 puddlers' wages have been raised 3*s.* per ton, as the price of iron advanced; but when the last reduction took place in iron no reduction was made in their wages, though colliers' wages were reduced. The colliers made strenuous opposition, but, after a strike of seventeen weeks' duration, gave in. The remembrance of this will probably have the effect of checking any resistance on the part of the puddlers and millmen. At all events, precautions were taken at the masters' meeting to check any partial strike.

PAUPERISM and good cheer rarely go together. Yet there are exceptions to every rule, a proof of which is given by the report published of the fare with which the inmates of the London workhouses have been regaled at this festive season of Christmas. Thirty-five London workhouses, with the Central London District Schools at Hanwell, and the Industrial Schools at Forest Gate, support no less than 27,725 in-door paupers, and give relief to more than 50,000 out-door poor. It appears from the returns sent in by the masters of the several workhouses that for the Christmas dinner of these 27,725 inmates, there were cooked more than 33,700 lbs., or upwards of 15 tons of plum-pudding, and about 1 lb. of meat per head; also 1 pint of beer or porter was given to each adult. Tobacco and snuff were distributed to the grown-up individuals, and fruit and sweets to the children.

A CASE of some interest came on last week in the Court of Queen's Bench, before the Lord Chief Justice Cockburn. The Maharajah Duleep Singh, son of the famed Runjeet Singh, the Lion of the Punjaub, who has lived for many years in this country enjoying the highest favour at Court, and who has embraced the Christian religion, was defendant in an action brought against him for breach of agreement and wrongful dismissal by Attchal Singh, formerly a soldier in the 15th Punjaub Infantry. It seems that in 1861 the defendant engaged him as a falconer at 4*l.* a month, together with board, clothes, and washing, and also agreed to compensate him for any loss he might sustain by reason of his leaving the army. The plaintiff came over to England in the defendant's service, and remained with him till December, 1862; he then became so disgusted with his position that he left, since, instead of being treated as a gentleman, as he expected, he met with numberless indignities. Indeed, on one occasion, an inferior servant took up a stick, and threatened to insult with blows the dignity of Attchal Singh. The victim of this unparalleled outrage reported the affair to his Highness, but the latter took no notice of it. Moreover, during the last seven or eight months that he was in the defendant's employment he had to find himself in every necessary, and for this he claimed compensation. He had also a huge claim for what he called brandy money, his allowance being a bottle of brandy every other day. His whole claim amounted to the very moderate sum of 884*l.*, and, as the counsel for the defendant remarked, a combination of Eastern imagination and of the astuteness of a London attorney had produced the bill of particulars. Among the items was a claim for 100*l.* for loss of caste by coming to England; but his Highness, in the course of his evidence, said that the price of regaining caste was about 7*s.* 6*d.* It appeared also that the defendant had not dismissed the plaintiff, but that he left of his own accord. The defendant had even paid the passage to Calcutta, but it did not suit the convenience of Attchal Singh to go at that particular time. Witnesses also were called to prove that the plaintiff never made any complaint to them; but before the conclusion of the defendant's case the jury made a written communication to his Lordship, and the counsel for the plaintiff agreed to be nonsuited. His Highness offered to pay the plaintiff's passage to Calcutta notwithstanding what had occurred.

THE report of the Postmaster-General for 1863 reveals some facts of striking interest, especially when comparison is instituted with the state of things at the commencement of the decade. It appears that throughout the postal districts of England and Wales the total increase of population of 1863 over 1854 has been 1,921,482; in letters delivered, 171,024,789; in money-orders issued and paid, rather more than 5,000,000*l.* each; and in savings-bank depositors, 237,255, representing a balance due on the 31st March of the present year of 3,828,804*l.* The corresponding figures with respect to Scotland and Ireland are as follows:—Scotland—Increase in population, 155,329; in letters delivered, 17,287,669; in money-orders issued and paid, 491,405*l.* and 538,424*l.* respectively; and in savings-bank depositors, 30,075, representing an unpaid balance of 107,932*l.* Ireland—Increase in population, 709,058; in letters delivered, 10,362,859; in money-orders issued and paid, 409,230*l.* and 535,496*l.* respectively; and in savings-bank depositors, 11,077, representing a balance unpaid of 160,756*l.* The grand totals of increase for the United Kingdom under the same headings are therefore—Increase in population, 1,367,753; in letters delivered, 198,675,317; in money orders issued and paid, 6,031,382*l.* and 6,185,591*l.* respectively; and in savings-bank depositors, 278,407, representing a balance due of 4,097,492*l.* The increase in the number of savings-bank depositors since the establishment of the post-office savings banks has been enormous and almost universal, decrease being exhibited only in the following places—Birmingham, Blackburn, Bury (Lancashire), Oldham, Preston, Stockport, and Watford. The correspondence of the whole kingdom has increased within ten years at the rate of 44 per cent., but the local correspondence of London has increased at the rate of 65 per cent., and the whole correspondence of London at the rate of 56 per cent.; whilst that of Birmingham has increased at the rate of 54, that of Birkenhead at 71, that of Blackburn at 59, that of Bolton at 90, that of Bradford at 62, that of Chester at 76, that of Darlington at 70, that of Derby at 88, that of Leicester at 93, that of Halifax at 73, that of Leeds at 69, that of Warrington at 96, that of Wigan at 73, and that of Wolverhampton at 78 per cent.

THE will of Hudson Gurney, Esq., of Keswick, in the county of Norfolk, has been proved. The personalty alone was sworn under 1,100,000*l.* Mr. Gurney possessed also considerable landed estates. The charitable bequests, the benefit of which is confined to the county of Norfolk, amounted to 5,200*l.*

LORD LYONS arrived in England in the China. Professor Goldwin Smith returned to this country in the same vessel.

THE custom of duelling is generally supposed to have become extinct in England, but we still find traces left of that ancient chivalry which in the ages of heroic valour led 'gentlemen to the manner born' to vindicate in single combat their wounded honour. In a case that has this week come before the public the principals were men widely differing in profession and practice. In the one, a retired major of Her Majesty's Indian army, the sparks of martial ardour might well be supposed to linger, so that it required but a small cause to fan them into a blazing flame, and to call forth from the indignant ex-soldier a demand for 'satisfaction.' The other might well be supposed to be less an adept in the use of the sword or pistol than in that of the tongue or pen, being a member of the firm of Desborough, Young, & Desborough, attorneys and solicitors. It seems that Messrs. Desborough had been employed by Major William Brownrigg Lumley in the arrangement of a private matter of very great delicacy and importance, and had sent in their bill of costs, amounting to 99*l.* 5*s.* 10*d.* On December 19 they received a cheque on the Truro Bank for 20*l.*, which, together with 6*l.* odd belonging to the Major which they had in hand, they proposed to set against their bill, and Mr. Desborough, jun., wrote to the Major to that effect. On the following day a letter came from the Major objecting to this course; and Mr. Desborough at once wrote to inform him that as soon as the cheque was cashed in Cornwall and remitted to the bankers of the firm, he would send Major Lumley a cheque for the amount. But this arrangement did not suit the Major, and in high wrath he proceeded to the offices of the firm, and marching up to Mr. Desborough's table emphatically said, 'Sir, I demand my money.' In vain Mr. Desborough assured him that he had not the money; the Major would neither sit down, nor be pacified by any remonstrances or explanations of the solicitor, but in a loud tone declared that 'he would have war to the knife,' and that his own solicitor had advised him that no bill of costs was due till it had been taxed. Messrs. Desborough replied that they put no belief in his words, and the Major, while retorting that he did not believe one word Mr. Desborough said, still persisted in demanding his money. At last Mr. Desborough arose, and, politely opening the door, thrice requested the Major to withdraw. But the soldier was not to be moved from his post, and it was only on Mr. Desborough laying his hand on his shoulder and guiding him to the door that he would take his departure. But to be turned out of an attorney's office was too much for a major of her Majesty's army. On the following day Sir John Louis waited on the solicitor with a letter from Major Lumley to the effect that 'Waiving the pecuniary misunderstanding that had arisen, he wished to call attention to a subject of graver aspect. Yesterday afternoon,' wrote the gallant Major, 'you insulted me in your own office in the grossest and most absolute manner. You first shook your hand menacingly in my face. You then contradicted me in terms so furiously offensive as to constitute the "lie direct," and you completed the outrage by endeavouring to thrust me with such violence from the room that it amounted to the last indignity to which a gentleman can be exposed—viz. a "blow." This treatment I consider as not merely dishonouring my person and reputation, but also the commission I have the honour of holding in her Majesty's Indian army. I therefore demand from you that "satisfaction" which, under such conditions, one gentleman is entitled to from another.'

To this fierce letter Mr. Desborough's reply was both mild and concise—he would neither fight nor apologise. This was not what the Major expected. Sir Louis was again required. A second letter was sent by his hand to say that the only course left open to the Major was to announce to Mr. Desborough 'that he should henceforth consider him as beneath the notice of all who are "gentlemen to the manner born," and the only inconvenience that the solicitor need apprehend was a sound and wholesome flagellation whenever and wherever the chance of administering the same should present itself; the Major's only hope and prayer being that the desired opportunity might occur in the vicinity of clear and running water, so that he might be enabled to cleanse his hands as speedily as possible of that taint which must necessarily accrue through contact with a snob, a liar, and a coward.'

Mr. Desborough immediately applied for a warrant, and on Monday the case was brought before the Mayor; and Major Lumley was bound over in his own recognisances in 250*l.* to keep the peace towards Mr. Desborough, jun.

INDIA.

Sad intelligence is received from almost all quarters of injury to the crops from want of rain, and there is every prospect of severe suffering during the coming season throughout the whole country.

The King of Bokhara has received a letter to the following effect from the Czar of Russia:—'Our troops have reached Tashkund and Shurraubkhana, situated near Kohan, and according to our treaty we intend collecting an army at Huzrut Sooltan to march against Thibet and other places. Kashghur and Yarkund are part of the Bokhara territory. We would be much obliged if the King of Bokhara would consent to our troops passing through those places.' The Russian ambassador is at Bokhara.

A grand khillut, consisting of diamond necklaces, &c., has been sent by the Czar of Russia to the King of Bokhara.

The movement of the British troops upon Bhootan has caused great consternation in that country, and the feud between the Rajahs, who are for peace, and the Pillos, who are for war, has almost broken out into civil war.

THE CONTINENT.

FRANCE.

Some uneasiness is felt in the society of the capital in consequence of the announcement that by the advice of her physicians the Empress will abstain from taking part in the festivities and receptions of the season. There will therefore be no evening entertainment or ball at the Tuileries on January 2, as originally contemplated; the diplomatic reception on the morning of that day will, of course, take place as usual. There is little talk of politics at the present moment in France. The attention of all is concentrated on the gigantic American struggle; the Danish episode has been played out, and men look round again to see with horror that the bloody drama on the other side of the ocean has been going on without intermission, while their own thoughts have been momentarily engaged elsewhere. The affairs of Italy are no longer so engrossing; the arrangements of the Convention are in course of execution; the garrison of Rome, which now numbers about 11,000 men, is to be reduced shortly. With regard to internal affairs, the authorities and their satellite journals are engaged in glorifying themselves over the reconstruction of Paris. M. Haussmann, the Prefect of the Seine, has had another opportunity of enlarging upon his favourite topics, and of defending himself from the charge of extravagance, in a speech made to the Council of the Department. The Ministry have had the forthcoming budget under their consideration for some time; it has been semi-officially promised on several occasions, but its appearance has been as often postponed. M. Fould has applied for authority to sell some of the Crown forests, and it has already been granted to him in one instance. The sale of these will, he hopes, enable him to dispense with a loan. There are some difficulties connected with the sale, which can only be obviated by a fresh law on the subject. As the law at present stands, the clearing of all wooded districts is absolutely prohibited. The French nation has suffered considerably from the enormous clearing of land which took place after the revolution of 1792, depending as they do mainly on their forests for a provision of combustibles. Forests are now subjected to the tenderest care of the Imperial Government, which is careful to keep up a good supply of firewood for the use of the poorer and more excitable classes.

The successors of M. Mocquard in his two offices of private secretary and chef du cabinet to the Emperor are M. Pietri for the former, and M. Conti for the latter. They are both Corsicans by birth. M. Pietri is well known for the successful manner in which he brought about the plebiscite, or popular vote, which transferred Nice from Italy to France.

The Imperial Court was engaged last week in hearing a case of almost romantic interest connected with the history of a diamond. It appears that, in the year 1777, a man named Lestonneau, a native of the south of France, went to India, and took service in the Mahratta Empire. He rapidly rose by his talents and courage, became generalissimo of the army, and confidential minister of the sovereign. In 1806 he determined to return to France. The Prince of the Mahrattas gave him as a parting present a diamond valued at 24,000*l.* On his return to France he found misfortunes awaiting him: his remittances had been invested in assignats, the greenbacks of that day, and were consequently lost. With the remains of his property he bought some ironworks in his native district. The Spanish guerillas invaded the country and took him prisoner. He escaped to Syria, where he became the guest of Lady Stanhope. On her death he was admitted into a charitable asylum, where he ended his adventurous life. Before leaving Paris to purchase the ironworks, he had confided his diamond to M. Lépine, the Court jeweller. Mdlles. Lestonneau now brought an action against the heirs of M. Lépine for the value of the diamond; the defendants produced a receipt purporting to have been given to them in return for the jewel by a confidential agent of General Lestonneau. The Imperial Court has decided that the action is barred by the statute of limitations, and the ladies have consequently lost the diamond and their cause. Query: What becomes of lost diamonds? The ultimate fate of lost pins has been an awful mystery which 'no fellow can understand:' but the disappearance of jewels of value, the peculiarities of which are as well known amongst jewellers as are the points of Derby winners in the racing world, is still more enigmatical. Where are the diamonds of the Queen's necklace? Rumour says, in Russia, adorning some fair Muscovite; but rumour alone gives an answer. So, where is General Lestonneau's diamond? The value of it alone ought to make a reply easy; there are not many people in the world who can afford to keep 24,000*l.* locked up in a square half-inch of crystal. Apropos of jewels, a story is told of an emerald, which shows that some of these precious stones can be traced and recognised. A gentleman residing in Paris had brought from Central America one of the most magnificent emeralds in the world. It was placed on a cushion to be exhibited to his friends at an evening party. In the midst of the entertainment the emerald vanished; every search was made for it, but in vain. Years afterwards, in November 1864, at a reunion of gentlemen, the loser of the emerald saw his jewel in a pin adorning the scarf of a person of the highest respectability. Needless to say, he at once enquired how it got there. The explanation was quite satisfactory. The wearer of it had once played écarté in England with an Italian, and had lost a large sum to him. He suspected the Italian of cheating, watched him, and detected him in the act. Of course he demanded his money back, but the rogue begged so hard to be let off from so ruinous an exposé, that he consented to take instead a splendid emerald pin which the Italian had on. Luckily he was able to describe very exactly the person of this fashionable thief; the original owner of the emerald recognised him as a former acquaintance of his own, the police were put on the alert, and there are hopes of the capture of this 'misguided individual party,' to borrow a choice Yankeeism from the most Yankee letter of the Yankeeest of Yankees, Mr. Seward.

ITALY.

The measures for the installation of the Government at Florence are being pursued with activity. Great difficulty has been found in suiting the buildings to their new purpose, as every edifice of any importance in Florence is devoted to one branch or the other of the fine arts, an arrangement which it is not desirable to disturb. A royal decree has been published declaring of public utility the occupation of the convents, seminaries, and other establishments in Florence required for the administration of the State. The mayor of the city has convoked the municipal council to concert measures for the accommodation of their numberless expected visitors; a large piece of land belonging to the city, and lying to the left of the Arno, is to be laid out in squares and streets; the suburbs are to be all annexed; a company has been formed for the erection of wooden and iron houses, similar to those supplied in England for colonial use; by the terms of their charter, they must have at least 2,000 rooms ready by May 1. The Chamber of Deputies stands adjourned to January 5; the Senate held its last sitting on the 21st inst., to confirm some of the financial measures passed by the Lower House. Signor Sella, the Finance Minister, wishing to exhibit to Europe the security of the State credit, is about to publish an account of the manner in which 60,000,000 francs can be saved by economy in the Administration; this sum, together with 85,000,000 francs, to be raised by additional taxation, will reduce the deficit of next year's budget considerably. General della Marmora, in the last sitting of the Lower House, spoke on the subject of the Austrian menaces; he said that Italy is at this moment more necessary to the equilibrium of Europe than the old Austrian monarchy; should Austria think fit to attack Italy, it will be right and expedient for the latter to do her best to dismember the Austrian Empire. This language bears out the expression used by Count Mensdorff Pouilly, when he said that it was impossible for Austria to come to terms with a Power who considers her very existence as an insult to herself.

A new office has been created in the Italian Cabinet in the shape of a Minister of Marine. General Angioletti has been appointed to this post, the duties of which have up to this time been performed by General della Marmora himself. The Minister of the Interior has addressed a circular to the prefects on the subject of the attempts against Venetia, in which he observes that the party of action are still intriguing to make a fresh attempt on that unfortunate country, in spite of their late ill success; he declares that the Government is resolved to stop such enterprises, and therefore invites the prefects to exercise a most rigorous surveillance over the agents of the party of action within their districts, and to remove the most dangerous emigrants from the frontier. Some of the professors in the once famous University of Bologna have refused to take the oath of allegiance to the King; they have accordingly been dismissed from their offices.

We are told of two scandals in the Italian non-papal Church, which are not likely to increase the reputation of the religious secessionists in Italy. Fra Pantaleo, a Garibaldian monk, who has of course been unfrocked by his superior ecclesiastical authorities, has been charged, in an indictment laid against him by the Advocate-General of Florence, with having publicly preached against monastic corporations, with having called the Papacy a negation of divinity and humanity, and with other anti-papal heresies. The vigorous conduct of the Advocate-General exhibits the determination of the Government to uphold catholicity of doctrine. In the North of Italy, at Bergamo, an evangelical minister opened a chapel in which he preached his doctrines. The mob fell upon him, with shouts of 'Down with the heretics!' and were only prevented from putting him to death by the energetic interference of a Garibaldian volunteer. Thus the people in their turn assert their adherence to their old religion.

Some sort of communication has taken place between the Governments of Turin and Rome through the mediation of Paris, and an agreement has been made for the expulsion from the Papal territory of Italian subjects against whom warrants have been issued either for ordinary offences, or for brigandage in South Italy. A batch of brigands have been condemned to death by the French courts-martial, and another of these worthies has been delivered up to the Italian authorities. A Bourbonist circular has been found among the lower classes, in which politics and religion are mixed up in the quaintest manner; murderers, iconoclasts, Protestants, and heretics are all threatened with speedy destruction; benedictions are pronounced upon Mary the Immaculate and Francis II. No news has arrived of the intended policy of the Vatican. Cardinal Antonelli is said to be engaged in inducing the Pope to make Mgr. de Mérode a cardinal. The effect of this would be to compel him to leave the Vatican, where he now always stays by the side of the Pope, and to shut himself up in a palace in solitary grandeur. It is said that the Pope is about to begin the formation of his army, as proposed in the Franco-Italian Convention, by the disbanding of the Pontifical Zouaves. His Holiness has published an encyclical letter, addressed to the patriarchs, archbishops, and bishops throughout the world, condemnatory of the various doctrines which have been promulgated of late years contrary to the principles and the precepts of the Catholic Church. He especially designates as the objects of his condemnation, first, the doctrine of 'naturalism,' which teaches that there is no connection between the State and the Church, and that every man is at liberty to think, say, and write what he pleases; secondly, the doctrine of 'socialism,' which would destroy the family religion by depriving human society of divine sanction, and building it up out of a fortuitous concourse of individuals. The particular errors which are condemned by the Bull are comprehended in eighty propositions, which were composed by a committee of theologians under the direction of the Pope. The Bull is dated 'January 5, 1864, in the 10th year of the dogmatic definition of the Immaculate Conception, and the 19th of our Pontificate.'

DENMARK.

The difficulties which arose in the Rigsraad on occasion of the difference between the two Chambers mentioned in our last, have been put an end to by the formation of a mixed committee of the two Houses. The following measures have been agreed to:—the elimination of all the Slesvig members of the House, with the exception of those representing the Danish enclaves; and the preservation till March 1866 of the budget in its present form, for Denmark and Slesvig in common. The fundamental law of the constitution has been revised: the members of the Folksthing, or Lower House, are to be elected by universal suffrage, those of the Upper House, or Landsthing, by electors with an annual income of $2,000, or paying direct taxes to the amount of $200. No conditions of eligibility are to be required of the candidates; the King will name twelve of the sixty-four members of the Upper House.

GERMANY.

Yet other claimants have appeared for the Ducal crown of Slesvig-Holstein, or parts at least of it, in the shape of the King of Bavaria, the Ernestine branch of the House of Saxe, and a certain Count of Rantzau, besides a Count Styrum, a connection of the House of Oldenburg. The Houses which have put in claims up to this time are Austria, Prussia, Augustenburg, two branches of Oldenburg, Hesse, Saxony, Bavaria, and Rantzau. Count Mensdorff has agreed to the proposal of Count von Bismarck, to refer the claims of all the candidates to a juridico-diplomatic conference, to be held at Vienna or Berlin. The projects of annexation, which were once so warmly supported at Berlin, are now being abandoned in favour of a proposition which, without depriving the Duchies of a nominal independence, would place them, as far as their foreign relations go, completely at the disposal of Prussia. Prussia, they say, will not tolerate the existence of a corps d'armée in the north which is not under the orders of the Prussian commander-in-chief. In consequence of the maintenance of these views, the young King of Bavaria has addressed an autograph letter to the King of Hanover, requesting him to unite with Bavaria and other minor German Powers whom the proceedings of Prussia in the Duchies have seriously annoyed. The Hanoverian reply was couched in the most favourable and friendly terms. Herr von der Pfordten, the Bavarian minister, and Herr von Beust, of Saxony, have also met and come to an understanding on the basis of a new German Confederation of the minor Powers. Thus they propose to remodel the existing system, according to which there are thirty-five members of the Confederacy, thirty-two of whom are the playthings of the two others, and to form a new Confederacy of three Powers, Austria, Prussia, and the minor Confederacy. The strength of component parts of the new Bund would be an exact inversion of the present state of things. The minor Powers have a population of 17,000,000, Prussia 14,000,000, and Austria 13,000,000 pure Germans.

The King of Prussia has issued a statute instituting a military cross in commemoration of the capture of Alsen. It is described as a cross of yellow bronze, bearing a wreath of laurel surrounding a medallion of the King, and suspended by a blue watered ribbon with two orange stripes and a black and white border for combatants, and an orange watered ribbon with one blue stripe and a black and white border for non-combatants. On the decease of the wearer of it, the decoration is to be preserved in his parish. The High Court of Berlin pronounced judgment on the great trial of the Poles on the 23rd inst. The greater number were acquitted; eleven, all absent, were condemned to death, two to two years', two to eighteen months', two to fifteen months', and nineteen to one year's imprisonment. The negotiations between Prussia, Austria, Saxony, and Bavaria, with regard to a new customs' treaty, commenced at Berlin on the same day.

The Financial Committee of the Lower Chamber of the Reichsrath of Austria has fixed the deficit of the budget of 1865 at 77,000,000 florins; 55,000,000, however, will be covered by the amount destined for the sinking fund. The Committee proposes to strike off the other 22,000,000 from the military expenses, by effecting a reduction in the army. The Lower House of the Reichsrath has stultified its own decisions in a most remarkable manner. It will be remembered, that during the debate on the address, the opposition carried a resolution condemning the conduct of the Government in establishing a state of siege in Galicia. The House has since that time proceeded to examine the case of Herr Rogarski, a Polish deputy, who was tried by various tribunals established under the said martial law, and condemned by them. According to the previous judgment of the House, Herr Rogarski ought to have been reinstated in all his rights, since the tribunals by which he was tried had been declared to be illegal. But, on the contrary, an immense majority decided that Herr Rogarski had forfeited his position as deputy of the Reichsrath. Thus the House has declared that the defendant was legally convicted, while it declares that the tribunal which condemned him was illegally constituted. The absurdity of this proceeding is considered to be a death-blow for the opposition, who forced the House into a theory which in practice it was obliged to reject. Notice is taken of the pride which the Emperor of Austria seems to take in his position as a constitutional sovereign. When petitions are presented to him, his most favourable reply is, 'I will promote your case with my Reichsrath.' The liberties of the country are better guarded by such a disposition in their sovereign than by the carping objections of an impracticable opposition. The editor of the Vaterland was tried on the 22nd instant on the charge of doing injury to the honour and dignity of the King of Prussia by asserting in his journal that His Majesty was intent on forming a military State at the expense of the Prussian nation, and that he did not hesitate to sacrifice the wellbeing, the rights, and liberties of the country to Moloch. The Archduke Louis Joseph, younger brother of the late Emperor Francis I. of Austria, has just died, aged eighty years. In former times, when his brothers were successively on the Imperial throne, he was their influential counsellor.

We may obtain an idea of the emigration of Germans to America from the following statistics of the Duchy of Mecklenburg-Schwerin, the population of which numbered once about 600,000 souls. Between 1849 and 1862 76,000 persons left that district; in 1863, 7,000 more; and in 1864, not less than 10,000; making 93,000 in all, or about one-sixth of the population.

Affairs in Hesse seem likely to become serious. The precise cause of the difficulty was that the municipality of Cassel authorised a riding-school to be opened; upon which the Elector of Hesse annulled the permission on the ground that all education was in the hands of the State. Two courses of action have been decided upon in answer to this: the Ministry are to be impeached for advising so unconstitutional a proceeding; and the relations of the Elector are about to apply to the Federal Diet to declare the sovereign incapacitated, and to appoint a regent in his stead. The regent designated is Prince Frederick of Hesse.

A story is told in Germany which is not much to the credit of the present King of Prussia, and is consequently received with all the more delight. The King, then Prince Frederick William, was serving in the Rhine provinces of Bavaria in the revolutionary period of 1849; he stayed at a certain hotel for two days with his staff, and ran up a bill of 45*l.*; the host applied for payment, and was referred by the Prince to the Bavarian Government, who ought, he said, to pay all expenses for the troops acting in its behalf. The Bavarian Government repudiated the debt, and the hotel-keeper was referred back to the Prince; he applied by letter again and again, but always in vain; at last in desperation he went to Baden-Baden last year, found the King, and presented him with his little bill, and a petition; the King accepted it graciously, referred it to his finance officer; and a few days after the poor creditor received an answer that all the accounts for 1849 had been squared long ago, and that the King would not undertake a debt really due from Bavaria! Among other royal privileges we must count for the future the most important one of not being obliged to pay hotel bills.

SPAIN.

The Cortes were opened on the 22nd inst. The Queen's speech expressed a hope that the Peruvian difficulty would shortly be settled without any surrender of the dignity of Spain; it announced the recognition of the Empire of Mexico; promised that the Italian question should be treated with the utmost prudence, as well as with a regard for the interests of the Pope; and concluded by announcing the introduction of several financial bills, and a bill on the liberty of the press in harmony with the Constitution. No mention was made of Santo Domingo, but it is understood that if, after a reasonable time, the insurgents are not put down, the design of reducing them will be abandoned. Some curious details are given with regard to the report that the English Government had determined to recognise the Dominicans as belligerents. In consequence of the effect produced on the public mind by this report, Sir John Crampton, the British representative at Madrid, wrote to his Government to request explanations on this matter, of which he had heard nothing. Earl Russell informed him in reply that the law officers of the Crown had pronounced in favour of the recognition of the insurgents as belligerents; at the same time he authorised him to acquaint the Spanish Cabinet with his determination to postpone indefinitely any act which might be considered hostile or derogatory to the dignity of Spain. The Spaniards are of course highly delighted, and applaud Earl Russell's diplomacy to the skies. It is not so evident that the British public have much cause for self-congratulation. In the first place, it appears that our Minister at Madrid was left in total ignorance on a subject which might affect our relations with Spain vitally; in the second place, Earl Russell has confessed to the fact that he has made concessions to the Spanish Government in the teeth of law and equity, as expounded to him by our law officers, and without the smallest regard for the sufferings of the St. Dominicans, who, for all he knows, may be materially injured by our Foreign Secretary's desire not to offend the mighty power of Spain. The general lesson we learn from it is that Earl Russell can deliberately and officially commit himself to a course of injustice for an indefinite period of time.

RUSSIA.

The text of the imperial ukase regulating the confiscation of the conventual property in Poland has been published; it appears that the view given of it by the telegraphic despatches is by no means warranted. The property taken from the religious establishments is to be devoted to the following purposes only (an important mission in the original despatch):—the support of the remaining religious communities; the payment of pensions, &c., to monks and nuns; the support of the schools and churches formerly kept up by the suppressed monasteries; grants to indigent clergy of the Roman Catholic Church; and the support of national instruction. Several other articles are contained in the ukase, which materially lessen the amount of damage done to the Roman Catholic cause in Poland. It is curious that the Journal de St. Pétersbourg, which contained a true copy of the document, was not delivered in Paris on the day when it was due; and consequently the public were allowed to take their impressions of it from the false telegraphic despatches which alone were received. This fact is said to have been brought about by the machinations of the Polish party.

TURKEY.

Fuad Pasha, the Grand Vizier, has suffered a great loss by the total destruction of his palace by fire; all his plate and jewellery were consumed. The Sultan has shown his sympathy in the misfortune of his servant by lending him one of his spare palaces, and giving him an enormous quantity of personal effects to supply the place of those lost.

The Porte has at length consented to place the police of the Danube under international control. The Galatz European Commission has long urged this, but the Turkish Government has hitherto perceived objections to the measure which have prevented its acquiescing in the proposed arrangement. In deference, however, to a recent collective note from the representatives of the six Powers, these are now waived, and the scheme suggested by the commission will, in consequence, be carried out.

GREECE.

The King of the Hellenes has requested Signor Kyriaku to form a cabinet. A letter from Copenhagen states that Prince Jules, the King's brother, is going to Athens to assist the King with his counsels, in accordance with the wish of the King and the recommendation of Count von Sponneck.

SWITZERLAND.

The trial of the persons accused of leading the riots at Geneva is now going on. No new fact of importance has transpired. The evidence is very contradictory. It will be remembered that the riots arose in consequence of the success of the Conservative over the Radical candidate in a contest for a seat in the Council. The result of the trial up to this time has been to show that it is customary for a deputation from the victorious party to accompany the official procession, whose duty it is to announce the result of the elections; that on this occasion a body of Conservatives without arms had joined the official procession in accordance with this recognised custom; and that the Radicals had fired upon the procession without excuse or justification; and finally, that the heads of the Conservative or Independent party had seized on the persons of the Council of State solely with a view to induce the Radicals to cease from shedding blood. Thus far, therefore, the evidence seems to be entirely in favour of the Conservative party.

TUNIS.

Agitation has recommenced in the southern province. The Arabs who had submitted to the Bey have again thrown off their allegiance, and have surrounded the camp of General Rutteh. Prince Ali has set out from the capital with a body of troops for his relief.

MEXICO.

The only remains of the Juarist army is the small force now under the command of General Porfirio Diaz. Marshal Bazaine is about to lead an attack upon him in person. The Emperor and Empress are about to make another and a more lengthened tour through their empire, and will visit on this occasion the maritime provinces. The Emperor entertains the project of making a canal between the two oceans across the Isthmus of Tehuantepec, and will review the ground for that purpose. The execution of this scheme would present for Mexico the advantage that the whole course of the canal would be on Mexican territory. Mazatlan has been captured by the French.

SOUTH AMERICA.

The Brazilian authorities have notified the blockade of the ports on the River Uruguay; this has created great excitement in the neighbouring Argentine Republic, which is not by any means allayed by the announcement of a policy of non-intervention from General Mitres, the President. A civil war is going on in Paraguay between the Government and General Flores; both sides have a regularly organised army, which were, when last heard of, encamped on the two sides of the River Yi, expecting a battle. At Buenos Ayres, the capital of the Argentine Republic, fears are expressed of a likelihood of the secession of certain provinces, who would elect General Urquiza their President, and form one new State under the protectorate of Paraguay. The new State would then ally itself with Paraguay and the Montevidean Government to repel the Brazilian troops from the territory of Uruguay.

MR. FESSENDEN'S REPORT.

THE following extract contains the more important portions of the report of the Federal Secretary of the Treasury:—

A statement of the receipts and expenditures estimated and actual for the year ending June 30, 1863, will show how this balance in the Treasury is obtained, and the increase of the public debt during the year, viz.:—

Total	$1,099,731,960.42
Estimated balance	$5,836,539.83	$18,842,558.71
From actual receipts from loans		$618,114,884.92
Deduct balance on hand July 1, 1864		18,842,558.71
It shows the amount received from loans applied to the service of the year ending June 30, 1864		599,272,326.21

The statement may be more intelligible in another form, as follows:—

Actual expenditures for the fiscal year	$865,234,087.86
Deduct receipts from ordinary sources and balances from preceding year	265,961,761.65
Balance provided from loans applied to the service of the year	599,272,326.21

The amount derived from loans, specifically stated, is as follows:—

Five-twenty bonds, act February 25, 1862	321,557,283.31
Fractional currency, exceeding amount redeemed	2,702,421.25
Six per cent. bonds, act July 17, 1861	30,565,875.45

Of which amount there was applied to repayment of public debt	112,527,526.05
Which deducted, it leaves applicable to expenditures	$618,114,884.92
Deduct balance, July 1, 1864	18,842,558.71
Balance applied to the service of the year	$599,272,326.21
The public debt, as stated by my predecessor in his report of December 10, 1863, was	1,098,793,181.37
To this amount should be added amounts paid into the Treasury previous to July 1, 1863, for which evidences of debt were subsequently issued	23,782,423.20
Amount of debt, July 1, 1863	1,122,575,604.57
Add amount of loans applied to actual expenditures as above, and balance in the Treasury July 1, 1864	618,114,884.92
It gives the amount of public debt July 1, 1864	1,740,690,489.49

The very large comparative receipts from miscellaneous sources require explanation. They are accounted for as follows, viz.:—

From captured and abandoned property	$2,146,715.09
Premium on gold shipped from San Francisco to London	2,799,920.64
Sales of prizes due to captors	4,088,111.42
Internal and coastwise intercourse fees	5,809,287.20
Premium on sales of gold coin	16,498,975.49
Commutation money	12,451,896.15
All other sources	3,716,542.11
Total	$47,511,448.10

The Secretary is of the opinion that not over $25,000,000 can be safely calculated upon as likely to accrue from similar sources during the current year.

The expenditures for the current fiscal year were estimated in the last report of the Secretary as follows, viz.:—

Estimated balance of former appropriations	$350,000,000.00
For the civil service	27,973,194.81
For pensions and Indians	9,631,303.73
For the War Department	536,204,127.77
For the Navy Department	142,618,785.40
For interest on the public debt	85,387,677.15
Aggregate	$1,151,815,089.86
Deducting as likely to remain unexpended on June 30, 1864	$400,000,000.00
Leaving to be provided for	751,815,689.86
And the receipts from ordinary sources were estimated in the aggregate at	206,836,530.93
Leaving to be provided by loans	544,978,549.93

This estimate, like all others of a similar character, was necessarily based on past experience with regard to unexpended balances, and upon estimates from the different departments which in a time of war must be liable to great uncertainty. Additional information enables me to state the probable expenditures with a near approach to accuracy as corrected by including so much of the actual balance of former appropriations as is liable to be used during the year, those made at the last session of Congress, the additional amounts called for to meet probable deficiencies, and reducing the balance of unexpended appropriations at the end of the year, as from amounts expended during the first quarter would seem necessary, the estimate is as follows, viz.:—

Actual unexpended balances as above	$380,387,050.23
For the War Department	625,945,741.65
For the Navy Department	110,047,459.96
For the civil service	21,796,572.50
For pensions and Indians	6,590,089.12
Indefinite appropriations	9,152,007.11
Total	$1,153,918,920.57
Add interest on public debt	91,810,215.18
Total	$1,245,729,135.75
Add public debt matured and maturing during the year, viz., certificates of indebtedness	160,729,000.00
Texas debt	2,149,000.00
Loan of 1842	196,808.45
Treasury notes under the act of March 2, 1861, and prior thereto	278,511.64
Total	$1,409,082,455.84

The amount of certificates outstanding on November 1, 1864, was $238,593,000. This being a much larger amount than the market ought to bear, it would not be wise to calculate upon these securities as available for the service of the year beyond $75,000,000. The available probable resources for the current year may then be stated as follows:—

From customs	$70,271,091.96
From lands	642,185.84
From internal revenue	249,562,859.92
From miscellaneous sources	24,020,171.44
From direct tax	16,079.86
From certificates of indebtedness	75,000,000.00
Total	419,512,389.02
To this should be added probable unexpended balances, June 30, 1865	350,000,000.00
Balance of cash, July 1, 1864	18,842,558.71
Total resources	788,354,947.73
Which deducted from expenditures, leaves balance to be provided for by loans	620,727,508.11
If, however, an additional sum of fifty millions should be realised as proposed by the Commissioner, from internal duties, the amount to be raised by loans would be	570,727,508.11
From this should be deducted the public debt redeemed	88,353,320.09
Leaving, as increase of public debt at the close of the year	482,374,188.02

Stated in the usual form by taking the actual receipts and expenditures of the first quarter, as a distinct basis of calculation, the result is the same, viz.:

For the first quarter of the current year, ending September 30, 1864, the actual receipts, as shown by the books of the Treasury, were as follows:—

From customs	$19,271,091.96
From lands	342,185.84
From direct tax	16,079.86
From internal revenue	46,562,859.92
From miscellaneous sources	9,020,171.44
Total receipts	75,212,389.02
Add balance in Treasury, July 1, 1864	18,842,558.71
Receipts from all sources excepting loans	$94,054,947.73

For the three remaining quarters ending June 30, 1863, the estimates are:—

From customs	$51,000,000.00
From internal revenue	203,000,000.00
From lands	30,000.00
From miscellaneous sources	15,000,000.00
Total	$269,300,000.00
Total receipts from ordinary sources, actual and estimated, with balance on hand July 1, 1864	$363,354,947.73

The expenditures for the first quarter, ending September 30, 1864, were as follows:—

Civil service	$8,712,422.51
Pensions and Indians	4,935,179.31
War Department	286,200,288.52
Navy Department	33,292,916.49
Interest on public debt	19,921,054.48
Total, exclusive of principal of public debt	$353,061,861.31

For the three remaining quarters, the estimated expenditures based upon appropriations and estimated deficiencies, are:—

For the civil service	$26,852,489.47
For pensions and Indians	6,516,595.72
For War Department	677,479,384.39
For Navy Department	109,929,644.16
For interest on public debt	71,889,160.70
Total of expenditures actual and estimated	$1,245,729,135.75

These estimates include all unexpended appropriations from former years, and there may be deducted, as a probable unexpended balance, at the close of the year, $350,000,000, leaving the total amount, actual and estimated, for the current year, $895,729,135.75.

Deducting from the total of expenditures, actual and estimated, there will remain $512,374,188.02.

If Congress should adopt the measures for increasing the national revenue at an early day, the Secretary believes that there may be added to the receipts from that source $50,000,000, which being deducted, there would remain to be provided $482,374,188.02.

The public debt, matured and maturing during the year, is, as before stated, $163,353,320.09. From this may be deducted, as likely to be provided for by new certificates of indebtedness, $75,000,000. Add this sum ($88,353,320.09) to the balance to be provided for the expenditures of the year, viz. $482,374,188.02, and it makes the whole amount to be provided from loans $570,727,508,11. But as this would include so much of the existing public debt as would be redeemed, exceeding certificates issued within the year, viz. $88,353,320.09, this sum is to be deducted from the amount to be obtained by loans, viz.:—$570,727,568.11, showing the probable increase of the public debt during the year to be $482,374,188.02, which, added to $1,740,690,489.49, would make the public debt on July 1, 1865, $2,223,064,677.51, subject to such increase as may be occasioned should Congress not provide for additional revenue, or should the income from ordinary sources fall short of the estimates submitted.

Any estimate which may be made of the probable receipts and expenditures for the next fiscal year must necessarily be liable to still greater uncertainty. This remark applies more particularly to expenditures, for while, if existing laws remain unchanged, the amount of revenue may be calculated with reasonable certainty, it is impossible to anticipate what the exigencies of war may require. On the one hand, this may call for increased effort, and on the other it may be confidently hoped that the great struggle is near its termination, and that, consequently, the estimate now submitted will prove far beyond the wants of the year. While any doubt remains, however, it would be unsafe to assume any other basis of calculation than one predicated upon the existing state of affairs. The receipts for the year ending June 30, 1866, are estimated as follows:—

From customs	$70,000,000
Internal duties	300,000,000
Lands	1,000,000
Miscellaneous sources	25,000,000
Aggregate	$396,000,000

The expenditures are estimated as follows:—

Balance of unexpended appropriations	$350,000,000
For the civil service	33,082,097
Pensions and Indians	14,196,050
The War Department	531,758,191
Navy Department	112,219,666
Interest on public debt	127,000,000
Aggregate	$1,168,256,005
But from this aggregate there may be deducted as likely to remain unexpended at the close of the year	350,000,000
Total	$818,256,005

Deduct estimated receipts from ordinary sources, $396,000, there will remain to be provided for by loans $422,256,005. To this should be added for redemption of excess of certificates of indebtedness $47,365,000, making the whole amount to be provided for by loans $400,624,005. Assuming the correctness of these estimates, the whole debt on July 1, 1866, would be found by adding the foregoing amount $422,256,005 to the estimated debt on July 1, 1865, $2,223,064,677, giving $2,645,320,682 as the amount of the debt at the close of the next fiscal year.

INCREASE OF UNITED STATES ARMAMENTS ON THE CANADIAN LAKES.

During the sitting of the American Senate at Washington, on December 13, Mr. Sherman, representing Ohio, reported a bill authorising the construction of six revenue cutters for service on the lakes, and appropriating 1,000,000 dollars, or so much as may prove to be necessary, to that purpose. The bill, as reported, was passed. The following letter from the Secretary of the Treasury on the subject was read:—

'Sir,—I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 7th instant, requesting information as to the number of revenue cutters now on the lakes, their efficiency, and the necessity of their increase. The number of cutters heretofore maintained on the northern lakes was six. They are sailing vessels, and of such build and rig as to prevent their cruising with efficiency. In 1861 five of them were directed to be brought down the St. Lawrence to the Atlantic coast, in the hope that they might be used advantageously in the preventive service. One was left upon the lakes, but found to be worthless, and sold. During the last winter a contract was made with parties to build an efficient steamer for revenue service on Lake Erie, which vessel is so nearly completed that her trial has been ordered for to-day. This is the only steamer belonging to the Government applicable to revenue purposes on all the lakes. The necessity, however, for preventing smuggling along our northern frontier, which the Government has satisfactory evidence is carried on to a great extent, induced the Secretary to charter two steamers for temporary service—one on Lake Erie and one on Lake Ontario. One of these was lost on entering the Cleveland harbour, and the charter of the other has expired, and she has gone out of the service. I therefore recommend that authority be given to build or purchase four efficient vessels for the use of the revenue department on the northern lakes, which, in addition to the one just completed, will make the number of cutters the same as previously employed. It is possible that the number here recommended may not be all that will be required. The great length of the coast to be guarded, and, in some parts, its close proximity to the Canada shore, demand constant vigilance, and the proper authority should be conferred to meet contingencies. If possible, such vessels should be completed and commissioned before the opening of the navigation.

'I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

'W. P. Fessenden.'

The Folly of Coercion.—Sydney Smith has a capital illustration in his Plymley letters of the folly of coercing people to be of one mind in religion; and it could just as well be applied to making men of one political mind in a State, and especially a State resting on the consent of the governed. For 'Jenkinsons, Percevals, and Melvilles,' substitute Lincolns, Chases, and Sumners—for religious war, substitute war to make men in a State of one political mind, and instead of Scotland as an example, make it the South, and we have an illustration to our hand of the folly of this civil war. Yet in the midst of all the warnings of history, that are just as forcible in regard to political wars as religious, these madmen of this nineteenth century push blindly on in this political crusade preached by Abolition fanaticism. For four years they have deluded the people with lying tales of imaginary successes. They have 'kept the promise to the ear,' from year to year, of the speedy crushing out of the rebellion, and 'broke it to the hope' of the people. Through the agencies of official patronage, whose pensioners are numbered by the million, and by the auxiliaries of military force and fraud, they have been enabled to secure a lease of power for four years more.—Philadelphia Age.

George P. Thompson.—For our part, we hope that, during his present visit, the Hon. George Thompson will be thoroughly lionised. We commend him to the attention of all who feel towards him any gratitude for his agency in placing our country in its present position. When people are resolved to worship an ass or an onion, an ape or a crocodile, there is little use in reasoning with them. The better way is to let them worship to their heart's content. Their rituals and incense will not convert the ass into a deity, nor the onion into a superintending Providence. The ape will remain an ape, and a crocodile a crocodile, in spite of their hymns and prostrations. We commend the Hon. George Thompson to the reverence particularly of the Gazette. The hierophant is exactly fitted for the deity and the deity to the hierophant; and if neither will help much to exalt and honour, so it will be out of the power of either much to belittle or disgrace the other.—Cincinnati Enquirer.

Sherman's Strategy.—Thirty days have elapsed since Sherman started upon his expedition, and he must now be near the end of his journey. If we fail to hear of him before the next change of the moon, through Confederate sources, the Yankee papers will be sure to contain something from him by the way of the coast of the sensational and exaggerated style. We hope, therefore, that whatever news from Savannah reaches the War Department during the next day or two will be given to the public. Whatever he may do now will have little effect on the fortunes of the war. His campaign may yet furnish additional material for Yankee brag, but has attained no strategical object beyond the ruin of a belt of country a couple of miles wide, between Atlanta and the sea, and his presence on the seacoast is far less injurious and dangerous than either at Chattanooga or Atlanta.—Richmond Examiner.

Slavery not a 'Casus Belli.'—The Southern masses have been made to believe that the North has been fighting to destroy slavery, to overthrow State rights, and to subjugate and degrade Southern whites. All this is false. The North, though it may destroy slavery in waging war, does not wage war to destroy slavery. There is nothing about slavery that would prevent the North from making peace to-morrow if it could. It is quite willing to leave the whole disposal of that subject to future peaceful and constitutional action. In no form or degree is the adherence of the South to slavery a part of our casus belli.—New York Times.

War with England.—Neither the British lion nor the Canadian jackal desires to feel the beak and talons of the American eagle. We are nearly through with our civil war, and are just in the condition for a foreign conflict. No commerce remains for us to lose. Foreign goods enough to last us half a dozen years are already in our possession. Our immense army and navy are ready for immediate service. England and Canada are aware of these facts, and consequently they do not wish to fight.—New York Herald.

THE LIVERPOOL BAZAAR.

THE following is the correspondence with reference to the proposed distribution of the proceeds of the Liverpool Bazaar to the Southern prisoners, and the refusal of the United States Government to permit such distribution:—

Wortley Hall, November 12.

Your Excellency,—A bazaar has been held in St. George's Hall, Liverpool, to provide a fund for the relief of Southern prisoners of war. It has produced a clear sum of about 17,000*l.* In preference to any attempt to reach the intended object by circuitous means, a committee of English gentlemen has been formed to address you on the subject.

As chairman of this committee, I venture to ask your Excellency to request the permission of your Government that an accredited agent may be sent out to visit the military prisons within the Northern States, and minister to the comfort of those for whom this fund is intended, under such supervision as your Government may direct.

Permit me to state that no political end is aimed at by this movement. It has received support from many who are opposed to the political action of the South.

Nor is it intended to impute that the Confederate prisoners are denied such attention as the ordinary rules enjoin. But those rules are narrow and stern. Winter is at hand, and the clothing which may satisfy the rules of war will not protect the natives of a warm climate from the severe cold of the North.

Sir, the issue of this great contest will not be determined by individual suffering, be it greater or less; and you, whose family name is interwoven with American history, cannot view with indifference the suffering of American citizens, whatever their state or their opinions.

On more than one occasion aid has been proffered by the people of one country to special classes under great affliction in another. May it not be permitted to us to follow these examples, especially when those we desire to solace are beyond the reach of their immediate kinsmen? I trust these precedents and the voice of humanity may plead with your Excellency and induce you to prefer to the Government of the United States the request I have the honour to submit.

I am, Sir, your most obedient servant,

The Hon. C. F. Adams. WHARNCLIFFE.

Legation of the United States, Nov. 10.

My Lord,—I have the honour to acknowledge the reception of your letter of the 12th inst., asking me to submit to the consideration of my Government a request of certain English gentlemen, made through your Lordship, to send out an accredited agent to visit the military prisoners held by the United States, and afford them such aid additional to that extended by the ordinary rules of war as may be provided by the fund which has been raised here for the purpose.

I am very sure that it has never been the desire of my Government to treat with unnecessary or vindictive severity any of the misguided individuals, parties in this deplorable rebellion, who have fallen into their hands in the regular course of war. I should greatly rejoice were the effects of your sympathy extended to the ministering to the mental ailment not less than the bodily sufferings of these unfortunate persons, thus contributing to put an end to a struggle which otherwise is too likely to be only procrastinated by your labours.

Be this as it may, I shall be happy to promote any humane endeavours to alleviate the horrors of this strife, and in that sense shall very cheerfully comply with your Lordship's desire, so far as to transmit by the earliest opportunity to my Government a copy of the application which has been addressed to me.

I beg your Lordship to receive the assurance of my distinguished consideration. CHARLES FRANCIS ADAMS.

Legation of the United States, London,
December 20.

My Lord,—I have the honour to inform you that I have submitted to the consideration of my Government a copy of your Lordship's note to me of November 12, and of my reply of the 18th of that month, and I have now to apprise you of the conclusion which has been reached.

I am instructed to say that permission for an agent of the committee described by your Lordship to visit the insurgents detained in the military prisons of the United States, and to distribute among them 17,000*l.* of British gold, cannot be granted.

I am sorry to be further constrained to signify to your Lordship that with this note my correspondence on this subject must be brought to a close.

I have the honour to be, my Lord, your Lordship's most obedient servant, CHARLES FRANCIS ADAMS.

To the Lord Wharncliffe.

Mr. Seward replies as follows to the application received through Mr. Adams:—

Department of State, Washington, December 5.

Sir,—I have received your despatch of November 18, No. 807, together with the papers therein mentioned, viz., a copy of a letter which was addressed to you on November 12 last by Lord Wharncliffe, and a copy of your answer to that letter. You will now inform Lord Wharncliffe that permission for an agent of the committee described by him to visit the insurgents detained in the military prisons of the United States, and to distribute among them 17,000*l.* of British gold, is disallowed. Here it is expected that your correspondence with Lord Wharncliffe will end.

That correspondence will necessarily become public. On reading it the American public will be well aware that while the United States have ample means for the support of the prisoners, as well as for every other exigency of the war in which they are engaged, the insurgents, who have blindly rushed into that condition, are suffering no privations that that appeal for relief to charity, either at home or abroad. The American people will be likely to reflect that the sum thus insidiously headed in the name of humanity constitutes no large portion of the profits which its contributors may be justly supposed to have derived from the insurgents, by exchanging with them arms and munitions of war, for the productions of immoral and enervating slave labour, nor will any portion of the American people be disposed to regard the sum thus ostentatiously offered for the relief of captured insurgents as a too generous equivalent for the devastation and dissolution which a civil war, promoted and protracted by British subjects, has spread throughout the States, which before were eminently prosperous and happy. Finally, in view of this last officious intervention in our domestic affairs, the American people can hardly fail to recall the warning of the father of our country directed against two great and intimately-connected public dangers—namely, sectional faction and foreign intrigue. I do not think the insurgents have become debased, though they have sadly wandered from the ways of loyalty and patriotism. I think that in common with all our countrymen they will rejoice in being saved by their considerate and loyal Government from the grave insult which Lord Wharncliffe and his associates, in their zeal for the overthrow of the United States, have prepared for the victims of this unnatural and hopeless rebellion.—I am, sir, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

The following letter has appeared in the Times with reference to the same subject:—

To the Editor of the Times.

Sir,—Will you oblige me by inserting the following correspondence? As I feel precluded from writing to Mr. Adams in reply to the contents of Mr. Seward's despatch, I take this opportunity of answering some of its statements.

Mr. Seward asserts that the Confederate prisoners are not suffering unusual privations. This leads me to quote the following extracts from a letter published in the Northern papers, bearing date October 14, and written by a Unionist of New England, whose name in full is at the foot of it:—

'From every prison in the North, from Rock Island to Fort Warren, goes out this wail of suffering humanity. . . . Those 1,500 pale faces are before me as I saw them pass me at the depot. Those ghastly, pleading faces!—I saw them here again, saw the pile of dead—dead from want of nourishing food. . . . Hot tears of shame for my countrymen who permit these outrages upon humanity, tears of pity for these poor sufferers blind my eyes.'

Testimony of this kind has arrived continuously in this country. If believed to be true, it naturally creates a desire to alleviate such misery. If untrue, the best means to disprove it would be the visit of a third party, who, accompanied by witnesses, would report the whole facts. This test Mr. Seward declines.

Mr. Seward would make it appear that the sum obtained at the bazaar was mainly contributed by those who had been engaged in trade with the South. So far from this being the case, contributions were received from all parts of the United Kingdom, from the Continent, Canada, even from the Northern States. The movement originated with, and was all but entirely carried out by, the Southern ladies now in England. It cannot be supposed that these ladies are engaged in foreign trade, or that out of more than 10,000 persons who attended and contributed to the result there could be any appreciable proportion who had any concern in the trade of the South.

I cannot pretend to understand what Mr. Seward means by the assertion that the war was promoted by British subjects. If they or other foreigners have protracted it, are not these the Irishmen and Germans who have been induced by Northern agents to take a part in it? Is it not probable that without their aid, so eagerly sought, the war would have been over before this time?

If either side has wandered from loyalty and patriotism, is it not rather the North, whose loyalty to its Constitution is now exchanged for obedience to a despotic Government, and whose patriotism is now exhibited in the destruction of fellow-countrymen because they assert that right to self-government which has ever been declared inherent in all the people of America?

To Mr. Seward's epithets 'unnatural and hopeless,' as applied to the action of the South, it might be replied that when the people of the North were rebels against those to whom they owed existence there was really something 'unnatural' in the fact; and it might be added that, at the end of a similar period, their prospects were hopeless indeed if contrasted with the position of the Southern armies this day. Mr. Seward, however, appears still to cling to the fallacy so often exploded already—that the affair will be over in ninety days.

As to the attempt to represent the efforts of the Southern ladies on behalf of their suffering brothers as a 'grave insult' to their own people, it cannot be a proper employment of your columns to reply to matters so unworthy. I have only further to assure your readers that the refusal of the Federal Government will not practically affect the distribution of the fund, for which, unhappily, we can find but too many recipients. I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

Wortley Hall, December 24. WHARNCLIFFE.

The following letter has appeared in the Morning Post:—

To the Editor of the Morning Post.

Sir,—Mr. Adams, the (so-called) United States Minister to this country, observes in his first note to Lord Wharncliffe just made public: 'I am very sure that it has never been the desire of my Government to treat with unnecessary or vindictive severity any of the misguided individuals, parties in this deplorable rebellion, who have fallen into their hands in the regular course of war.' Let me ask, can it be really possible that Mr. Adams puts a grammatical, and not a diplomatic, construction upon the sentiment he utters, or that he is positively, and not affectedly, ignorant of the wide-spread opinion to the contrary which obtains—an opinion as rife throughout the Continent as in Great Britain?

While in the Northern States and in Canada, from which I have for the third time just returned, I have fallen in with many Southern soldiers who had been incarcerated in Federal bastiles for long and short periods. They have repeated to me the same unvarying tale of cruelty and inhumanity. Some have actually wept in relating their sufferings and the refinement of torture to which it was their misfortune to have been subjected. I have now before me a short autobiographical sketch of each of the St. Alban's raiders, handed to me by the prisoners upon my last visit to them in Montreal gaol. Several of these men had been captured 'in the regular course of war,' and incarcerated in Fort Warren, Camp Chase, and that worst of Yankee prisons, Camp Douglas, Illinois. The tale they severally tell is sickening and heartrending. It irrefragably demonstrates that 'the misguided individuals' to whom Mr. Adams so pathetically refers have been treated both with 'unnecessary' and 'vindictive severity.' Unfortunately what is true of some of the St. Alban's raiders is likewise true of many hundreds of their fellow Confederates and captives. In July, 1863, Lieutenant Bennett Young, of General Morgan's staff, was captured with some of his comrades. Upon being transferred from Camp Chase to Camp Douglas, Young was confined with twenty other Southerners in an iron cell within a dungeon. The dimensions of the cell were but eight feet by ten feet. Herein he was incarcerated for three weeks, fed upon bad bread and water and salt meat, and deprived of everything that could conduce to comfort, decency, and cleanliness. He thus recounts his first experiences:—'In a few hours after I was shut up here the terrible agonies incidental to suffocation began to make their appearance. A weight of a thousand pounds seemed to crush my breast, and I gasped as a fish when removed from its native element.' Another raider (likewise one of General Morgan's men) was imprisoned for seven months in Camp Morton. This he describes as 'a temporary hell, where I was subjected, together with 500 of my fellow-soldiers, to every nefarious atrocity and indignity which the Northern Vandals are ever ready to invent. Owing to the malicious treatment I received, and when death seemed inevitable, I determined upon a plan whereby I should escape from the thraldom of tyrants. I did not dread the hazard, for speedy death was far preferable to waning life in such a place.' This is the general burden of every statement made to me by Southern prisoners of war who had effected their escape by one stratagem or another. And I must say that I received implicitly their startling accounts of the worse than heathenish barbarities and cruel bondage which they had undergone—barbarities unrelieved by even the faintest semblance of mercy, and a bitter bondage unsweetened by a word or look of human pity.

Possibly the Northern treatment of Confederate prisoners has changed for the better since 1863. Charity would have caused me to hope that such a long-delayed consummation had at length taken place, but for the instructions received from Mr. Seward by the American Minister in London, declining, in no very diplomatic or polite language, to allow the funds raised in Liverpool to be appropriated to the relief of Southern prisoners in the Federal States. That act speaks volumes. It clearly indicates that no sympathy exists by the captors for the captured; that charity towards a suffering enemy (and even the exercise of it by neutral nations) is no part of American Christianity; and, finally, that there is no desire to abate one jot or tittle of the misery and wretchedness which those festering, foul dungeons of the North so prolifically engender.

I am, Sir, yours very truly,

London, Dec. 26. S. PHILLIPS DAY.

The following extract is from the Times:—

A number of persons residing in England, made up in a grea measure of the families of Southerners who have sought refuge from civil war in Europe, and assisted by contributions from all parts of the United Kingdom, from the Continent, from Canada, and even from the Northern States themselves, have raised by means of a bazaar a sum of 17,000*l.* for the relief of Southern prisoners in the hands of the North. As chairman of the committee Lord Wharncliffe, showing, as it would seem, only a proper respect for the Federal Government, proposes to the American Minister in this country to send some one out to minister to the wants of these unhappy persons, under such supervision and regulation as the American Government may see fit to appoint. The offer is referred by the American Minister to his own Government, and is flatly refused, with an intimation, couched in the most peremptory terms, that all communications on the subject will thenceforth absolutely cease.

Now, if the matter rested there, we think it would be impossible to avoid holding the Government of the United States guilty of some inhumanity and equally uncalled-for discourtesy. They would have done all in their power to prevent relief from reaching a class of human beings but lately their fellow-citizens, and whom it is the whole end and aim of the fearful policy in which they have embarked to compel to become their fellow-citizens again—relief which, while it would certainly do the prisoners in their hands much good, could not in any possible way do them or their cause any harm.

Men may differ, not unreasonably, as to the propriety of Lord Wharncliffe's offer. It may be considered officious, but we cannot see that it was wrong to raise money for this any more than for any other benevolent purpose—for the assistance, for instance, of Northern prisoners in the hands of the South; and, conceding that there was nothing wrong in raising the fund, we know no way in which it could be so properly expended as by an agent of the donors under the supervision of the Northern Government. It was necessary at any rate to make such an offer to obviate the suspicion that the subscription was only a cloak for practices tending to the release of the prisoners, or in some way interfering with the right of their captors. Nothing can be more frank or explicit than the letter of Lord Wharncliffe to Mr. Adams. He describes the origin of the fund, the purpose for which it has been raised, requests the co-operation of the United States' Government in a work of mercy, disclaims all political objects and all imputations upon the manner in which the American Government has treated its prisoners, and points out that great comfort might be obtained by the purchase of warm clothing for persons unused to the severe winter of the North. It is only due to Mr. Adams to say that his answer is worthy of a gentleman and a man of humanity. He disclaims on behalf of his Government any unnecessary or vindictive severity. He cannot, indeed, avoid suggesting—though not, we think, with much point or effect—that the sum might be as well employed in ministering to the minds as to the bodies of the Confederate prisoners; but, without following this further, Mr. Adams professes his willingness to promote any humane endeavours to alleviate the horrors of the strife, and in that sense is very happy to transmit the letter of Lord Wharncliffe to his Government.

It is upon this correspondence that the letter of Mr. Seward is founded. Permission for an agent of the committee 'to visit the Southern prisons of the United States, and distribute among them seventeen thousand pounds of British gold,' is disallowed, and here it is expected that the correspondence with Lord Wharncliffe is to end. Mr. Seward did quite right, considering the tone he has chosen to adopt, in preventing a reply, the first words of which would, of course, have told him that the proposal was not to distribute seventeen thousand pounds of British gold among the prisoners, but to minister to their comfort, not by direct gifts of money, but by purchasing and dividing among them such articles of necessity as their situation might render needful. The sting of the whole matter lay in the words, 'The correspondence will necessarily become public;' and if left on the footing on which it was left by Mr. Adams and Lord Wharncliffe, it would certainly seem as if the American Government were actuated by the very spirit of inhumanity and vindictiveness which Mr. Adams on their behalf so earnestly and so honourably disclaims. As the public must read it, Mr. Seward is determined they shall read it and decide on it.

THE MERCY OF ROSECRANS.—Miss Sarah Jane Smith, of Arkansas, who was sentenced to be hung by the neck until dead, for cutting the telegraph wire near Springfield, Missouri, has had her sentence commuted by General Rosecrans to imprisonment during the war. The day of her execution was fixed for Friday, but owing to her physical condition she will be permitted to live a little longer. The girl is quite young—said to be under seventeen.—New York Day-Book.

TO OUR FRIENDS AND SUBSCRIBERS.

THE INDEX was established in May 1862, in the darkest hour of Confederate fortunes, by earnest friends of Southern Independence, with the distinctly expressed object of being the representative, in English journalism, of a gallant and struggling people appealing to the world not only for political, but still more for moral recognition. Since accepting this great trust, THE INDEX has unceasingly laboured, by the combined aid of English and of Southern writers, to enlarge and extend the common ground upon which two nations may cordially meet, which need only to understand each other in order to cherish the warmest mutual appreciation and lasting friendship. The chief and almost the sole difficulty has been, and is still, the callous indifference of the British Government on the one hand, and, on the other, the perplexity, to the European mind, of the unsolved and unprecedented problems involved in the management and education of four millions of the African race, intermingled with a population of the highest Caucasian type. This difficulty could be met only by a liberal fairness to every shade of honest opinion, by an inflexible adherence to truth under all circumstances, and by a bold avowal of convictions, even though ill received. THE INDEX does not claim to be neutral, but it claims to be independent in the highest sense of that word. It is because it must reflect and appeal to, at one and the same time, the public opinion of two countries as yet only imperfectly acquainted, that this somewhat unusual self-description is called for.

Thanks to arrangements now in successful operation, by which the Letters of regular Correspondents and Newspapers from all parts of the Confederate States are received within from twenty-five to thirty days from their date, THE INDEX is always enabled to present the very Latest Direct News from the South, as well as a faithful reflex of the tone and spirit of the Southern Press.

All communications intended for publication should invariably be addressed to 'the Editor of THE INDEX, 291 Strand, W.C.,' and unless authenticated by a responsible name, can receive no attention.

Advertisements should be sent and Money Orders made payable to J. B. HOPKINS, INDEX Office.

THE INDEX.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 29, 1864.

The Close of the Year.

As the year approaches its end, the mind is insensibly drawn to the contemplation of the events which have illustrated the page of history, or filled the ears of men during the progress of the four seasons. An effort that is a matter of course in ordinary times, and under circumstances of ordinary import, gathers force under the stimulating power of mighty actions. Pain is varied by pleasure in the contemplation of triumphs achieved and defeats suffered, in the presence of deeds that cheer the soul with just admiration, or fire the spirit with irrepressible indignation. When vice and folly, wrong and cruelty, gain the upper hand, despair is averted only by an abiding faith; and when that which is believed to be the juster cause prevails, joy is restrained only by the deep sense of gratitude.

The man who can behold with indifference the struggle of a nation for independence, for life, and for liberty, has probably long ago lost all passion for those things which make existence endurable. For just as the contemplation of virtue is prompted by the spectacle of its development in a virtuous person, so is the veneration for wisdom and devotion, for freedom and the love of country, best learned in the conduct of patriots whose prudence is only surpassed by their courage. As then we affirm that the people of the Confederate States are waging war in the cause most dear to Englishmen, namely, the cause of constitutional liberty, so do we regard the action of the statesmen, the generals, and the soldiery—in fact, the action of the whole populace, men, women, and children, of the Southern States—not only as worthy of deep admiration, but as proving that the virtue of their race, transplanted far from the cradle of its birth, yet towers high above that of all other men.

A glance at the scenes enacted during the past year on the American continent, as each part of the drama of war followed in rapid succession, serves to prove that the Confederacy is at this moment stronger at every point than she was twelve months ago. Her armies are more numerous as compared with the Northern hordes; her material is more abundant and more perfect; she has undergone such a system of organisation that her territory is a camp and her people an army; her finance is being managed with such skill that if the war continue but one year more, the reestablishment of a sound condition may be coincident with the collapse of her enemy, while her moral position in the eyes of Europe stands out with improved solidity. It is not only that her military successes have gained her respect, but that the tranquillity and unanimity of her citizens, the regard for the law and the cohesive power of her constitution have extorted acknowledgment even from those that pray for her destruction. It is unnecessary to dwell on the campaigns of the past year. The victory on the Red River, probably the most decisive of the war, freed Louisiana, Texas, and Arkansas even from the apprehension of attack, and the success was enhanced not only by the skill with which it was achieved, but also by the anticipated triumphs of BANKS and the Federal army. Next SHERMAN, by a rapid incursion into Alabama and a yet more rapid retreat, added lustre to his foes. When GRANT, with his enormous host, crossed the Rapidan in his grand march upon Richmond, with BUTLER cooperating on the James River, and two corps d'armée advancing upon Lynchburg, even those who knew that armies of heroes were on the defence scarcely dared to hope for victory. Yet BUTLER's army of 40,000 men was beaten by the boys and old men of the city, the Western advance was ignominiously repulsed, and GRANT himself left 50,000 men on the field before he executed his final flank movement into winter quarters before Petersburg. The autumnal campaigns brought a triumph to the arms of the Union in the Shenandoah Valley and in Georgia; but the victory of SHERIDAN, achieved by the negligence of his foe, and not by the valour of his own army, was utterly fruitless, while the capture of Atlanta has resulted in the freedom of Alabama from the enemy. THOMAS, with one-half of the Federal army of the West, is shut up in Nashville, and the other half has marched through Georgia, only to fail in the accomplishment of the only purpose that could possibly be of advantage—namely, the destruction of Macon and Augusta. In the course of these campaigns, which have recovered for the Confederacy two-thirds of the territory held at the close of the year 1863 by the enemy, and which have added incalculable lustre to the arms of the South, great losses have been incurred. The immensity of region, the exuberant fertility of soil, the activity and resource of the people, their amazing vitality have been able to endure these losses and to look forward to greater sacrifices with equanimity. Nevertheless the memory of such leaders as POLK and STUART, of the brave Texan General GREEN, of the gallant Louisianian General MOUTON, of WIRT ADAMS, RAMSEUR, and, lastly, of CLEBURNE, forcibly demonstrates the price at which liberty is to be bought. While, however, the dead are lamented, the living heroes are not to be forgotten. What can obliterate from the annals of the war the names of BRECKENRIDGE and EARLY, of HOOD and of FORREST, of MAGRUDER and TAYLOR, above all of BEAUREGARD, LONGSTREET, and LEE? Indeed, mention of the name of the first general of the South calls up the lines that so aptly describe not only the man, but the country which has produced him:—

> Quæ cum magna modis multis miranda videtur
> Gentibus humanis regio visendaque fertur,
> Rebus opima bonis, multa munita virûm vi,
> Nil tamen hoc habuisse viro præclarius in se
> Nec sanctum magis et mirum carumque videtur.

If, however, the skill and devotion of the armies have made the past year illustrious in the history of the Confederacy, the prudence and integrity of the civil rulers have earned the respect of the world. Under strong temptations, in spite of wrongs which would have infuriated the passions even of admirable men, the rulers of the South have followed a path of calm moderation; the cruelty of the foe has been requited by forbearance, the indifference of the foreigner by dignified courtesy. If General LEE has been bold and wary in the field, Mr. DAVIS has been discreet and prudent in the council-chamber.

The career of the Confederacy has moreover received marked tokens of sympathy and admiration from Europe. Those feelings have revealed themselves at times in acts of benevolence and Christian generosity, but their chief development has consisted in the steady progress of favour wherewith the cause of the South has been regarded. In England the action of the press approximates to unanimity, and although men with loud tongues and little influence have proclaimed on platforms their adhesion to the North, yet their followers constitute a mere section of the nation. Our columns, as they bear continued evidence of the tone of the French press, furnish proof that every week strengthens the cause of the Confederacy in the eyes of France. Even Germany is no longer obdurate, while Italy appreciates justly the merits of the struggle. For ourselves, if, while regarding events which have convulsed the world, we may speak of ourselves, our duty has been to elucidate truth not only in matters of fact, but in subjects of political and social enquiry; to expose attempts to varnish a career of rapine and oppression with the sacred names of freedom and peace; to uphold constitutional liberty; and to support that organisation which, while assigning to every being his proper grade in the ranks of society, promotes the happiness and prosperity of all, and binds the members of a community together in the bonds of mutual obligation. For such privileges, as opposed to the levelling and degrading tyranny of the republicanism of the North, the men of the South have contended. What effort of brute force can overcome the champions of such a cause?

Neutrals and Belligerents.

WE print this week in another part of our columns a despatch addressed by Mr. J. P. BENJAMIN, the Secretary of State at Richmond, to Mr. S. R. MALLORY, the Secretary of the Navy, on the rights of Confederate ships of war as against hostile and neutral vessels captured on the high seas. The document, to which the subject of comment lends importance, is marked by great perspicuity of style and by proof of legal ability in the writer. Every contingency and every difficulty which can be encountered by the commander of a cruiser in the exercise of his duty is contemplated, and full instructions are suggested for action in each particular case. Therefore, whatever opinion may be formed of the justice of Mr. BENJAMIN's policy, want of notice cannot be urged by any sufferer of an imaginary grievance.

The circumstances which called forth the despatch are worthy of attention. Admiral Sir J. HOPE, commanding HER MAJESTY'S Atlantic squadron, had received intelligence of the burning by the Alabama of the ship Martaban, a vessel, as the Admiral affirmed, standing on the British register, and bearing British papers. Thereupon Sir J. HOPE addressed a confidential communication to Lieutenant MORRIS, commanding the Confederate ship Florida, at that time lying at St. George's, Bermuda, the object of which communication was to obtain a written assurance from Lieutenant MORRIS to forbear from any act similar to the burning of the Martaban. In answer thereto Lieutenant MORRIS announced his intention of allowing all vessels producing legal papers proving their neutrality to pass in accordance with instructions from the Government at Richmond. It is unnecessary to comment at any length on the communication of Admiral HOPE. It is clear that the writer had but little confidence in the legality of the positions assumed, and that his only anxiety was to check the action of the Florida pending the reception of instructions from London. Two points may, however, be briefly noticed. The care with which officers in command of Confederate vessels of war had avoided giving just cause of offence to neutrals was warmly acknowledged, probably on account of the contrast with those aggressions and outrages of the other belligerent, against which constant and unavailing remonstrances have been uttered for the last three years. By way, however, of some return for this care, and to show his appreciation of the forbearance of the Confederate Government, Admiral HOPE proposed to capture and send to England for adjudication in the Admiralty Court every vessel by which a ship with legal British papers had been burned at sea. The Admiral is perhaps more at home in a gale of wind or in a fight than in the discussion of a point of law, but it needs not the acumen of Lord STOWELL to discover that the ship of war of a belligerent is not amenable to the Admiralty Court of a foreign Power, and that the seizure of a ship of war for such a purpose is a declaration of war. It is, however, pretty certain that the Home Government had no intention of supporting the heresy of the Admiral, and that the spectacle of an alliance of England and Mr. LINCOLN'S Government for the suppression of the Confederacy is at present not to be expected.

The whole question at issue between the belligerent and the neutral is cut down to the method of dealing with neutral bottoms tainted with illegality and hostile bottoms falsely claiming neutral privileges. It is clearly impossible for Confederate cruisers to carry their prizes into Confederate ports for adjudication; on the other hand, the neutral Powers have closed their ports against the prizes of both belligerents. Either, then, a Confederate cruiser must discharge a vessel belonging to one or other of the above-named classes in breach of duty to its own country, or it must destroy such vessel and incur the risk of infringing a neutral right. The dilemma has been created entirely by the action of England and France, and those Powers may therefore be fairly held estopped from complaint. But it is not the wish of the Richmond Government to forfeit its high reputation for equitable conduct towards other Powers, and the whole action of the State Department has been directed to the reconciliation of these conflicting claims. They are considered under Classes B, C, D in the printed despatch, and although the instructions suggested for the guidance of the Confederate officers are models of fairness, yet it is evident that Mr. BENJAMIN is not satisfied with the results at which he has arrived, and anxiously desires a solution more in accordance with that consideration for the rights of neutrals which prompted the Confederate Administration to accede and adhere to the Paris Declaration. He desires that HER MAJESTY'S Government should open the ports of England to prizes made by Confederate ships in all cases in which British claimants assert title to vessel or cargo, there to remain until the Admiralty Courts of the Confederacy have exercised their rightful exclusive jurisdiction over the prize questions involved in such captures. Indeed, apart from the strong inducement offered for such a policy by the interests of British subjects, the English Government has, through the conduct of its own people, incurred a strong obligation to accede to the proposition of Mr. BENJAMIN. In cases contemplated under Classes B and C in the despatch, the claims of neutrals are affected in the manner inseparable from a state of war. But Class D raises questions having their foundation in a state of facts almost unprecedented in the annals of war. Enterprising shipowners belonging to the Northern States have transferred their vessels to the British register by the simple expedient of a false sale coupled with a false oath on the part of the transferee. Inasmuch then as the origin of the mischief created lies entirely with British subjects, who have not scrupled for the sake of gain to break the laws of England in aid of the one belligerent and to the detriment of the rights of the other belligerent, it is but just that England should assist in stopping the evil which she has herself caused. Indeed, the conclusion of the despatch proves not only that the British Admiral is aware of the scandal of these 'white-washed' ships, but also that he has recognised the policy proposed by Mr. BENJAMIN as a just remedy. There is reason for thinking that M. DROUYN DE LHUYS has given in the adhesion of the French Government to that policy, on condition of a similar act on the part of England. It is impossible to imagine that the proposition, backed by the support of France, will meet with refusal at the hands of a Power whose interests are more nearly touched, and whose character for equitable conduct is more deeply involved.

The War.

THE last mail from America bore, on the face of the telegram, about the heaviest news that has been received from the Confederacy this year. Happily, we are in a position to assert with tolerable confidence that one half is false, and the other half so highly coloured as to deprive it of the painful importance at first attached to it. The two great features of the news are the alleged capture of Savannah and the reported defeat of HOOD. It is strange that they should have so easily deceived the English public. We will take the Savannah canard first. It originated with a paper published at Baltimore, on the strength of a report furnished by a nameless individual at Fortress Monroe, from a transport which left Charleston Bar on the 14th instant. This can hardly be considered very satisfactory evidence, even if uncontradicted. But the Richmond papers publish news up to a later date than any intelligence that could have been received at Charleston Bar on the 14th, and in their columns not a word is said as to the capture of Savannah, or even its attack. What facts the Richmond papers do give decidedly negative the assault and capture, for they report the storming and capture of Fort M'Allister, sixteen miles to the south-west of Savannah, on the Ogeechee River, on the 14th inst.; and it is absurd to suppose that SHERMAN would have marched with his whole army fifteen miles away from Savannah for the capture of a solitary fort, and march fifteen miles back and then capture Savannah after eight hours' fighting, in the course of twenty-four hours. Savannah is a strongly-fortified town, standing on a very easily defensible site. Its communications with Charleston, and therefore with Virginia, are intact. Its garrison is said to consist of a force numerically equal to SHERMAN'S. To suppose that he would attack such a town with his jaded troops is to suppose him mad; and to believe that in eight hours, without siege artillery, he had compelled General HARDEE with 10,000 men to surrender, is to display an amount of belief hardly to be expected, even in this age of eager credulity. All that is certain is, that SHERMAN has reached the sea and opened communication with DAHLGREN'S fleet; that he has obtained a point of egress; and that what is left of his army is safe. Safety and not conquest was his first object. The former he has in all probability attained by the capture of Fort M'Allister; the latter, we venture to assert, he will not be in a position to achieve for some time to come.

The news from Nashville does not rest on so debatable a basis, but it is evidently exaggerated. According to the Federal accounts, General THOMAS on the 15th made an attack upon the Confederate line, had captured vast quantities of material, sixteen guns, and 1,000 prisoners, and driven back the left wing of HOOD'S army some eight miles, with the loss of five hundred men. The weight of the attack appears to have been directed against that portion of the army which blockaded the Cumberland River, west of Nashville, and here, no doubt, the Federal gunboats obtained a success for General THOMAS'S army. But it must be observed that no mention is made of a general attack, so that there is no reason to believe that the position of the centre and right of HOOD'S army was in any way endangered. The whole affair seems to have been rather a successful sortie than a great battle, and it is evident that if another engagement took place on the subsequent day, it would come off under very different conditions. The Federals would lose the aid of their gunboats, and they would have to assault and carry earthworks defended by veteran soldiers. Moreover a few hours would suffice to recall FORREST with his cavalry, and give the Confederates a vast superiority in that arm. General THOMAS has not often had occasion to make independent reports to his Government. But we have invariably noticed that when he does write a despatch it is highly inventive, and we quite expect that the arrival of the Cunard steamer will show a very different version of the matter. It cannot be denied, however, that HOOD'S position was a weak one. He must have occupied a line some seven miles in extent. He had despatched one division and all his cavalry to Murfreesboro'; another division had gone northward into Kentucky. The force with which he had partially invested Nashville could not, consequently, have much exceeded the command of General THOMAS; and we question the prudence of holding such an extended line with his greatly reduced strength. Of the subsequent battle of the 16th we cannot speak with much certainty. According to unofficial reports, THOMAS had gained a great victory, had driven HOOD from all his intrenched positions, captured 3,000 prisoners and 50 cannon—in fact, routed the Confederate army. The story is improbable, to say the least of it; but if HOOD'S intrenched positions have been taken, it must have cost the Federals too dearly to admit of a very active pursuit of HOOD'S army, and FORREST'S superiority in cavalry will prevent any disaster. A battle will have been lost, and Nashville will have been saved; but Northern Georgia and Northern Alabama will not the less have been rescued from the invader. As to General CANBY'S flourish of trumpets about the severance of HOOD'S communications with Mobile, it is simply absurd. HOOD drew neither men nor material from Mobile any more than he did from Richmond, and General WARREN might with almost as much reason have boasted of cutting his communications with Petersburg. But CANBY'S despatch is a fair specimen of Yankee brag. We are not without hope that THOMAS'S victory of the 16th will turn out, like SCHOFIELD'S triumph at Franklin, a very doubtful affair. The public has so often heard of Confederate armies 'routed and demoralised' which a week afterwards have struck a vigorous and successful blow at the enemy, that it will be slow to believe in the pleasing prospect held up by a Federal organ in this country of General THOMAS reoccupying Southern territory as far South as 'the Etowah river.'

Federal Finance.

Mr. FESSENDEN as a financier differs from Mr. CHASE in two essential respects. Neither of them is a sound political economist; but whereas Mr. CHASE had doctrines of his own on economical questions very different from those generally received in the world, Mr. FESSENDEN looks at his business and the questions it involves with the eye of a man of business, and takes, not an economist's, but a merchant's view of his situation. Mr. CHASE was wont to congratulate the country on the fictitious prosperity derived from war prices and an inflated currency; on the high wages which barely compensated the depreciation of paper; on the lavish expenditure which told of commercial rottenness, and speculation superseding trade; in fact, on all that an economist would understand as symptoms of the most fatal character. Mr. FESSENDEN does not explain the delusive nature of a prosperity the semblance whereof is beginning to fade, nor does he thoroughly understand the nature of a 'specie basis' or the 'theory of currency;' but at all events he has a sound mercantile dislike of paper money that only professes to be convertible at a distant date and on a dubious contingency, and which is by no means certain to be promptly paid at maturity. 'It could not be helped' is all he has to say for a device of which his predecessor was boastful; and the instrument which Mr. CHASE preferred to heavy loans or severe taxation, Mr. FESSENDEN recognises as 'fraught with danger.' And there is yet another distinction between their characters. Mr. CHASE, who had probably determined from the first not to abide the crash, but retire in good time, never hesitated to promise the brightest and happiest prospects in the future, and held out hopes which he must have known were doomed to dire disappointment, in order to secure for himself a brief popularity and immediate confidence. Mr. FESSENDEN is not so sure that he will find a successor to accept the burden of his errors, and the inevitable consequences of a policy for which, after all, neither he nor Mr. CHASE is personally responsible; and he does not choose to exasperate the storm of wrath which he must one day encounter by asserting to the last that everything is going as well as possible, and that the distant horizon is clear and cloudless. If he do not openly speak of possible bankruptcy and an impending loss of public credit, he furnishes facts the meaning of which every one who knows anything of financial business may read for himself. And he abstains from anticipating, like his predecessor, a speedy end to the war. In former Messages Mr. LINCOLN predicted peace before the next meeting of Congress, and Mr. CHASE'S budgets suggested a similar hope; in this Message the PRESIDENT fixes no term for the submission of the South and the execution of Mr. DAVIS and General LEE by order of a drumhead court-martial; and the tone of Mr. FESSENDEN'S report is that of one who expects that at this time next year he will have to provide a budget for yet another year of war. The expenditure of this year will be so much; that of the next year so much more; the debt will be so much next July, and so much more in July, 1866. The SECRETARY of the TREASURY is preparing for a long war; and Wall Street, looking at the future through the medium of his report, sees a long vista of years with an annual addition of 100,000,000*l.* to the debt, and an annual expenditure of about as much on the army—divided between the pay of soldiers and the spoils of loyal contractors. To Republicans of undoubted virtue who stand well in the Presidential favour, the prospect is highly pleasing. Let the finances be at their worst, so long as the Government has anything to buy and sell, they will have a handsome commission thereupon. If the nation should eventually prove bankrupt, it will not be till they have ceased to be its creditors. The masses who rule the country care very little about the matter. Half of them have nothing to lose, and the rest will lose nothing, but rather gain. The poor are safe in any case; the small farmer, who is seldom a holder of stock or money, and not seldom a debtor, is more likely to profit than to suffer by a repudiation which will deliver him from taxes, and a depreciation of the currency which will enable him to pay off a debt of $1,000 with paper worth $400. But the report carries dismay to the hearts of commercial men, who are well aware that the derangement of the public finances rarely fails to derange the action of the money-market; that the country can hardly go on spending three or four times its income for years together without landing itself in bankruptcy; and that, even should they be fortunate enough not to be creditors of the Union, it is hard for private firms to stand erect when the docket of bankruptcy is struck against their Government. Only in a country where extraordinary good fortune has bred a habit of extravagant expectations, and where men extricate themselves from commercial disasters with a facility unknown elsewhere, could the Administration put forth such a report as this without throwing the commercial community into a panic.

Mr. FESSENDEN endorses his predecessor's abuse of the Wall Street speculators. It is they whose disloyal machinations have run up the price of gold, and depreciated the paper of the Government; it is their impious want of confidence in the national cause, their unpatriotic desire to secure themselves against national reverses, that has made a dollar in gold sell for 2½ dollars in paper. All good citizens should use their utmost efforts to counteract such nefarious speculations. It was in precisely the same spirit that ROBESPIERRE and his fellows dealt with those who dared to prefer silver to the assignats of the Government. Mr. FESSENDEN errs in good company. But it is a significant comment on the boasted education of Americans, that a piece of nonsense indicating such profound and extravagant ignorance should proceed from the pen of the Federal SECRETARY of the TREASURY. Speculation can only raise prices above their level for a very short time, and to a trifling extent; and an article like gold, of great abundance and universal demand, is peculiarly incapable of being so dealt with. To suppose that a speculator deliberately raises the price of gold to spite the Government is the folly of a woman or a peasant. The supply of gold being fixed for the time, the price depends on buyers;—and who supposes that a buyer will offer for gold more than it is worth? If he did, he would speedily ruin himself, and the Government would be none the worse. But Mr. FESSENDEN supplies another reason for the enormous depreciation of his paper, independent of the speculators. 'So long as there remains a large and increasing necessity for its use and a limited supply, it will command a price commensurate with the difficulty of obtaining it.' This is not very correct, as applied to gold. In a country with open seaports, the supply of gold is virtually unlimited—it is the supply of all the world; the necessity for it depends on the briskness of trade, and the existence or absence of substitutes for metallic money. In the Northern States at this moment there is an exceptionally small demand for gold. But whatever the demand, the value of gold in one country can never, while the ports are open, be 2 per cent. more than in another. The value of gold in New York is the same as in England; it is the value of paper, then, that regulates the price. And if an English 5*l.* note will buy 5*l.*, and an American $100 note will only buy four eagles ($40), this is simply because redundance and want of security have made American paper worth forty cents the dollar.

How this is we may easily discern. The population of the North and of England are about the same. The trade of England is much busier, though her credit machinery is much better; so that England has probably need of a somewhat larger currency than the North requires. Now the banknote currency of England is about 20,000,000*l.* to 22,000,000*l.*, excluding a small amount of local notes. That of America, besides private notes to a large amount, is 80,000,000*l.* non-interest-bearing notes, and over 20,000,000*l.* of notes bearing interest. It is not wonderful that this enormous overissue, producing a vast repletion, giving the country twice or thrice as much money as its business required, should have depreciated the paper to half its nominal value. Such operations need no aid from speculators. For the difference between 100 and 150 premium, want of confidence in the success and solvency of the Government, and fear of a new issue, is probably answerable.

The Federal Congress meets in December and sits late into the spring. The American financial year begins on July 1. Consequently, each Congress has three budgets to consider—that of the year ended June 30 preceding, that of the current year, and that of the year beginning next July. No Congress has sat since the 30th June last; it is therefore to this Congress that the accounts of last year must be presented. No session will take place after this and before July next; so that the budget of next year must be sanctioned by Congress during this session. And the budget for this year, sanctioned in December last, has, of course, to be overhauled; the more so that Mr. Fessenden's estimates do not coincide with those of his predecessor, adopted by the Congress at this time in 1863. Thus we have the actual accounts of one year, and the estimates of two more, before us. The figures are striking, and the light thrown by comparison upon the estimates enables us better to appreciate their correctness. The following, in round numbers, are the amounts:—

Revenue		Expenditure
Customs	$102,300,000	Civil Service	$27,750,000
Lands and direct	1,060,000	Pensions	7,500,000
Internal	109,700,000	Army	690,800,000
Miscellaneous	47,500,000	Navy	85,700,000
Total	260,500,000	Interest of debt	53,600,000
Deficit	604,900,000
	$865,400,000		$865,400,000

1864-65.

Revenue		Expenditure
Customs	$70,000,000	Civil Service	$21,800,000
Lands and direct	650,000	Pensions	6,600,000
Internal	250,000,000	War	625,000,000
Miscellaneous	24,000,000	Navy, &c.	120,000,000
Total	344,650,000	Interest	92,000,000
Deficit	521,750,000
	$866,400,000		$866,400,000

1865-66.

Revenue.		Expenditure.
Customs	$70,000,000	Civil service	$83,000,000
Land	1,000,000	Pensions, &c.	14,000,000
Internal	300,000,000	Army	532,000,000
Miscellaneous	25,000,000	Navy	112,000,000
	$396,000,000	Interest of debt	127,000,000
Deficit	472,000,000
	$868,000,000		$868,000,000

Rendered into English money, the results of these three years are as follows:—

Year	Revenue	Expenditure	Deficit
1863-4	£52,000,000	£173,000,000	£121,000,000
1864-5	69,000,000	173,000,000	104,000,000
1865-6	79,000,000	173,600,000	94,600,000

It must be remembered that the expenditure is estimated in currency, and that this is enormously depreciated. As the value of paper has varied greatly, and as Mr. Fessenden is likely to have taken its highest rather than its lowest value, we may take the real amount of the Federal expenditure at half the nominal amount, during at least the present year. This would give a real expenditure of 86,500,000*l.*, to which we should add a State expenditure of perhaps some 20,000,000*l.* more. This would bring the total up to about 106,000,000*l.*, not an excessive amount for a nation engaged in one of the greatest wars on record, which has called out during four years over two millions of men.

Another remark which these accounts suggest is this. The expenditure of last year was 860,000,000 paper dollars, then worth about 60 cents. The expenditure of this year and the next cannot be very much less; and if we take the paper dollar at its present value of 40 to 45 cents, its nominal amount will probably be much greater. Again, it is clear that Mr. Fessenden hopes far too much from the inland revenue. He says 'it ought to yield $300,000,000;' but it has not done so, and there seems no reason to expect that it will. The deficits of the next two budgets, 1864-5 and 1865-6, will therefore probably exceed Mr. Fessenden's estimates.

Although the actual call on the immediate resources of the country must be measured by the real value of the Government expenditure, the burden of debt and interest imposed is determined by the nominal deficit. Mr. Fessenden, on his own showing, has to borrow about $500,000,000 a year, on which he engages to pay six per cent. interest in gold. Thus, for every fifty millions worth that he spends (or even for every forty millions) he adds a hundred millions to the capital of the debt, and six millions in gold to his annual expenditure. The consequence is that the debt is increasing at an enormous rate. The estimated total of the debt is as follows:—

	Including currency.	Deducting non-interest-bearing notes
July 1, 1864	$1,740,000,000	$1,340,000,000
„ 1865	2,223,000,000	1,823,000,000
„ 1866	2,645,000,000	2,245,000,000

—an estimate founded on the foregoing tables, modified by certain suppositions and expectations so doubtful that we have taken no account of them in copying the yearly balance-sheets.

According to Mr. Fessenden's own account, he will pay between July 1, 1865 and 1866, 25,000,000*l.* sterling as interest on the debt. That of the next year, therefore, can hardly be less than 30,000,000*l.* It would seem, then, that if the war should last eighteen months longer, the North will be saddled with a perpetual payment of 30,000,000*l.* a year over and above its expenditure on the public service—and this, too, in gold and not in greenbacks.

We are a little at a loss to know how the present customs revenue is calculated. It is paid in gold; is the amount stated in gold or in greenbacks? We will take the more favourable supposition. In that case the revenue of last year was 20,000,000*l.* in gold and 30,000,000*l.* in greenbacks. Let us suppose the latter then to have been worth 66 cents the dollar; then the whole revenue was 40,000,000*l.* sterling; and the North will owe, in 1866, a debt the interest of which will absorb three-fourths of the largest revenue they ever raised.

Of course they will not pay it. That is not of much moment. But how long will it be before it will be obvious to capitalists that the interest of such a debt never can or will be paid? It is shown by Mr. Fessenden's own report that the debt in July, 1865, will entail an annual payment of 25,000,000*l.* sterling. After that, will any one dare to lend? Will it not be plain to the dullest intellect that ever fagged through the compound rules that if much more is borrowed, repudiation will be inevitable; and that to lend any further is to render loss not probable only, but inevitable? This is the rock ahead, clearly indicated by Mr. Fessenden's Report. He has indicated a limit to his power of repayment, by putting side by side his actual revenue and his prospective obligations; in so doing, he has fixed a term to the credit of his Government, and practically warned all lenders against trusting him any further. It is as if a landowner, mortgaged up to the ears, should publish a statement of his debts and of his rent-roll, along with a request for more money. 'I have borrowed 400,000*l.* at 4 per cent.; that is gone. My rent-roll is 20,000*l.*; lend me 200,000*l.* more.' Who would accede to such a request? Yet Mr. Fessenden seems to expect that he will be able to go on indefinitely borrowing money, while, as his own figures show, there is barely a hope that he will ever pay what he has borrowed already.

Here, if anywhere, a gleam of light breaks through the darkness of the future. It would be rash to make a positive prophecy regarding the effect of insolvency upon the policy of the Northern Government. But two things are obvious: first, that it is almost as difficult to carry on a war of aggression without money as without men; and secondly, that the North is likely to come to an end of its power of borrowing money, long before the South finds any serious difficulty in raising men.

THE CONFEDERATE CAUSE IN FRANCE.

FROM A CONFEDERATE CORRESPONDENT.

Paris: December 27.

In its appreciation of 'Lincoln's own,' the Paris press shows the same divergency of opinion as that which it always exhibits when it undertakes to treat the American question. To the Opposition journals everything appears quite satisfactory: to the independent and Government journals everything is the reverse. Notwithstanding this resolution, however, it is easy to detect in the embarrassed and exaggerated encomiums of the one side a determination dictated by a political passion, and in the vehement and deep-felt criticisms of the other side the expression of an opinion both well considered and well grounded. Expressions such as these are not without their interest, and I therefore give you a brief summary of the opinions put forth by the French press on the Message of Mr. Lincoln.

The 'Patrie.'

The more one reads the Message of President Lincoln, the more does one become convinced of the absolute inutility of the sanguinary contest, of which this document is a cold panegyric. Nothing is to be deduced from the language held by Mr. Lincoln—nothing that can in any way modify the general impression—nothing that can prove the equity of the Northern cause—nothing that can induce the hope that this cause will triumph either by moral or material force.

It is simply an official report, very exact in some particulars, of the situation which is known to us all. It contains not a word of regret for the suffering which the war has entailed, not a word of hope for the termination of this horrible hecatomb! The war must continue! cries Mr. Lincoln; and it really seems that this cry, an almost savage one, is uttered by him as by one who, feeling himself ruined, would have all by whom he is surrounded to perish in his downfall! An American remarked to us yesterday, with graphic energy, 'This looks like the winding-sheet.'

The Patrie then proceeds to prove that the law of emancipation recommended by Mr. Lincoln cannot be voted constitutionally, since for this an amendment of the Federal compact would be necessary, and this amendment could be effected only by the joint vote of three-fourths of the States, of which fifteen out of thirty-six are in favour of the South.

It is not true, therefore (continues La Patrie), that the abolition of slavery is the object of the Northern war. The Union, says Mr. Lincoln, is the 'common end;' and on this he insists by representing the people of the North as unanimous in their desire to see the Union re-established. But this unanimity of the Northern people has never been contested. It is well known that the North wishes for the Union. Does this prove, however, that the Union is henceforth possible? Quite the contrary. The greater the desperation of the North, the stronger does the fidelity of the South towards its cause become.

So far as exterior relationships are concerned, Mr. Lincoln's Message affords no subject for discussion. One can but smile at his indirect menaces against England relative to the Canadian frontiers; one can smile only at the phrase which represents Mexico as still the theatre of civil war. Mr. Lincoln is pleased to ignore the proclamation of the Emperor Maximilian and the triumphs of the French army. The future, however, will very soon teach him this.

In a word, then, the Presidential Message says too much or too little. To minds blinded by a chimeric confidence in the re-establishment of the Union it says too little; to the adversaries of the North it says too much; for, again to repeat the words of our American, 'it is a letter forming a fit accompaniment to the decease of the American Union.'

The 'France.'

The article published by this journal is both creditable and resolute. Its author, M. Cohen, admits, with regret, that the last word of Mr. Lincoln's policy is war, and tracing the Message sentence by sentence, he shows it to be inconsistent with facts.

The weakness of the armies is evident. Let the reader attentively peruse those passages in the Message which refer to military operations, and he will seek in vain for those brilliant successes which characterise a well-conducted war, as also for those advances which bespeak decided triumphs. Millions of men massacred, thousands of millions of money wasted and squandered—these are the sum of this horrible butchery.

The state of the finances offers a no less unfavourable aspect. Two thousand millions have been already swept away in the gulf of the deficit. Where are the resources to be found for such a mad expenditure as this?

Mr. Lincoln affirms, with an appearance of national pride, that these resources are not to be sought for from abroad. A foolish pretence which badly cloaks discredit. For a long time past the demands made by America for loans have met with no reply from the foreigner, or at all events when he has replied to them it has been on conditions altogether ruinous. Compulsion, therefore, renders a restriction to national resources unavoidable.

Be this as it may (concludes La France), with military operations barren in their results, a debt of twelve thousand millions, and ruin in perspective, surely this is not the time to show oneself so glorious, so inflexible respecting conditions of peace.

The 'Nation.'

The first thing that struck us on reading it (the Message) was the cold and indifferent tone in which it is written: in no part of it does it exhibit the slightest trace either of emotion or of sympathy for the immense sacrifices and inestimable sorrows of the numerous populations of the North and of the South, condemned during three years past to all the horrors of a civil war, without pity and without mercy. A foreigner, a simple spectator only of this prolonged contest, whose business might have been to retrace results and to indicate their probable issue, could not possibly have proceeded to his work with a drier eye or a looser hand.

It was hoped that this Message would contain some indications of a possible and speedy reconciliation. Unfortunately this hope has proved altogether deceptive. If the Southern populations participate in the sentiments by which their Government is actuated, the language used by Mr. Lincoln indicates nothing but the continuance of war.

Now, the sacrifices which these Southern populations have, without a murmur, imposed upon themselves, evidently prove that they are resolved to continue them to the last.

THE 'PRESSE.'

The Presse thinks that Mr. Lincoln 'is not an University graduate,' and that his 'elocution is vulgar,' but admits that these defects have not hindered his stating many things, amongst others that the sale of the captured blockade-runners has produced fourteen millions.

The Presse adds, however, that—

The President has forgotten to say how much the commerce of the Union has suffered by the disasters inflicted by the Confederate cruisers, the Alabama and the Florida, which now lie entombed beneath the ocean, the one reflecting glory, the other shame, on the American flag.

The Presse seems to participate in the illusion put forth by Mr. Lincoln as to the inexhaustible resources of the Northern States, and believes the reconstruction of the Union to be possible.

The article published by this journal, from the pen of M. Chatard, contains several important blunders. Of these I will mention three only, although I might easily double the number. First, that Mr. Lincoln himself opened the short Session of the Eighth Congress. Secondly, that the great session will last for four years; and thirdly, that 'the modest citizen who has supported the weight of the supreme magistracy with an unshakable firmness, did himself read the Message to the legislative bodies!

I should like to know on what score a writer committing such gross errors as these judges of Mr. Lincoln's political capacity.

THE 'TEMPS.'

This journal, which gives extracts only from the Message, considers it clear, resolute, and hopeful for the friends of liberty. It eulogises the 'eminent' man who, by dint of courage and honesty, has succeeded in bearing the weight of the American crisis, and accepts all his assurances to the very letter. The North is triumphant, the South is expiring; the navy of the Union is formidable, its armies invincible; in a word, everything is admirable in the model republic. Nevertheless, Le Temps finds that this picture has its shade, and this shade is the financial situation. What a heavy burden for the future! it exclaims. But nonsense! England has for fifteen years past borne a much heavier burden.

THE 'SIÈCLE.'

In its eulogy of the Message, this journal appears even more embarrassed than Le Temps. After having examined its every phase, all that it finds in it worthy of admiration is the 'modesty of the President, whose re-election has not made him proud.'

THE 'DÉBATS.'

The Orleanist journal can only find some commonplace encomium to bestow on the Message. All that it praises in it is the 'fixedness of its views,' the 'precision of its language,' and the 'solemnity of its protestations against slavery.'

THE 'NORD.'

The Russian organ thinks that the North may prolong the war for an indefinite period, and that the South has the greatest possible difficulty in maintaining the campaign. It strongly approves of Mr. Lincoln's continuing the contest, the issue of which it considers to be no longer doubtful.

What other counsel could this journal give than this? The oppressor of Poland and the oppressor of the South embrace each other. What could be more natural?

THE 'MÉMORIAL DIPLOMATIQUE.'

This journal judges the Message very severely. It declares it to be vague, cold, and dry, and that it throws no light whatever on the great questions now pending in America.

The Mémorial considers that it is high time for the North to make known to Europe, in a definite manner, the motives on which it is acting and the rights on which its proceedings are based.

The Northern Government (says this journal) has never yet expressed itself with sufficient clearness on this important subject. Certainly it has said and repeated that it is not fighting for the abolition of slavery, and that its object in the present war is the reconstitution of the Union; but this declaration, with which Europe contented itself when the South had not as yet shown its capacity for self-government or made known the full extent of its rights, can no longer be accepted as satisfactory.

It is no longer sufficient for the North to say that it seeks to re-establish the Union. The South has not restricted itself to saying that it will have nothing more to do with the Union; it has proved that it has full right to break the Federal compact. It is therefore at the present time the duty of the North to show by what right it imposes, by fire and sword, on 8,000,000 of men, an association with which they desire to have nothing more to do, and with which, as they have shown, they can well dispense.

After having developed this point, Le Mémorial concludes by applying to the Message the energetic expression of La Patrie: It looks like the winding-sheet.

LE 'MONDE.'

The organ of the Catholic clergy, Le Monde, an old and very influential journal, has devoted an article to the Confederate Manifesto, which has produced a great sensation. In this article, prompted by Cardinal Antonelli's answer to the Confederate Commissioners, Le Monde delivers a grand encomium upon the Manifesto, which it describes as 'an admirable protest against a savage war, an invocation of the natural rights of State liberty, an appeal to Christian brotherhood!'

The Monde exclaims most energetically against the bad faith of the Radical journals:—

The Confederates (it says) are, according to disciplined Democracy, rebels. Granted! But are those rebels men? And if they are men, will not their complaint be listened to? And if that complaint be a just one, can no human tongue be anywhere found to insure them justice?

This article, written by a man of great reputation M. Laurentie, has sorely vexed the journals of 'disciplined Democracy.'

The Union has likewise loudly censured Mr. Seward's refusal to permit the money raised at Liverpool for the relief of the Southern prisoners to be distributed amongst them.

The Patrie, the Pays, and the Constitutionnel, have expressed themseves in a similar strain on this letter of Mr. Seward's.

LETTER FROM NEW YORK.

FROM AN OCCASIONAL CORRESPONDENT.

NEW YORK: December 16, 1864.

THE acquittal of the Vermont raiders came upon us like a clap of thunder in a clear sky. It seemed impossible, after the apparent earnest desire of the Canadian authorities to secure the arrest of the parties and bring them to justice, that such a sham trial would be allowed, and such an extraordinary verdict be rendered. The press here took up the expression and feeling of the people with a will. Dix, by authority from Washington, issued a warlike proclamation, and Congress, in one way and another, hung around the Canadian decision all day. At the first blush the general belief was that the Canadians, like all the other dependencies of the British Crown, were hand and glove with the South in its struggle for independence, and being thus, though pretending to be 'neutral,' they would not resort to harsh measures to please the Northern Government. This was the idea of Stanton when he inspired Dix in the wording of his order to the military commanders on the frontier, and the order was the key to some wrathful editorials on the part of the press, which, with but two exceptions (the Journal and News), came down on the Canadians and John Bull with a rush. But the scene is changed to-day. The order of Dix—the tone of the New York press—the excitement in Congress and in Washington—were all telegraphed to the leading cities of Canada, and in response comes a repudiation of Judge Coursal's decision by the Canadian authorities, and the announcement that the rearrest of the raiders has been ordered. This course is evidence of a disposition to do the fair thing, and it is accepted as such. We now believe that the authorities of Canada, the Government of that province, are all right, and that it was the judge who was at heart a 'rebel,' and therefore gave a snap judgment in favour of the 'rebel' cause. At any rate it is the judge now who is catching the thunder of young America, and the demand is made that His Honour be at once removed from the bench. It is already reported from Quebec that he will be 'severely dealt with;' but what this means remains to be seen. The Chief of Police, Mr. Lamothe, is accused of complicity with the raiders; and this gentleman, it is hinted, will no longer be 'officer of mine'—in other words, he will be dismissed the service.

There appears to have been a vast difference in feeling between those Canadians who thronged the court-room, and cheered loudly as the raiders were allowed to 'depart in peace,' and the Cabinet of the province, which we are given to understand, after the news of the excitement among the Yankees had been received, 'unanimously denounced,' the judge's decision. Can it be possible that it was Dix's bluster and the Herald's gas which brought about this 'unanimous' disapproval of the decision? How comes it that the Governor-General now condemns a verdict (as is reported by telegraph) when that verdict was based on his own failure to sign the warrant for the arrest of the accused parties? This, it seems, was necessary, in order to make the arrest valid. Yet the Governor-General omits entirely to affix his signature to the warrant, and thus leaves open, as it were, purposely, a loop-hole of escape. The bullying of the Northern press and Congress, however, is sent over the wires, and forthwith the Governor is announced as having repudiated his own doings, and new warrants are issued for the rearrest of the raiders. To my mind this rearresting order would never have been issued had not England recently informed the Canadians that in the event of trouble they must not count upon help from the mother country.

But in the issue of this new order for arrest, it is confessed that the Government has no legal right to do so. Here again is a fear of the Yankees shown. 'The courts have independent jurisdiction,' says the Quebec Despatch, 'but if the judges refuse to do their duty or act corruptly, they may be suspended, or in some cases dismissed.' According to this, then, the dismissal of Judge Coursal, at the most, should end the matter, though he is not in reality guilty of 'refusing to do his duty,' but rather the Governor, who strangely enough failed to sign the warrant. Nevertheless, although the 'Canadian Government has no legal right to act directly' in the decision, it seems it does interfere after the lapse of a certain period, and pronounces the decision wrong. As it stands, the case is a most remarkable one. So far as the raiders are concerned, they are said to have left the province as soon as the decision in their favour was rendered. It is possible, therefore, that they may escape a rearrest, though not so certain that they will escape a 'shooting down' from some of the military who 'report to General Dix.'

With regard to the right of the latter to send his armed troops into Canada to hunt down Southern partisans, there is, of course, more than one opinion; the majority, however, believing that if not an act of war, the proceeding could not be repeated many times without creating such unpleasant results as would certainly lead to war; and war with Canada, there is little question, would ultimately end in war with England.

Are we drifting into such a war? The discourtesy to England in not being noticed by Mr. Lincoln in his message; the flippant abuse of her by Webb; the increase of the naval force upon the Lakes, without any consultation with England upon the subject; the cancelling of the Reciprocity Treaty, 'never to be renewed;' the insulting answer of Seward in response to the offer of charity to the Southern prisoners in Federal hands; the demands in Congress that England shall be made to pay for every vessel destroyed by the Confederate cruisers, with interest, together with other incidents that might be mentioned, are all straws which surely enough tend in one direction—and that direction is certainly not a friendly one.

I might have added to the above the startling order of General Dix. But if Canada is to be left to herself in the event of war with the United States, why England has already accepted the conclusion, and not a sword would be drawn by her in defence of her loyal subjects, and consequently on that score not against the people of the United States.

The temper of the House on Wednesday was seen in the passage, without debate, of the bill from the Senate authorising the equipment of six steam revenue cutters for the Lakes. The Committee on Foreign Affairs in the same body were also instructed to enquire into the expediency of providing, by treaty or otherwise, for the better protection of the frontiers.

In the Senate the resolutions giving to England notice of the termination of the Reciprocity Treaty, were referred to the Foreign Committee. These resolutions passed the House on the previous day. The resolution 'demanding from the British Government payment in full for all ships or cargoes destroyed by pirates from English ports,' was referred to the same committee; as was also the resolution directing the Military Committee to enquire into the expediency of enlisting an army corps to watch and defend the territory bordering on the Lakes. This latter resolution the Senator who introduced it wished intrusted with the Military Committee, but it was put in charge of the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The Senate has passed a bill making Liberia a present of a gunboat—yeas 33, nays 9.

In the House on Thursday, Mr. Davis, of Maryland, from the Foreign Committee, reported a resolution declaring that to Congress and not the President, as assumed by Seward in a despatch to Mr. Dayton, belonged the power of declaring the foreign policy of the Government, but it was rejected by 89 to 63. Mr. Davis at once resigned his position of Chairman of the Foreign Committee when the fate of the resolution was known, but the House refused to accept it.

The summersault of Hon. James Brooks, of New York, one of the ablest debaters in the House, upon the slavery question, is worth noting. A year ago this gentleman declared in Congress that 'slavery was dead,' and he 'accepted the fact;' but since then he appears to have arrived at a different conclusion, for he now declares to Congress and the world that not only is slavery not 'dead, but it is a Divine institution, and should be respected!' Furthermore, said Mr. Brooks, 'the subjugation of the South is impossible, even were it inhabited by only half of the people now there.' Mr. Brooks is the senior editor and proprietor of the Express, one of the most enterprising journals of our city.

The Tribune, of course, supports the abrogation of the Reciprocity Treaty, for the sufficient reason, as it says, that 'an incessant robbery of our resources is going on across the Canadian frontier under cover of the same.' Another journal argues to show that whereas there was, prior to the treaty, an annual balance of trade to the amount of $16,000,000 in our favour, since then it has turned into a balance of nearly $3,000,000 against us. The $16,000,000, however, and more, it is believed, will all return when once the treaty is dead, and the breadstuffs, lumber, and fish of the Canadas come in for an average rate of taxation. The treaty expires by limitation on the 16th March next.

The Toronto Globe, in speaking of the increased American naval force on the Lakes, says that Canada will have to do the same, as 'such a state of things would put us in imminent peril in the event of war. If the Americans had gunboats while we had none, they could make short work of the chief cities of Upper Canada.' It adds: 'The termination of the treaty is very seriously to be regretted.'

The truth in relation to the sudden return of Warren from his expedition on the Weldon road begins to appear. General Lee telegraphs to Richmond that Warren was driven back on Petersburg by the Confederate troops, and the same tidings reach us in private letters. Warren, it now seems, was in reality bound for Weldon, and ultimately for Wilmington. He had 20,000 men in his command and ten days' rations, not including live stock. Grant hoped, when Lee saw this heavy column moving on Weldon, that the latter would be compelled to so weaken the garrisons of Petersburg or Richmond that the capture of one or the other would be an easy matter. But before Warren had been absent forty-eight hours, Lee had despatched a sufficient force to drive him back, and at the same time maintained strong garrisons at Petersburg and Richmond; and thus was Grant again disappointed and baffled in his calculations. The Richmond Enquirer states that the damage inflicted to the road by Warren was trifling, as he was signally repulsed at the first bridge he attempted to destroy.

Private advices received in Washington from Missouri report that Price gained an accession of 10,000 troops during his journey through that State; also stores, &c., sufficient to last his army for months. Included in his spoils were 400 of the best wagons in the Federal service, all filled with the products of the country.

The Richmond Enquirer warmly advocates the proposal of Governor Smith to arm the slaves. 'Virginia,' it says, 'should take the lead. Let her say to the sister States that in this war neither slaves nor slavery, neither property nor person, nothing high or low, shall prevent her from fighting the good fight, and that every son and every dollar, and every acre, shall be devoted to this war and to securing the nationality of these States.'

Saturday Morning, December 17.

The papers are full of news, arrayed in the most exciting character. From a look at them one would be apt to conclude at once that it was thundering simultaneously all around the (rebel) sky. The great feature, however, is the 'capture of Savannah after eight hours' hard fighting, with 11,000 prisoners,' and it is added that 'Hardee, Smith, M'Laws, and other rebel generals are probably in our hands.' This whole story is evidently a canard. It comes in the shape of a 'report' to a newspaper man at Fortress Monroe ('no other paper has the news'), and he kindly telegraphs it to all creation. It would be supposed that a Government vessel arriving from near the scene of the capture at so important a post as Fortress Monroe, would have brought important tidings of this character to the War or Navy Department, but it does not, and the correspondent of a Baltimore journal is the fortunate and exclusive recipient of the news! I think the European public may rely upon it that the report was then incorrect. In further proof of this assumption we have through the Richmond papers later news than this transport could probably have brought from 'off Charleston,' and they declare that Savannah was still intact.

The capture of Fort M'Allister, on the Ogeechee river, sixteen miles south of the mouth of the Savannah river, is correct. Sherman marched upon it in force, and the garrison there being, strange to say, being only '100 men,' the fort was easily taken. Two previous attempts had been made to capture the fort by water, but they failed. The capture opens communication between Sherman and the fleet, but there are other heavy works between the fort and Savannah, which defend the city from the front. There are some, however, who argue that the possession of the fort by Sherman flanks the city; and this being the case, it will soon become untenable, as his army will strongly besiege it on land.

General Canby sent out an expedition recently by way of the Mississippi Central Road to cut off the supplies for General Hood's army. It is claimed that the expedition was successful, but, as Corinth was untouched, Hood can still receive his supplies vid that point.

We have news of an assault by Thomas upon Hood's left wing, in which the Federals claim to have driven it eight miles, and to have captured 800 to 1,000 prisoners and 16 guns. The battle was to be renewed next day, but Mr. Stanton says the 'wires are working badly,' and he has no further news. General Hood, in his report of the battle of Franklin, says it was a complete defeat of the Federals, though it cost him 3,500 men and some of his best generals—Cleburne, Adams, Gist, Strahl, Williams, and Granberry. The Richmond Sentinel says Hood took 5,000 prisoners between the battle of Franklin and his march upon Nashville, and adds that the total Federal loss could not have been less than 'ten or eleven thousand.'

I hear that the despatch from Brazil upon the Florida affair is decidedly tart, if not insolent. Seward has replied as calmly as possible, but does not endorse the seizure.

Gold has not opened under the news. Cotton closed last evening at 132.

LETTERS FROM WASHINGTON.

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

WASHINGTON: December 16, 1864.

Every one is in a ferment to-day for fear of a war with England. The 'loyal' folks do not want a war with England, and yet they consider themselves deeply aggrieved by the state of affairs on the Canada border. They are in a state of mind somewhat similar to that which annoyed the ass when he stood between the two bundles of hay. If war with England begins, the independence of the South is secured, and these belligerent gentlemen, who never wish to fight in person, but only by proxy, cannot bear the thought of such a thing. But, on the other hand, the Canada judiciary do not suit them, and because Judge Coursal chose to decide that he had no jurisdiction of the case of the St. Alban's raiders, and did not hang them on the spot or do some other desperate thing, these gentry think their 'honour' is at stake, and that war alone can avenge such great wrong. So the six months' notice necessary for the repeal of the Canada reciprocity treaty has been given; and Mr. Chandler, the Don Quixote of the Senate, has offered a series of blood-and-thunder resolutions; and General Dix, at New York, no doubt under instructions from the authorities here, has issued a proclamation after the following fashion:—

'All military commanders on the frontiers are instructed, in case further acts of depredation and murder are attempted, whether by marauders or persons acting under commissions from the rebel authorities of Richmond, to shoot down the perpetrators, if possible while in the commission of their crimes; or if it be necessary, with a view to their capture, to cross the boundary between the United States and Canada, said commanders are hereby directed to pursue them wherever they may take refuge, and if captured they are under no circumstances to be surrendered, but are to be sent to these headquarters for trial and punishment by martial law.'

The town talk to-day is Dix's proclamation and Chandler's resolutions, but the excitement evidently will culminate in just nothing at all. Seward and Lincoln have too much at stake to risk a war with England, and no doubt will take advantage of anything to prevent it. The news to-day that warrants have been issued in Canada for the rearrest of the St. Alban's raiders, and that the police are searching for them, will afford the galaxy of statesmen that rules us just such an opportunity as they desire for backing out of a foreign war. These excitements are periodical with us, and always die out. The present one will not result in any war. The people are sick and tired of one war now, and will submit to anything before they will begin another. Of course the newspapers talk big, but they talk big about everything. All the adjectives in the language are generally as much exhausted, in describing a fire at which $25 are lost, as in stating England's deep insults to the United States.

General Sherman has not yet taken Savannah, nor is there the slightest probability that he will do it. The city is strongly defended. It stands on the south side of the Savannah River, about eighteen miles from the sea, and is in the midst of the most extensive rice plantations. The Savannah River is broad, and runs for many miles between wide swamps, which extend on either hand sometimes eight or ten miles back from the edge of the river. Savannah is built up on these swamps, and stands as a sort of oasis of good ground in a desert of marsh. Between the city and the seacoast the entire country is cut up by a vast and intricate series of rivers, creeks, and swamps. Various bayous extend from the ocean to the Savannah River, below the city. Two of these connect the river with Warsaw Sound, a wide and long harbour on the Georgia coast, below the mouth of the river; and one connects the river with Port Royal entrance in South Carolina. All the means of communication with the sea are strongly defended, and for Federal vessels to push up any of them and shell Savannah is an impossibility. Batteries not only line the banks, but all sorts of obstructions fill the channels. Hundreds of torpedoes are sunk in the water, and two Confederate ironclads are constantly on the alert, watching dangerous points. The vast swamps and depth and current of the Savannah River keep Sherman from crossing into South Carolina and making a junction with Foster; and wherever it has been attempted, the Confederate vessels on the river have kept up such vigorous shelling that it was soon given up. On the south and west the rice swamps make an excellent defence for Savannah; and these are aided by a series of earthworks which have been building for at least six weeks under the personal superintendence of Beauregard and Hardee. The number of Confederate troops in the city is large. They have been gathering for a month from all quarters, and there is little doubt that in numbers they equal the army Sherman commands. Sherman's own officers say there are at least 12,000 regulars, and the belief is that Savannah is now garrisoned by 30,000 troops.

On December 2, Sherman's army was marching through Millen, seventy-nine miles north-west of Savannah. He evacuated Millen on December 3, and began a march to the south-east, along the Millen and Savannah railroad. He kept his men well together and sent out scarcely any raiding parties. He marched along the narrow strip of firm ground between the Ogeechee river, swamps on the right hand, and those of the Savannah on the left. His flanks were thus well protected. On December 5, his advance had marched eighteen miles, and he was sixty-one miles from Savannah. One of his corps marched along the Savannah, another along the Ogeechee, and the remaining two between. On December 6, Sherman moved a great deal faster, and by night had gone eighteen miles. On the 7th he marched about sixteen miles, and on the morning of the 8th he was at the town of Crayton on the railroad, twenty-five miles north-west of Savannah. Owing to these fatiguing marches great numbers of stragglers fell out of his ranks, and filled up all the country in his rear, begging and pillaging at every plantation. Many were picked up by the Confederate cavalry, who followed close upon him, harassing him terribly. Sherman when at Crayton is said to have had but little over 20,000 men, all the rest having straggled off or been put hors de combat. The peninsula along which he advanced was only about fifteen miles wide, and the swamps protected his flanks, but at the same time prevented his sending out expeditions to waste the country. So exhausted were his men that he was compelled to shorten his marches upon leaving Grayton, and during the 8th, 9th, and 10th, he advanced but fifteen miles in all. His march was during these days through a dense pine forest, and on the morning of the 10th he reached Bloomingdale, fifteen miles from Savannah, where he met the vanguard of the city's protectors, whom he pushed through the woods for about five miles, and on the evening of the 10th was at Telfair, ten miles from Savannah. All this advance of five miles was made by only the severest fighting, and at Telfair Sherman found the Confederate works so strong that he was compelled to halt. Here he rested for the night, and on the morning of the 11th reconnoitred the position, finding it so strong that he would not hazard an attack.

So Sherman made no attack, and Sunday, December 11, saved Savannah. He began a movement towards his right flank. He moved along the outside of the Confederate works, gradually working around to the south—everywhere testing them, everywhere finding them very strong and well garrisoned. He had constant skirmishes, and on the night of the 11th found himself five miles south of Savannah, without the slightest chance of penetrating the cordon of forts surrounding it. He was near the head of Warsaw Sound, and the road to it was unobstructed. On the 12th his right flank, under General Howard, came out to the edge of the Sound, and a Federal captain with a despatch from Howard put off in a small boat to find the Federal fleet somewhere out at sea. Dahlgren, who commanded the fleet, had been on the watch, and the captain with his despatch was taken on board of one of the Federal vessels. The despatch was sent North, and on it was founded every kind of rumour, not only of Sherman's safe arrival at the coast, but of the capture of Savannah and Charleston and the utter annihilation of all Beauregard's army. The great problem, however, is solved. Sherman has reached the coast in safety, and will now lose no time in supplying his army with the food and ammunition they must be sadly in need of, and in securing reinforcements to help his fatigued troops. There is not the slightest evidence that Savannah has been taken, or is invested, or even seriously attacked. There are plenty of rumours of all three, but none of them have any foundation. The city is still in Confederate possession, with two lines of unbroken railroad connecting it with Virginia and the South-west. From Savannah to Columbia the railroad is uninjured. From Savannah to Charleston the road is still running, for Foster has not cut it—none of the reports that he had done so being confirmed, and there being direct Southern intelligence that his latest attempt to reach the railroad by an advance from Pocotaligo to Coosawhatchie on December 9, was repulsed with severe loss. The probability is strong that Sherman, for some time at least, will not attack Savannah. He will first make secure his position on the seacoast south of Savannah, and then he may try a bout with Beauregard. The latest intelligence is that the Confederates have succeeded in removing all the Federal prisoners out of his path, so that he has captured none of them; and Stanton has just now put an effectual quietus upon all the rumours of the capture of Savannah by an official gazette, stating that he has had no news of it.

There has been a serious battle fought in front of Nashville. The Federal defensive works around Nashville form a semicircle, nowhere more than two miles from it, and extending about five miles from the river above to the river below the town. There are four Federal gunboats at Nashville, but communication along the Cumberland River is cut off by the Confederate batteries, and no others can sail up it. Very little woods obstruct the ground around the city, and the Confederate works formed an outer circle around the Federal works, and were gradually approaching the latter as Hood constructed his siege parallels. As the Confederates came uncomfortably near, it became necessary for Thomas to do something. So he determined to make an attack all along his line, and began it yesterday morning. The gunboats on the river assisted, and soon succeeded in shelling Hood's left flank away from the river bank, west of the city. The Federal troops then availed themselves of this success, and Hood's men withdrew out of range of the gunboats. This was the result of the entire day's battle, for on the Confederate centre and right flank Thomas could make no impression. Thomas reports having captured sixteen cannon, between 800 and 1,000 prisoners, and some waggons. The Federal losses are not reported, but, as Thomas was the attacking party, they must have been quite heavy. Thomas says he intended to renew the battle to-day if the Confederates did not retreat, but we have not yet heard anything of it. Hood's expedition, sent under General Lyon, around to the Federal rear, is making alarming strides through the country, and is everywhere welcomed by the people. After crossing the Cumberland at Clarksville, north-north-west of Nashville, and entering Kentucky, Lyon began a march eastward through the lower tier of counties. He captured Hopkinsville, Elkton, and Russellville, three successive county towns, and was swiftly marching when last heard from towards the Louisville and Nashville Railroad, Thomas's only line of supplies. He was about fifty miles from it, with scarcely a Federal soldier in front of him.

What a complete fizzle Grant's last operation has been! He sent 20,000 men, with 22 cannon and no end of cavalry, to capture Weldon and destroy railroads, and break things generally. Lee, quietly, but effectively, as he always does such things, despatched a detachment of Confederates after Grant's column. Warren, the commander, hears of it, and is so bewildered that he allows a handful of cavalrymen to successfully oppose his crossing the Mehervin River, near the North Carolina border, and turning his back on Weldon, he manages, by marching over all sorts of country roads and bypaths, to get out of his difficulty by going almost to the James River, and returns to camp with the sorry report that he had captured thirty prisoners, and destroyed 120 barrels of apple brandy. Could anything be more ludicrous? And yet the whole affair is paraded in newspaper columns as a 'brilliant victory.' Stanton, it seems, had sense enough to give it the go-by, for he said not a word about it. The army in front of Petersburg is very quiet, and has done nothing for many a long day. Longstreet made a reconnaissance against Butler's lines on the north bank of the James in the beginning of the week, and captured a few prisoners.

The only raid I have to report is one made from Baton Rouge, Louisiana. A Federal cavalry force, 5,000 strong, with twelve cannon, has started east from Baton Rouge towards Mobile, on a cotton-stealing and land-wasting expedition, but as yet no news has been received of its progress.

A Federal gunboat called the Otsego has been destroyed by a torpedo on the Roanoke River, North Carolina, six miles above Plymouth.

Mosby's men without any loss captured forty Federal cavalrymen near Millwood, Virginia, December 4.

A bill has been introduced into Congress which will remove from the service the following Federal generals, some of whom should have been kicked out long ago:—Hunter, Burnside, Sigel, Heintzelman, Sickles, Schurz, Averell, Sturgis, Payne, Spinola, and Tyler.

The departure of a fleet of transports with ironclads from Fortress Monroe to join Sherman has just been announced.

December 9.

A DAY or two ago, Mr. Lincoln made one of his characteristic speeches in this city, which I must send you as a piece of military information. A crowd of office-holders had been serenading Fenton, the new Governor of New York, and after closing their ovation to that worthy they went to the White House and brought out Mr. Lincoln. The old fellow made a speech, as follows:—

'Friends and fellow-citizens,—I believe I shall never be old enough to speak without embarrassment, when I have anything to talk about. I have no good news to tell you, and yet I have no bad news to tell. We have talked of elections, until there is nothing more to say about them. The most interesting news we now have is from Sherman. We all know where he went in at, but I can't tell where he will come out at. I will now close by proposing three cheers for General Sherman and the army.'

These words, though vulgar and unworthy of a President, have deep significance. They show that the Administration has no news from Sherman, and that it shares with the Republicans of the North the greatest anxiety for the result of his movement. There is a gradual belief spreading over the country, that Sherman has failed, and that now the only question is, whether he will be able to get off in safety with any considerable part of his army. When I wrote you at the end of last week, the critical situation of the Federal army in Georgia was plainly seen by all who studied it; now the whole country sees it.

In the last days of November, Sherman's columns were marching through Georgia. Somewhere about the, 29th they effected a junction on the Macon and Savannah Road, west of Millen. Millen is a very important point in this campaign, and its position should be accurately remembered. It is a small town where the railroad from Macon to Savannah, and the one from Augusta to Savannah, come together. It is seventy-eight miles north-north-west of Savannah. Sherman's troops on the 19th were some distance west of Millen. Howard's column, which had been travelling towards Augusta, had come down from Northern Georgia to the line of the railroad on which Slocum's troops had come eastward—Slocum having struck it at the Oconee Bridge. Just before this time, as near as can be ascertained, Sherman sent out two cavalry expeditions. One of them went from Howard's column, passed north of Millen, and was under orders to go to Port Royal and communicate with the Federal fleet and army that were there, under Admiral Dahlgren and General Foster. The cavalry met no Confederates until they reached Waynesboro', a town thirty-six miles south of Augusta, on the railroad to Millen. Here the Confederates surprised them, attacked them on all sides, captured 760 prisoners, and dispersed the rest. What became of the balance of the cavalry is not known. They are supposed to have made the best time possible back to Sherman's main army. The other Federal cavalry detachment had been sent out by Slocum, when he was at the Oconee bridge. It was very strong, and apparently contained all the cavalry Slocum had with him. Nothing is known of what it did, nor can the line of march it followed be traced with very great accuracy. It passed down the west side of the Oconee to the Altamaha, and then appears to have followed that stream down to within thirty miles of the coast. Here the main body turned north-east towards the Savannah River, reconnoitring parties being sent towards Brunswick and Darien. How near they approached those towns is not known. The next that is heard of the cavalry is, that on December 1 it was about fifty miles north-west of Savannah, and that on the 1st and 2nd, small detachments were in the country between the main body and Savannah, some of them on the night of the 1st being but eight or ten miles from Savannah. They disappeared, however, and the main force turned westward, crossed the Ocmulgee, and then going north appears to have rejoined Sherman. This raid passed through country where there were scarcely any Confederate troops, and the damage done by it was confined to burning houses and wasting fields. Scarcely a skirmish is known to have been fought by it. Its progress can be traced, but that is all.

Meanwhile Sherman, his two columns having joined, was marching slowly eastward along the railroad towards Millen. The Confederates from Macon and Milledgeville followed him. From Augusta, Bragg and Beauregard sent troops down past Waynesboro' towards Millen. Other troops from Savannah had come up to Millen. Sherman marched slowly along, and on December 1 Millen was abandoned by the Confederates. On December 2 Sherman was still west of it, and does not appear to have entered it. For three or four days he had marched very slowly, and seemed undecided what to do. At last accounts he had not captured Millen, and was evidently waiting for the return of his cavalry expedition. Sherman was thus at least eighty miles from Savannah and sixty from Augusta. Neither city was seriously threatened. Indeed, the line of his march for a week previous proved that Augusta was not threatened. Now the question is, where is he going? He may go to the Georgia coast either at Darien or Brunswick. He may try to go into South Carolina and reach Port Royal, but the Savannah River lying in his way will be almost too formidable an obstacle for him to attempt that road. Sherman's long delay has saved Savannah. Time has been given the Confederates, and they have used it well, to hurry troops there and to build fortifications. As Sherman lingers now near Millen, he gives strong evidence that he knows not what to do. To get to the sea coast in any direction it is necessary to cross swamps nearly all the way, and by no road is it less than a hundred miles. The Confederates are closing around him from all quarters; they harass him terribly. Indeed, his failure to advance beyond Millen is conceded to be caused by the bold front assumed by the Confederates. Bragg is at Augusta, Hardee and Dick Taylor at Savannah, Wheeler near Waynesboro', Forrest in Sherman's rear on the road from Macon, and Beauregard passes back and forth between the various cities as needed. Wade Hampton's cavalry are on his flanks; so are Iverson's. From Mobile, Macon, Savannah, Charleston and Augusta, I have no doubt, troops enough have gathered around Sherman to be a match for his entire force. The Republicans are now praying that he may get out of the scrape with whole bones.

The various efforts which have been made by different

Federal commanders to aid Sherman, form no unimportant part of his history. A large Federal fleet, with transports loaded with food and ammunition, was two days ago at Fortress Monroe awaiting information of Sherman's reaching some point on the seacoast, in order to go there and succour him. As we have no information of its having sailed, this is an additional proof that no news of his progress has been received by the Administration. Sherman, no doubt, had, when he started, a definite plan, but the hard knocks given him by the Confederacy have probably caused material changes in it. The fleet had not sailed when last heard from, nor is any time known to have been fixed for its starting. The most persistent effort made to aid Sherman was by Dahlgren and Foster. They gathered a large naval and military expedition from Charleston Harbour and Hilton Head, and sailed up Broad River, a stream between these two places. Their intention was to go up the river high enough to destroy the Charleston and Savannah Railroad, and thus prevent the passage of Confederate troops down to Savannah. The military part of the expedition landed, and marched to cut the railroad; but at Grahamsville they found an entrenched force of Confederates, who had been on the lookout for just such an attempt as this. They were repulsed, and forced to abandon the expedition, and driven back till they got under the protection of the gunboats in Broad River. Here they were when last heard from, and as reinforcements were coming up the river, it seemed to be the intention to make another attempt to cut the railroad. In the fight at Grahamsville the Federal troops report their loss at 700; the Confederates report theirs at about 100. The Confederates say that the Federals left 1,300 dead and wounded on the field.

General Hood is gradually closing his lines around Nashville. He has begun a siege, and his troops are labouring on the parallels and approaches. His batteries throw shells into the outskirts of the city. Thomas, in the city, is doing his best to defend it. All the citizens and Government employés are still under arms, and give him no slight aid. Hood, on December 6, sent a flag of truce into Nashville, asking an exchange of prisoners. Thomas replied that he was not able to make an exchange, as he had sent all his Confederate prisoners to the North. Communication between Nashville and Louisville is still open. Hood has sent an expedition down the Tennessee, and planted batteries on the Harpeth Shoals, a part of the Cumberland River, fourteen miles below Nashville, which is of difficult navigation. This, and an unfavourable stage of water, keep the Federal gunboats from getting up to Nashville to aid Thomas. On the other side of Nashville, Hood has destroyed at least thirty miles of the Chattanooga Railroad between Nashville and Murfreesboro'. Rousseau and Milroy are shut up in Murfreesboro', undergoing a sort of minor siege. On December 5 the Confederates attacked the nearest railroad blockhouse to Murfreesboro', but were repulsed. They were seen tearing up the road all around it, however. Nothing is heard of what is progressing south of Murfreesboro'. For all that we know, they may have destroyed the railroad all the way to Chattanooga. The despatches in Southern journals from that section are not as late even as December 1, so that, for a time, we must remain in ignorance of what is passing.

All interest centres in Sherman and Hood, and people pay very little attention to Grant. An event has happened at Petersburg, however, which is of the greatest importance. Labour on the Dutch Gap Canal has been given up for this season. It is not completed, nor is it likely that it ever will be. Grant's attack is certainly abandoned. The honour of compelling a failure of the Dutch Gap Canal, belongs to a few persevering Confederate artillerists. The excavation of the canal was made by two enormous dredging machines. Day after day the artillerists banged away at them, until first one and then both were smashed to pieces. And so the canal was given up, and Grant, carefully suppressing all information of it (except that which comes through private channels, and he can't suppress), began his winter quarters. All along his lines the Confederates can see the men labouring on their huts. They are built a few hundred yards in rear of the earthworks.

As usual there are various raids to report. Sheridan has sent a devastating party through London County, Virginia, east of the Shenandoah Valley, to obey Grant's order, and make it 'a barren waste.' After an absence of a week the expedition returned with 2,000 head of cattle, but scarcely any prisoners. Its commander reports having 'left the whole region over which he passed without hay or forage of any kind.' The other Federal raid is the one you have already heard of, made by Grant's cavalry on Stony Creek, a station on the Weldon Railroad. General Lee reports that this raid captured only 125 Confederate prisoners; the Federal accounts made it three or four hundred. The Confederates have made a raid under Colonel Witcher into Western Virginia. They captured 100 horses, 300 cattle, and one cannon. They destroyed three forts, two blockhouses, and two steamboats. The great raid, however, was that made upon New Creek and Piedmont on the Bathmore and Ohio Railroad. We have received the Southern report of it. General Rosser, the commander, captured five cannon, 800 prisoners, 1,500 horses and mules, 1,500 cattle, 800 sheep, and 200 waggons. The waggons were afterwards burned. Rosser lost only two men killed, and three wounded. A small Confederate raid into Morganzia, in which but 50 Texan cavalry penetrated the Federal works, and carried off eight negroes, finishes the catalogue.

As I close, the news reaches us that on December 3, Sherman started from Millen on a march towards the seacoast. He was proceeding leisurely in a southern or south-western direction, but no definite intelligence had been received in Richmond of his progress on December 6, the date of our last news from there. Darien or Brunswick seemed more likely to be Sherman's object than Savannah. A transport left this city yesterday with sealed orders, and the story is that she sailed for Brunswick Bay, in hopes of meeting Sherman there. The fleet at Fortress Monroe may have sailed to-day, but I have not yet heard of it.

SHERMAN IN GEORGIA.—Speaking of Sherman's troops, a Southern journal says: 'Several of the largest plantations in this section (Central Georgia) were completely destroyed by the Federals, swept clean of everything, and all the houses thereon burned, except those occupied by negroes.' 'They have burned,' says another Confederate journal on the same subject, 'all the fencing around the cemetery, and most of the palings around the graves, and burst open the vault belonging to Mr. Gordon, containing the remains of his wife and the bodies of three or four other persons.' Restoring the Union? If intense hates on the part of the Southern people can be supposed of any weight in that result, those atrocious crimes look exceedingly like the work of a determined effort for its destruction.

ENGLAND AND THE NORTHERN STATES.

(From the New York Times.)

IT is impossible to make anything else of this than that Canada has been turned into a regular base of rebel operations against our Government and people—and a base more advantageous than any other, because more secure, being under the protection of a professedly neutral flag.

This state of things is deplorable, yet it must be met, not by the cries of children, but by the action of men. We must with our own hands apply the remedy. Canadian territory must be respected no more than Virginia or South Carolina territory. The guerillas that attack us at the North must be hunted down with the same vigour of pursuit as when they attack at the South; and the British flag must not deter us one whit more in the one case than the Confederate flag does in the other. By every law, human and divine, men are privileged to protect themselves from robbery and assassination. It is more than a privilege—it is a duty.

It may be said that this will lead to a war with England. So it may. But if it must come, let it come. Not ours the guilt; it will belong only to English malignity and lawlessness. We were never in better condition for a war with England. We have no commerce on the high seas for her to pillage, thanks to the piratical vessels she has built and manned for the rebels. But her own commerce whitens all the seas, and we could speedily make a clean sweep of it. We are fast completing the occupation of the rebel coast, so that the blockade will no longer have to be maintained. We have six hundred vessels that will need employment; and none could possibly be more profitable than scouring from pole to pole for British prizes. As for the British navy, it is a pasteboard sham. There is not a vessel that one of our prime ironclads could not send to the bottom in fifteen minutes. There is not a gun that would be better than a swivel when pitted against our fifteen and twenty inch Parrotts. Not a British soldier would ever tread a foot of American soil. The red squads that are in Canada would be, before one of our corps of veterans, like yellow leaves before the whirlwind. There is nothing in Canada that could offer us serious resistance. So, too, of the British West Indies, which might be made invaluable appendages of our great republic. Moreover, Ireland, if we pleased, could be detached from the British crown, or at least made worthless to it. Let war once be declared, and an Irish expedition once be named, a half-million of Irishmen would spring to arms and crowd every transport to avenge Ireland's wrongs on Ireland's own soil. There is already an organisation of Fenian Brothers numbering more than 100,000 picked men, who are anxiously awaiting just that opportunity.

We might dwell with reason upon the policy of a war with England, as a means of arousing the dormant American spirit of the Southern people, and attracting them to the old Government. Our rebels have been glad of British aid, but we will do them the justice to say that they have the intensest scorn of British meanness.

If the Canadians persist in allowing these murderous incursions into our territory, we must protect ourselves, whatever be the consequence. Submission to such outrage would stamp us the most abject of men. Every principle and every instinct alike cry out against it.

LEADERS WORTHY OF THE CAUSE.—The following description of the civil and military leaders of the Federal States has appeared in the Spectator. The writer signs himself 'A Yankee:'—'Mr. Lincoln, though not a peasant, is in his appearance and manner only a very favourable specimen of a Slave-State 'mean white.' Mr. Johnson, now Military Governor of Tennessee and our future Vice-President, is little better. He was a journeyman tailor, and in working his way up he has not acquired a degree of social culture to make him tolerated among people of even the least pretensions to refinement were it not for his political position. His speech, his manner, his appearance are such as would offend a man at all fastidious, offend him much more than those of a peasant, because the latter would seem in place, and there be respectable. . . . . Grant, and Sherman, and Sheridan are three as unhandsome men in face, figure, and bearing as you could find in the country. The one has determination written on his lips, the other has a big brain and a piercing eye, and the third has dash in every muscle of his face; but these points aside, they are three insignificant-looking little fellows. It would seem that even in the small matters of the appearance and deportment of our leaders, civil and military, it was decreed that we should come before the world in this contest at disadvantage. And Mr. Lincoln's name is Abraham, and Grant's is Ulysses, and Sherman's is Tecumseh.'

REBEL SYMPATHISERS.—The following singular order was issued by General Dana at Vicksburg, a few days since:—'The following females will be taken charge of by the commander of the cavalry forces in moving out to-morrow, and will be dropped and set at liberty at or beyond the Big Black. They are prohibited from returning within the Union lines during the war:—Mrs. G. Powlkes, rebel sympathiser, mail-carrier, &c.; Mrs. Mary Green, rebel mail-carrier and sympathiser; Mrs. Adah de Moss, rebel mail-carrier, sympathiser, and suspected spy; Mrs. Shuler, smuggler by association and practice; Mrs. Eggleston, general busybody, with rebel interests, rebel philanthropist, mail-receiver, carrier of smuggled funds to prisoners in gaol, &c. The provost-marshal is charged with the execution of this order.'

A NEW PENITENTIARY.—A very good joke is current regarding Butler. The other day a court-martial was held in that portion of the army over which he has command to try several offenders against military law. Two of these were found guilty of the offences charged, and sentenced 'to two years' hard labour on the Dutch Gap Canal.' The beauty of this left-handed compliment to the hero of Big Bethel will be appreciated when it is remembered that he has been engaged during the whole summer in digging the contemptible ditch alluded to, which has become an object for the ridicule of both Federals and Confederates, and which, after fifty announcements of its opening, is not yet completed. Butler's wrath was very great when he learned the decision of the court-martial, and he instantly dissolved the court and reprimanded the officers composing it. What disposition was made of the men upon whom this suggestive sentence was pronounced, is not stated.—Correspondence of the Standard.

'BEASTS DO NOT GET DRUNK.'—General Butler, in an order dismissing Lieutenant John Clancy, of the Coloured Light Artillery, from the service, says:—'He was in a state of intoxication which is reported as beastly, but that is evidently a mistake, as beasts do not get drunk.' General Butler ought to know.—Philadelphia Age.

OFFICIAL REPORTS.

Headquarters, Army of Tennessee, six miles from Nashville, December 8, 1864, vid Mobile, December 9.

To Hon. J. A. Seddon.

About 4 o'clock P.M., November 30, we attacked the enemy at Franklin and drove them from their centre line of temporary works into the inner lines, which they evacuated during the night, leaving their dead and wounded in our possession, and retired to Nashville, closely followed by our cavalry. We captured several stands of colours and about 1,000 prisoners. Our troops fought with great gallantry. We have to lament the loss of many gallant officers and men. Major-General Cleburne and Brigadier-Generals John Williams, Adams, Giest, Strahl, and Granbury were killed. Major-General John Brown and Brigadier-Generals S. Carter, Marignault, Quarles, Cockerell, and Scott were wounded. Brigadier-General Gordon was captured.

J. B. HOOD, General.

Headquarters Army Northern Virginia, December 13, 1864.

Hon. James A. Seddon, Secretary of War.

The expedition to Bellfield, under General Warren, returned within the enemy's lines yesterday. The two divisions of the Ninth Corps, which went to Warren's relief, proceeded no further than Belcher's Mill. On meeting the returning column they turned back.

On returning from Bellfield, the enemy moved eastwardly to the Jerusalem and Sussex Court House Roads. Our troops consequently only encountered their rear guard, and pursued no further than the Nottoway River, and they have returned to camp, bringing a few prisoners. Our loss is very slight.

The superintendent of the Petersburg and Weldon Railroad reports that about six miles of the railroad has been broken up.

THE CANADIAN DIFFICULTY.

THE following is from the Toronto Leader:—

STARTLING NEWS FROM WASHINGTON.

The most important news which has come from the Federal States since the war commenced will be found in our columns this morning. On the morrow after the release of the St. Alban's raiders, in accordance with the law, we receive intelligence of three movements of great importance to British America which have been made at Washington. General Dix issues an order in pursuance of which Southern raiders from our borders are, if they escape back, to be followed into Canada; the Senate votes £1,000,000 to place six revenue cutters —in reality gunboats — on the Lakes, and a resolution has passed one branch of Congress, the House of Representatives, by a very large majority, calling on the President to give the requisite notice to terminate the Reciprocity Treaty, but not without an appended provision that measures may be taken to reconstruct the treaty on a new basis.

The coincidence of all this news reaching us on a single day, is not perhaps so ominous as might, at first glance, appear. The order of General Dix was, of course, founded on the release of the St. Alban's raiders; but the building of the revenue cutters was a foregone conclusion, even before the notice to terminate the arrangement with England restricting armaments on the lakes, had been given. And the resolution about the Reciprocity Treaty was passed before the decision in the case of the St. Alban's raiders was known at Washington, and the day before it had been given. This resolution reaches us by mail, the telegraph to the Toronto papers having unaccountably omitted all notice of it. Nevertheless these movements are ominous, and some of them seem to point to a possible rupture between the United States and England. The order of General Dix has the appearance of a rash act; but we are not prepared to say that in no possible case would it be justifiable for a belligerent power to follow raiders into neutral territory.

Every country is expected to preserve the neutrality of its soil; and one of the penalties of the infraction of this rule is that the country which neglects or is too weak to perform this duty is liable to be the battle-ground of other belligerents. But it is clear that the power claimed by General Dix, if it may be exercised at all, should only be resorted to in case of the clearest and most extreme necessity. American precedents would not justify the order. There is reason for the utmost vigilance on the part of our Government to prevent raids being organised against a nation with whom we are at peace; and we trust that it will not be found wanting in this duty. The raids from the States on Canada, during the rebellion in the latter country, were numerous; and England actually apologised for the only act of retaliation to which she ever resorted—the destruction of the steamer Caroline.

AFFAIRS FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

WEDNESDAY EVENING.

MONEY AND DISCOUNT MARKET.

THE money market continues very firm, as is usually the case at the close of the year, and it is not probable that there will be any relaxation till after the 4th of the ensuing month, when, if nothing of an adverse character should occur in the interim, a further reduction in the Bank minimum rate of discount may be looked for, as in most of the Continental cities money is daily becoming easier, and during the week the Bank of France has further lowered its rate from 5 to 4½ per cent., and the Bank of Holland from 6½ to 6 per cent. Within the last few days the applications for discount both at the Bank and in the open market have been heavy, in consequence of the engagements maturing at the close of the year; and amongst the discount houses and the brokers the best short-dated bills are not negotiated under 6 per cent. The joint-stock banks are dealing very sparingly with their resources, and are not making advances under 5⅞ per cent. On the Stock Exchange money is in heavy demand in connection with the half-monthly settlement, 5½ to 6 per cent. being charged for short loans on Government securities; 8 to 10 per cent. on foreign stocks; and in many instances as much as 1*l*. per share on railway shares for the fortnight.

BULLION AND SPECIE MOVEMENTS.

The bullion market remains in a very quiet state and without any material alteration as regards its general character, though the aspect is not perhaps quite so assuring as for the last few weeks. The amount of gold sent into the Bank has been only 43,000*l*., whilst there has been a withdrawal of 162,000 sovereigns for transmission to Alexandria, but nearly all the gold recently arrived from America has been purchased for France. It is, however, anticipated that most of the next arrivals will be purchased by the Bank. The receipts of specie from abroad this week have been very trifling, amounting only to 178,500*l*., from New York. From Australia there have not been any arrivals, and it is now generally believed that the J. E. H., which sailed from Melbourne in the early part of July, and has not been heard of since, is lost. The Ellora steamer, which left yesterday for the East, took out 182,922*l.*, of which 155,400*l.* was in silver and 9,650*l.* in gold, for Bombay, and 17,872*l.* in gold for Alexandria. The silver market is now in a very quiet state, all existing orders having been completed. The nominal price for bar is 61$\frac{5}{8}$d. per oz. The dollars brought by the French steamer to St. Nazaire having reached London, have been sold at 60$\frac{5}{8}$d. per oz., being a fractional decline as compared with the previous sales.

HOME AND FOREIGN SECURITIES.

All the money and stock markets have this week been greatly interfered with by the Christmas holidays. The Stock Exchange was closed from Friday evening till Tuesday morning—consequently, not more than an ordinary half-week's business could have been transacted, and since the opening there has only been a very moderate attendance of the members. Nevertheless, the transactions, on the whole, may be considered to an average extent under the circumstances. There has been scarcely anything doing in the shape of speculation, the dealers being more particularly engaged with the preparation of their annual accounts and the half-monthly settlement in foreign stocks and railway shares. In the English stock market prices have again become more buoyant, in the absence of any political news, foreign or domestic, of an adverse character, and the easy state of the money market. Consols closed this evening with increased firmness at 89$\frac{1}{2}$ to 89$\frac{5}{8}$ ex div. for money, and 89$\frac{5}{8}$ to 89$\frac{3}{4}$ ex div. for the account, which, as compared with the rates of Wednesday last, is a further improvement of about $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. Exchequer bills are also better, being now up to 2*s.* dis. to 3*s.* prem. The foreign stock market has also been gradually improving in prices, but the dealings have been rather more limited. Greek stock closed at 23$\frac{3}{8}$ to 23$\frac{5}{8}$, being a rise of $\frac{3}{8}$ per cent. Mexican have advanced $\frac{1}{4}$, the present price being 29$\frac{3}{8}$ to 29$\frac{5}{8}$. Spanish Passives have improved $\frac{7}{8}$, and the Certificates $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., the quotations respectively being 32$\frac{3}{8}$ to 32$\frac{5}{8}$, and 14$\frac{3}{8}$ to 14$\frac{5}{8}$. Turkish Six per Cents. of 1854, on the contrary, have declined $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., the closing price being 88$\frac{1}{2}$ to 89$\frac{1}{2}$; but the Four per Cents. are unaltered at 99 to 101.

AMERICAN SECURITIES.

The dealings in American Government and Railway securities have been far more restricted this week than for some time past, and in the early part prices exhibited much weakness, but this afternoon, upon receipt of the telegraphic news from America, a few more transactions took place, at a general improvement in values. The only dealings officially recorded have been in United States Six per Cents., 1882, at 42$\frac{3}{4}$, 42$\frac{1}{4}$, 43$\frac{1}{4}$, and 44$\frac{3}{4}$; Virginia State Six per Cents., at 28; Atlantic and Great Western Railway, Pennsylvania Section, first mortgage, 1877, at 71$\frac{1}{2}$ and 71$\frac{3}{4}$; and Illinois Central, $100 shares, all paid, at 50$\frac{1}{4}$, 51, 51$\frac{1}{2}$, and 51$\frac{3}{4}$.

CONFEDERATE COTTON LOAN.

The market has been steady throughout the week until to-day, when adverse news from the States rendered the stock heavy. We close dull at 57 to 59.

MERCANTILE SUSPENSIONS.

The following suspensions have taken place since our last number:—Mr. Henry Gurney, timber merchant of Birmingham, liabilities about 60,000*l.*; assets 24,000*l.*; Mr. Edward Lloyd, of Birmingham, with heavy liabilities; Messrs. Hill & Weguelin, Russian merchants, liabilities about 130,000*l.*; Messrs. Edward de Coster & Co., general merchants, liabilities about 60,000*l.*; Messrs. Grundler, Ormond, & Co., general merchants, liabilities 20,000*l.*, assets sufficient to realise 6*s.* in the pound; the estate of Messrs. Perry & Waagen, commission agents, liabilities about 12,000*l.*, assets estimated at 1,200*l.*, arranged to be wound up under deed.

RAILWAY SECURITIES.

The market for British railway shares has been moderately active, but since the reopening on Tuesday the operations have been chiefly in connection with the settlement which takes place to-morrow. To-day the market has exhibited more animation, and prices have further improved. As compared with last week there has been a rise of 3$\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. in Metropolitan; of 3 per cent. in Midland; of 2 per cent. in London and North Western; of 1$\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. in Great Western; of 1 per cent. in Caledonian, Great Northern A. stock, and Birmingham and Derby; of 1$\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. in Lancashire and Yorkshire, London and Blackwall, and Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire; of $\frac{3}{4}$ per cent. in South Eastern, and of $\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. in North Eastern (Berwick) and do. do. (York). Against these improvements, however, there has been a decline of 1$\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. in Edinburgh and Glasgow, and of $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. in North British and North Eastern, (Leeds). In foreign and colonial shares the market has been rather less active, but prices continue to be well supported.

MEETINGS OF PUBLIC COMPANIES.

The Commercial Dock Company has held a meeting and declared a dividend for the half-year at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, with interest at the same rate on the new issue of stock, both payable on and after the 31st instant. The business of the company has been of a very satisfactory nature.—The City Offices has held its first general meeting. The company has 409,727*l.* invested in city properties, and has issued 300,000*l.* in 5 per cent. mortgage debentures for a period of five years. The report was adopted.—The Grand Surrey Dock and Canal Company held an extraordinary meeting, when, in accordance with the terms of the amalgamation with the Commercial Dock Company, which takes effect on January 19, a dividend of 1*l.* 10*s.* on the ordinary shares, free of income-tax, was declared payable on the 26th inst.—The Assam Company will pay an interim dividend of 8 per cent. upon the paid-up capital of the company.—The seventeenth report of the directors of the Oriental Inland Steam Company (Limited), to be submitted at the annual meeting to-morrow, expresses the satisfaction of the board at finding that the net receipts on the working of only two steamers on the Indus have defrayed all charges at Kurrachee, Mooltan, and all the sub-agencies, as well as those of the London office, and, after charging depreciation and insurance at 10 per cent. on the value of the stock employed in earning revenue, leave a balance of 5,033*l.* to be carried to next half-year's account. A belief is expressed that at this time next year the board will be able to recommend the payment of a dividend.—The Wallachian Petroleum Company held an extraordinary meeting to-day to confirm the resolutions of the 6th inst. authorising the issue of 8,000 new shares at 10*l.* each, 4,000 to bear preference dividend at the rate of 7$\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. per annum, and 4,000 to carry out the modified arrangements with the guarantees.

PROGRESS OF ENTERPRISE.

A new undertaking has been formed under the title of the Street Rolling Stock Company (Limited); the object is to build, buy, sell, repair, and let on hire carts, wagons, vans, drays, and other vehicles used for trading purposes; the chief branch of operations contemplated is the letting of such vehicles on hire, the rents being paid in advance. It is pointed out that contractors and builders often require for a limited period a heavy plant, which is usually bought and resold at a considerable loss when the works undertaken are completed. An arrangement has been made with Mr. Kingwell of Upper St. Martin's Lane, who becomes the general manager. The capital proposed is 200,000*l.* in 20,000 shares of 10*l.* each, only half of which are to be issued at present.

THE COURSE OF THE PRODUCE MARKETS.

In the produce markets transactions have been interrupted by the Christmas holidays, which commenced on the 24th inst. and will terminate on the 3rd proximo. The little business that has been done has for the most part given evidence of a firm and healthy position, and generally confidence is expressed in the probable course of the market on the resumption of business in the new year. The concluding sales of sugar established an advance of 6*d.* to 1*s.* per cwt. on those of the preceding week, and there is still an enquiry which promises well for the future. Coffee remains without material change in value; but the deliveries continue very good, which is a favourable feature. The grain trade has been of merely retail character, without change in prices. Oilseeds and oilcakes maintain their value steadily. A good business has been done in petroleum at 2*s.* 1$\frac{1}{2}$d. to 2*s.* 2*d.* for English refined; all the crude petroleum offering has been cleared off the market, and quotations cannot be given with certainty. But little is passing in oils of any kind, and rates are nominally unchanged. There has been no new feature in drugs, dyes, or chemicals. Saltpetre is firm, but inactive. No further public sales of jute have taken place, nor have there been any transactions of moment privately. Cotton is very firm, with an advancing tendency. In the metal trade the principal feature is a reduction of 4*l.* per ton in the price of English tin. In the other departments very little is going on, and no variation has taken place worth naming.

Liverpool: Wednesday, December 28.—Considering that the present has been altogether a broken week, owing to the Christmas holidays, our cotton market may, under the circumstances, be considered as well supported. Since the receipt of the President's message, a greater stimulus has been given to business, and the improved accounts from the manufacturing districts have given increased activity, with a corresponding advance in prices. American has been in good demand, partly on speculation and partly for export, at a fractional improvement. Only a limited business has been done in Sea Island, in consequence of the short supply. There has been more doing in Brazil, and the advance has been from $\frac{1}{2}$d. to $\frac{3}{4}$d. per lb. In East India, China, and Japan, a large business has been done, and the rise may be quoted from $\frac{1}{2}$d. to 1*d.* per lb. Egyptian has also been more looked after, at about a similar advance. The sales this week have been 40,000 bales, of which 15,000 were taken on speculation and for export. The total sales this year have been 2,738,562 bales, and to the same period in 1863, 2,575,441 bales. There have been imported this year 2,222,651 bales, against 1,627,692 bales last year. The trade have this year taken 1,607,895 bales, and in 1863 the number was 1,299,814 bales. The exports this year have been 547,015 bales; last year they were 467,161 bales. This year there have been taken on speculation 572,831 bales, and in 1863, 750,828 bales. The estimated stocks at the present time are 235,106 bales, whilst in 1863 they were 250,571 bales. The closing quotations this afternoon were:—Uplands, 26*d.* to 26$\frac{1}{4}$d.; Orleans, 26$\frac{3}{4}$d. to 27$\frac{1}{4}$d.; Mobile, 26$\frac{1}{2}$d. to 26$\frac{3}{4}$d.; Fair Egyptian, 27$\frac{1}{4}$d. to 27$\frac{1}{2}$d.; and Dhollerah 19$\frac{1}{2}$d. to 20*d.*

The markets at Manchester have not been very brisk as regards business, but this is generally expected towards the close of the year, therefore much disappointment has not been expressed by sellers at the slackness in demand; but prices remain very firm, with a hardening tendency. Manufacturers are, on the whole, well occupied in working to order. Shipping yarns, within the last day or two, have been in greater demand, and all spinners are asking an advance upon last week's quotations. This, however, has rather checked business, although spinners had an idea that the full prices demanded would be acceded to; nevertheless, all orders given out have been at an improvement. In home-trade yarns there has also been a fair market, and slightly better prices have been obtained. The cloth market has likewise been very firm with regard to prices, which have in most instances improved, and the market closes with an upward tendency. The enquiry has been pretty general, and where goods have been in stock, and available for immediate shipment, they have met with a ready sale. The latest quotations for cloths were: $\frac{7}{8}$ Grey Printers, according to make and quality, 8*s.* to 15*s.* 3*d.*; $\frac{9}{8}$ Grey Madapollams, 7*s.* 3*d.* to 19*s.* 3*d.*; $\frac{9}{8}$ Grey Printers, 10*s.* 3*d.* to 17*s.* 3*d.*; $\frac{5}{4}$ Grey Shirtings, 11*s.* 9*d.* to 25*s.* 6*d.*; Water Twist, No. 20, 1*s.* 10*d.* to 2*s.* 7*d.*; No. 30, 2*s.* 2$\frac{1}{2}$d. to 2*s.* 11*d.*; No. 40, 2*s.* 11*d.* to 3*s.* 5*d.*; Mule Twist, No. 20, 1*s.* 9*d.* to 2*s.* 5*d.*; No. 30, 2*s.* to 2*s.* 9*d.*; No. 40, 2*s.* 1*d.* to 2*s.* 11*d.*; No. 50, 2*s.* 6*d.* to 3*s.* 1*d.*; No. 60, 2*s.* 9*d.* to 3*s.* 3*d.*; No. 70, 3*s.* to 3*s.* 6*d.*; No. 80, 3*s.* 2*d.* to 3*s.* 8*d.*; No. 90, 3*s.* 4*d.* to 3*s.* 10*d.*; and No. 100, 3*s.* 7*d.* to 4*s.* 2*d.*

SOUTHERN PRISONERS' RELIEF FUND.

THERE are at this time many thousands of Confederate prisoners of war confined in the various forts and camps of the Northern States. A large proportion of them are wounded or sick, and all are in a state of destitution, the accounts of which, as given in private letters and in the newspapers, present a picture of human suffering, which has scarcely a parallel in modern times. The merest necessaries of life are wanting, and frequently the wounded prisoner has no raiment save that which is stark and stiffened with his clotted blood. Horrible as war is in all its features, assuredly it has no greater horrors than the long agony of the poor captive who, when the feverish excitement of the contest is over, is left to the bitter charity of strangers and foes, without one friendly hand to soothe the pains of body or friendly voice to whisper hope and comfort to his despairing mind. These men, cut off from the assistance of their kindred or the protection of their Government, have peculiar claims on the patriotism of their countrymen in Europe, and upon Christian benevolence everywhere. They did not recklessly or from choice embrace the profession of arms, but in exchanging the comforts, and often the luxuries, of home for the toils and hardships of a soldier's life, they obeyed a stern sense of duty and the call of their country in its extremest need. An unusual proportion, also, of those that fill the ranks of the Confederate armies belong to the higher walks of life, upon whom privations, such as are endured by prisoners in the hands of the North, fall with increased severity.

The Southern Prisoners' Relief Fund is intended to mitigate some of these sufferings which cannot altogether be relieved. Within little more than a twelvemonth, nearly £3,000 have been collected and expended in relief. The managers of the Fund are assisted in their efforts by self-devoted ladies in the principal Northern cities, who visit the sufferers and give them such aid as the means at their disposal render possible. Of late the Federal Government has granted permission that this Samaritan work may be done openly. It is earnestly hoped that all Southerners residing in Europe will support the Fund to the extent of their ability, and its objects may recommend themselves to all, irrespective of country or political convictions, who sympathise with the sufferings of their fellow-men.

Contributions will be received by J. H. ASHBRIDGE, Treasurer, Walmer Buildings, Water Street, Liverpool; or in London, by HENRY HOTZE, Esq., 17 Savile Row, W.; in Paris, by H. O. BREWER, Esq., 6 Rue Circulaire; and DANIEL HUBBARD, Esq., 24 Rue Lord Byron.

HUBBUCK'S PATENT WHITE ZINC PAINT.

THE most durable and beautiful paint known, is cheaper than White Lead, and is proved to be superior for all purposes than the pernicious Lead Paint, and equally adapted for all climates. Its whiteness is unaffected by bilge water, boiling sugar, or noxious gases. It is free from any poisonous ingredient, and united in all respects to the use of the painter. Each Cask of Pure White Zinc is Stamped 'HUBBUCK, LONDON PATENT.' Interior Zinc Paint, so marked, having been sold in Foreign Markets, the Patentees offer a Reward of FIFTY POUNDS for information which will lead to the conviction, in an English or Colonial Court, of those who have pirated their Mark. Both Exporters and Retailers are liable for its sale.
